which we have given an Illustration—there is an iron viaduct across an arm of the sea two thousand feet in length and fifty feet in height.

The works on the remaining sections of the line are being pushed forward very rapidly, and about twenty-five miles of additional line will be opened in eleven or twelve months. There are some important engineering works on this portion of the railway, but they are at present so far advanced that the period of their completion can be accurately determined. The engineer-in-chief of the company is Charles Vignolles, Esq., F.R.S., Westminster, under whose able orders the works have been so successfully carried out that the first section of the railway has been completed within the time originally fixed, and the whole line will probably be opened some months before the period prescribed—viz., the end of 1863. The contractor for the works is Mr. Watson, of Parliament-street, Westminster; and the mode in which they have been carried out is highly creditable to the resources of his establishment. The photographs were taken by Mr. B. Mulock, the artist specially engaged by the contractor for taking views of the works.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1056.—VOL. XXXVII.] SATURDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1860. [WITH SUPPLEMENT AND COLOURED SUPPLEMENT.] TENPENCE

THE BRITISH VOLUNTEERS.

As a prudent trader at the close of the year sums up his outgoings and incomings during the past twelve months and takes stock of the merchandise he has on hand, so it may be expedient at this present stage of the volunteer movement to indulge in a brief retrospect of its beginnings and progress, to consider its present position and future prospects, and to "take stock" of its strength and capacity. Our volunteer force is undeniably a great and triumphant fact, and, were we even to rest contented with that which we have already done, we should still have erected a powerful barrier against aggression, from whatsoever quarter it might proceed, and have put on record a significant protest against the insinuation that we are wholly a nation of shopkeepers, and that a policy as selfish as it is timorous has forced us to intrust the safe keeping of our homes and our moneybags to hirelings and mercenaries. But we use the term movement, with reference to volunteering, advisedly; and it will be long, we trust, ere the word becomes inappropriate. To halt might not be fatal, but it would surely be mischievous. In halting, it would scarcely be possible to avert the natural consequence of immobility—stagnation. We should speedily grow weary of an institution which had so promptly adopted the doctrine of finality; and that which at present is sound, and by judicious and progressive improvements must become permanent, might at no distant time be abandoned as though it were one of the innumerable caprices of fashion, or degenerate into as gaudy a frivolity as the Pope's Halberdiers, or as ludicrous a byword as the Lumber Troop. It is, happily, seldom that peace can be said to have its dangers; but a long era of calm and content might have in it so much of the dangerous element as to engender a lethargic feeling of security, a placid indifference to perils no longer alarming for the reason that they were no longer visible, and such a dislike to the warlike idea as that which some years ago led many estimable persons to associate themselves for the special purpose of abolishing war, and which proposed to exclude all lethal weapons from the Great Exhibition of 1851. Among the "cankers of a calm world and a long peace" there could not be one, we think, so noxious as the neglect or discouragement of a volunteer army; or as a state of national feeling which looked with coldness on the gallant bands who are now the pride and honour of Great Britain, and which conducted at last to such a frame of mind as that which we can all remember—when the Artillery Company were twitted with "playing at soldiers," and young men were apt to quite veterans who pointed to rusty firelocks and antiquated accoutrements, and prattled of the days "when they were in the volunteers."

The public are occasionally apt, in their estimate of the volunteer movement, to fall into the sin of erroneous comparisons. The British volunteers have been compared with and likened to the National Guards of the Continent. It certainly presents few points of resemblance to those organisations. The foreign National Guard has been, in most instances, the offspring of popular passions; and has been, turn by turn, the instrument of contending factions. Now it has been called into existence by the decree of a dictator, now it has been abolished, or its functions at least nullified by the edict of a despot. In times of every-day peace the formation of a National Guard of armed citizens has been distasteful; in many instances it has been hateful to the regular army of the country. The Spanish National Guard was simply an armed sedition. The French National Guard during its only period of prosperity—the reign of Louis Philippe—had always to struggle against the old Napoleonic prejudices regarding Pékins, and the taunts of professional soldiers who refused to recognise any martial virtues in warriors who wore spectacles, and who off parade sate peaceably behind their desks or behind counters. The National Guard of France was the good service to society during the convulsions of June, 1848; but the inauguration of a stern and strong rule, to whose stability the existence of an Empereur ou Empereur was in the highest degree dangerous, speedily led not, it is true, to the utter annihilation of the force, but to such a modification of its strength as reduced it to a skeleton just powerful enough to give employment to a few staff officers, and to furnish a well-dressed guard of plump bourgeois for the hend-quarters in the Place Vendôme. While the British volunteers form in spirit and in truth a "National" Guard, they have scarcely anything in common with the Continental levies usually so called. It may be that, from time to time, some peevish sneer, or some pettish taunt against our volunteer defenders has issued from ancient military coteries which are wont of enjoyment, or from habit and inclination devoted to a martial status quo, and unable to discern how the immense requirements for foreign service made upon our regular troops left every year our towns and our coasts more and more unprotected. Those sneering and taunting critics opposition the volunteer movement has, taken in its entirety, met with the frankest and most cordial sympathy and encouragement from the officers of the established Army, and from the supreme military authorities of the country. In a word, the fine-seeing spirit of our genuine Sovereign early comprehended the essential loyalty of the movement, and its importance as an element of national defence. Whatever the Queen of England undertakes to do she does with a will, and not by halves. On four memorable occasions her Majesty has reviewed her forces in the most gratifying manner her approbation of the citizen soldiers who have rallied round her throne. At the great volunteer review in Hyde Park, her Court around her, the commanders of her armies, the representatives of foreign nations by her side, and her own body-guard keeping the ground, Queen Victoria witnessed the procession of those splendid legions which had sprung from the dragons'-teeth of English energy and patriotism. At Edinburgh, equally under Royal auspices, a magnificent review of the northern volunteers showed the Queen that the fondest and most ardent attachment to her throne and person prevailed among that chivalrous people whose clans under Charles Edward had once besieged the sheriffs of the House of Hanover in the Canongate. At Windsor, the Queen herself inaugurated that congress of sharpshooters whose annual renewal, whose local development, will be among the most important and hopeful features of the volunteer movement. Nor should it be forgotten that early in the year, in her palace of St. James's, the Queen gave a sanction to the volunteer force as an institution—a sanction which, albeit ceremonial, was none the less of deep social significance—by receiving the volunteer officers at a Royal levée.

We have endeavoured to show how dissimilar is the volunteer army to the foreign National Guards. It needs few arguments to point out how devoid is our volunteer force of any party or factious character, and how unlikely it is that riflemen—belonging to whatever class of the community they may—will ever be made the tools of any political intrigue. The Conservative stands side by side with the Liberal. The Free-thinker marches shoulder to shoulder with the Protectionist. The clerk, the warehousemen, the mechanic, are of no greater account in the rank and file than the scion and descendant of Russians as the coronetted gentleman who boasts that his ancestors were here long before the coming of the Conqueror; nor do we think that a far more extended introduction of the artisan element into our rifle corps would in the slightest degree militate against the purposes for which they were originally founded, or detract one iota from the strong feeling of loyalty which characterises the British volunteers. The opponents of the movement—and they have been neither few nor powerless—have argued that the effect of expensive uniforms, subscriptions, band of music, clubhouses, and the like, must be practically to exclude working men from the ranks of the volunteers. We have no such opinion. It is in the nature of things that different classes will carry into different corps the feelings and the habits of their daily lives. While we deprecate all unnecessary foppery, all undue devotion to the embroiderer's needle and the tailor's goose, we do not see that it is practicable, or that it is advisable, to discourage military spruceness and smartness in volunteer uniforms. As long as we have riflemen, so long we shall have "crack corps"; so long we shall want the power, even if we had the will, to prevent the assumption of a few inches of extra braid, a superabundant plume or tuft, or whistle, or to discourage volunteer cavalry from appearing in scarlet tunics and "Melton cords," or bestriding horses of price. What is required is, that there should be volunteers of the Line as well as volunteers of the Guard, and that there should be a sufficiency of corps whose cheapness of uniform and facilities of entrance should render them accessible to working men. That the cheaply-clad artisan volunteers would suffer by comparison with the splendid Six-foot Guards and the stately Kimbolton troopers we do not for one instant believe. The "Robin Hoods" of Nottingham are nearly all working men, and they made to the full as good a figure in Hyde Park as the Victoria Rifles; and, to take an illustration from the regular Army, we have not yet heard that the traditional fame of the "Buffs" or of the "Connaught Rangers"—simple regiments of the Line as they are—has suffered because the golden tassels of the 11th Hussars or the cuirasses and jack-boots of the Life Guards. Moreover, we do not think that, in any case, the commendation bestowed on the general equipment of the rifle corps has been excessive. We see a great deal in their dress that is neat and symmetrical, very little that is tinselled or gaudy. Any person who is familiar with the costume of the French Zouaves, the Turcos, or the Guides, of the Imperial Guards of Austria and Russia, or even with the bizarre equipment of the volunteers of the Papal States, must acknowledge that our riflemen are comparatively plainly and soberly clad; and a glance at our Coloured Engraving of the Metropolitan Rifle Corps in Hyde Park will be conclusive as to the prevalence of sensible and serviceable, while still handsome, uniforms in the ranks of our "crack corps" of the metropolis.

We have dwelt at this length upon the subject of volunteer dress for the reason that a propensity for fine clothes has been one of the weightiest accusations brought against riflemen. We grant that a force including in the public mind the pick and flower of the British army may be actuated by a pardonable desire to look well not only in the eyes of their sisters, cousins, and sweethearts, but in those of the public at large. No harm will accrue from a reasonable indulgence in the pomp and circumstance of war. A rifle corps, not under a good, will very soon be a bad one. Scotch corps having its pipers at its head; from an Irish corps marching to the enlivening strains of "Garry Owen"; from estimable ladies presenting silken banners and silver bugles to the sworn defenders of the English home, no harm but much good to the country can arise. Parading their parks for sham fights and inspections, and afterwards entertaining the hungry warriors with a cold collation; from an occasional volunteer banquet or a volunteer ball. But it should be remembered that our riflemen have not enlisted for the sake of parade or amusement, or for show. Already they have vindicated the utility of their creation and paid a triumphant tribute to the virtues of hard work. In the most inclement weather, under the most adverse circumstances, the attendance and attendance of the members of the rifle corps has been as exemplary as their advances to military proficiency have been extraordinary. They have belied the sinister prognostications of their detractors; and, with the exception of a few casualties and contretemps at the Queen's review, the volunteers, as a body, have not fired off their ramrods, they have not got into Hyde Park without being able to get out again, nor have their rear ranks ever bayonetted the front. They have learnt in an astonishingly short space of time the most difficult evolutions, their precision has excited the admiration of regular soldiers, and they have not forgotten their genuine vocation as riflemen sharpshooters. Already the Queen's Prize, competed for by the winners of Mr. Ross have been followed by rifle competitions as spirited if not so momentous all over the country. The Tir Fédéral has followed the Tir National. The titled and the wealthy have been eager to offer cups and money prizes to be shot for; while the rifle-butts will be found more powerful as permanent as riflemen, and as famous as the old butts at which the archers of old England launched their clothyard shafts. Altogether, when we survey the rise and progress of the volunteer movement, when we survey its present, and when we meditate upon its future, we very little regret, much less are mortified, with, and much more to look forward to with hope and confidence. The admirable motto selected by the National Rifle Association was "Defence not Defiance." There is no English man who loves his country and who values the freedom which under the rule of the Sovereign and the laws is his undoubtable inheritance, who cannot find in his heart a responsive echo to the words we have quoted. We wish to defy no one. We wish, merely, under Heaven's Providence, to defend ourselves. We wish to see our volunteers as strong and as numerous in times of profound peace as they are now when European collisions may be impending, when our immediate boundaries verge closely on the shadow of the great black cloud of war. We wish volunteering still to be considered as a movement—a movement that, as it progresses, acquires strength; and our aspirations are bound up in the homely advice to all the British volunteers to "go on and prosper."

A Supplement to the London Gazette of Tuesday last publishes the convention between her Majesty and the Emperor of the French, supplementary to the Treaty of Commerce of January 29, 1860; with a tariff annexed thereto. Dated Paris, Oct. 24, 1860.

The grand prize of 10,000*l.*, called the prix Chaumont, at the Vincennes shooting-ground, has been won by Mr. Whitworth, with a score from Ninety-Six Stone. The first prize on the ordinary list is awarded to M. Jules Gerard, the lion-killer.

THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH AND MR. WHITWORTH.—Mr. Whitworth, who went over to Paris to be present at the shooting-match, was invited to an interview with the Emperor on Friday, the 12th inst., and seeing out of this a trial of his rifles, under his own superintendence, took place on the Tuesday following at Vincennes. The Emperor has been so much satisfied with the result that he has, it is reported, ordered a number of rifles to be made for him. He also intends to send an officer to Southport to see the cannon tested as soon as arrangements could be made for that purpose; and it is reported that no objection presently exists to the Government of a British rifle, be it patented, without any delay, to negotiate for the purchase of the French patent, so as to make the invention available for the service.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

All the Marshals of France, with the exception of Marshal Bosquet, have been assembled in Paris. On Tuesday they breakfasted with the Emperor at St. Cloud, and passed several hours with him in the Council Chamber afterwards.

The Gazette de France has been suppressed. The Ministerial report proposing the suppression says:—"Under present circumstances Government finds it inconvenient to allow great liberty to the journals; but tolerance would be weakness if dissension were allowed to degenerate into injurious hostility and guilty provocation. For several days the portion of the press which pretends to represent the sacred cause of religion has redoubled its violence. An act of firmness becomes necessary. Conscientious troubled, authority and faith are lessened by the confusion that party spirit establishes between the precious and religious interests. Religion would be compromised if the most respected principles were lowered to complicity in the revenge or ambition which the country has so often repudiated. The Gazette de Lyons has appealed to the factor all passions and to appeals for agitation, the perfidy of its attacks against the Government, and the hypocrisy of its support to the most advice of the Administration. Its number of the 17th instant more especially reached an excess that cannot be tolerated."

Monday's Constitutionnel says:—"At the moment when the interview at Warsaw gives rise to all kinds of comments, it will be learnt with interest that the Emperor has received an autograph letter from the Czar. We believe we are correct in stating that this letter explains the interview at Warsaw in such a manner as to spoil it of any significance hostile to France.

The Constitutionnel of Tuesday contains an article, signed by M. Grandguillot, congratulating the Austrian Government on the reforms just promulgated, and expressing regrets that the Government had not sent a civil instead of a military governor to Venice.

On Wednesday the Constitutionnel favoured us with an insight into the French policy in Italy. By way of replying to the separate clauses of objectors, it presents us with the negative aspect of the emperor's policy—that is to say, non-intervention in Italy against the revolution, and it is not that of sustaining the Italian movement at all hazards. The reasons given for this disinterested course are, on the one hand, not in taking the part against Italy the Emperor would thereby his origin and lose the character he holds from universal suffrage; and, on the other, not to be forced by the Italian party to make a small cause a rupture with Austria, Russia, and Prussia, and lead to a general war. But, the Constitutionnel then adds, if France could support revolutionary intentions nor absolute reactions in Italy, what line of policy should she follow? and, after entering into a consideration of the political condition of the great Powers, and making a review of the state of Italy, draws the conclusion that a Congress is the only means of settling the Italian question, and proves that Italy is henceforth to the interest of Europe, and in consecrating it by an act of high jurisdiction Europe would show as much prudence as justice."

ITALY.

The Sardinian Senate, after a short sitting, voted the Annexation Law on the 16th. The Marquis de Brignole alone voted against the project. The Senate was never more fully attended; its celebrities then were present: such men as Plasmo d'Azeglio, the astronomer Plana, and the physicist Matteucci. Sir J. Hudson and other members of the diplomatic corps were observed to pay due attention to this important debate. The order of the day in honour of Garibaldi was adopted by eight votes—viz., 90 against 82. The Chamber was closed on Friday, after an address expressing homage and gratitude to the King had been voted.

A rupture has taken place in the diplomatic relations between Russia and Sardinia, caused by the entry of the King of Sardinia's troops into the Papal States. Count de Sartiges, the whole personnel of the Russian Embassy from Turin has been officially announced, and the Sardinian Minister has left Petersburg. Accordingly, it is stated that the Ambassadors of Spain and Portugal are preparing to leave Turin. The Prussian Minister at Turin severely condemns the conduct of Sardinia towards the Pope and the King of Naples.

The Nationalities says:—"There is an entire division of Austrian soldiers at Mezzo-Porro, and the Austrian fleet is in the harbour of the province of Mantua, is also strongly occupied. This menacing attitude of Austria has induced the Piedmontese Government to concentrate on the line of the Po under the command of Generals Cialdini, Cucchiari, and Durando. The line of the Mincio is defended by General La Marmora. It is said that the latter will be appointed to the command of the army of Southern Italy."

The battalions of the National Guard have enthusiastically received the invitation of the Government to prolong their service in Alessandria and Pavia.

A fight has taken place between the Sardinian troops under General Cialdini and a body of Neapolitan troops at Sessa, which is encamped in an official communication from the Dictator's Government at Naples. Isernia is situated on the main road from the Abruzzi to Capua, near the source of the river now known by the name Volturno, and but thirty-five miles from Capua. "The Neapolitans met with a complete defeat, and left in the enemy's hands a Colonel, fifty officers and 800 men as prisoners in the hands of the Sardinians. The battle took place on the 19th (Oct. 20). King Victor Emmanuel's battle took place on the 19th (Oct. 20). King Victor Emmanuel's battle took place on the 19th (Oct. 20). King Victor Emmanuel's other members of the Royal family. In the afternoon a grand dinner took place at the new Palace.

The papers publish the text of Baron Schleinitz's note to the Prussian Minister at Turin, in reply to the Sardinian memorandum of the 12th of September. The Prussian Minister expresses a severe judgment upon the memorandum, and energetically rejects the principles evoked upon by M. Cadorna in justification of the policy adopted by Sardinia towards the Pope and towards the King of Naples. It concludes as follows:—"Called upon to pronounce an opinion upon such acts and such principles, we can only deplore them deeply and sincerely, and we think that we are fulfilling a duty by expressing, in the most explicit manner, our profound disapproval of those principles, and of the application which it has been thought fit to make of them."

AUSTRIA.

IMPORTANT CHANGES IN THE AUSTRIAN GOVERNMENT.

The official Wiener Zeitung of Sunday publishes a manifesto of the Emperor, introducing a diploma founded upon the basis of the February patent, which will be binding on all heirs to the throne, to be drawn up for all the provinces, and to be enrolled among the fehest laws. The object of the diploma is to confirm the legislative rights which will be exercised with the co-operation of the Provincial Diets as well as of the Reichsrath. The number of members of the latter is to be increased to 100 by Councillors elected by the Provincial Diets. The members are to be distributed among the provinces in proportion to their contributions to the public treasury of their taxation.

The Ministries of Justice, Cultus, and Interior, as universal central service rules, are reinstated.

The Court of Chancery is restored to Hungary, and one for Transylvania is to be established.

The Chancellor of the Hungarian Court is to be a member of the Ministry. The official is to be responsible, and is to be represented in the Imperial Councils by a Minister of Commerce.

A special office is to be appointed for public instruction.

The judicial functions of all persons living in Hungary are to be represented in the Ministry and by the President of the Court of Cassation.

The independent administration and commerce are to be represented in the Ministry by a Minister of Commerce.

The fundamental privileges of Bohemia are to be considerably increased. The coronetting of new and the conversion of existing taxes, the hypothecation and the sale of State property, and the contracting of loans are to require the approval of the Reichsrath.

The customs, coinage, all monetary matters, credits, the regulations for the freedom of bank-notes, postal, railway, and telegraph affairs, are only to be treated by Governments in the Ministry of the Reichsrath. All other Constitutional questions are to be referred to the competency of the different Diets.

The Imperial Government will not only have the supervision over laws reserved for a conference of the Councillors of the Empire representing these provinces.

As regards the representation of non-Hungarian provinces, detailed instructions are to be given to the Ministers of Justice, on the one hand, and for the representation of all classes and interests in the Provincial Diets.

The regulation of the provincial regulations, drawn up according to these principles, and the convocation as soon as possible of the Provincial Diets, is ordered.

The constitutional institutions of Hungary are to be re-established. The Hungarian Ministry is to be called to the united Council of the Empire, political, and administrative proceedings. The University of Pesth is to be reopened.

The abolition of the personal service due to landlords, and of the privilege of nobleness as a condition of appointment to offices, is confirmed.

The representation of all classes of the country in the Legislature and the Administration is to be secured by the Diet of Hungary.

The constitutional life of the Hungarian Diet is to begin with the first session day, on which occasion the inauguration of the diploma, and the accession of Hungary, are to be solemnly declared.

The rehabilitation of justice is to be carried on in the proscribed manner, and on the basis of the Criminal Code, valid for Lay and Military Courts.

The Royal Curia in Pesth, and the Stadtholdership in Buda, are to be re-established.

As regards the claims of Hungary and the Servian subjects of Austria for public rights and for the re-establishment of the Military Frontier, the communications from the most influential persons representing the different nationalities, as well as from a reserved audit in the Reichsrath, are the commissioner's report.

Similar municipal institutions are to be granted to Transylvania. The relations of Hungary with Croatia are to be settled by a joint representation of their privileges.

The official Wiener Zeitung also publishes decrees to the following effect:—

Count Thun, Nobiali, and Tschy quit the Ministry. Count Belcredi is provisionally appointed Minister of War. Count Potocki is appointed Minister without portfolio. Baron Wagner, Minister of Justice; Dr. Giskra, Secretary of Interior; Dr. Lasser, Minister, and Schaffgotsch, Secretary of Finance. Baron Jacobson is appointed First Chancellor of the Hungarian Court, and Count Forgach Chancellor of the Exchequer. M. Szapvary, second Chancellor. General Dondeki is appointed Commander-in-Chief of the army in Italy and Commander of the Fifth Army Corps, with his residence at Verona.

Wednesday's official Wiener Zeitung publishes an imperial patent, dated October 20, constituting a statute for the organisation of the Provincial Diet of Styria.

The Diet is to consist of six representatives of the clergy, twelve proprietors of landed property to which certain privileges are attached, and representatives from certain chartered cities, two from the Chamber of Commerce, and twelve from the rural communes of Carniola in Gratz, and from other towns of which forty are to be elected. The Emperor appoints the Presidents of the Diet.

UNITED STATES.

The Republicans have carried Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana.

The memorial services in Baltimore on the 19th resulted in the return of the Reform candidate for Mayor by an overwhelming majority.

Some negro troubles have arisen in Norfolk and Princess Anne counties, Va., and a considerable number of negroes have been arrested. A strict surveillance has been instituted.

Mr. Lindsay, M.P., has addressed the members of the New York Chamber of Commerce on the object of his mission to America. He denies that he appears in any official capacity. On the day that the Persia sailed he met the Liverpool conference in the rooms of the chamber.

A fire at South Boston had destroyed property valued at 200,000 dollars.

Lady Franklin was on a visit to Philadelphia.

Glowing accounts continue to be received from the mines of British Columbia.

Sir Fenwick Williams has assumed the temporary administration of the Canadian Government, the Governor-General having left Quebec for Boston, where he was to embark for England on Wednesday week.

THE WARSAW CONFERENCE.

The Emperor of Russia arrived at Warsaw last Saturday afternoon, and was received with great enthusiasm.

The Prince Regent arrived there on Sunday morning, and was heartily cheered by the Polish population, accompanied by the Emperor of Russia, proceeded in an open carriage from the railway station to the Belvedere, where they lunched together. In the evening the Royal Court visited the theatre. A military parade and manœuvres of the Cossacks took place on Monday morning.

On Monday afternoon the Emperor of Austria arrived with a numerous suite, and was received at the railway station by the Emperor of Russia, Prince Alexander of Hesse, and the Grand Duke Vladimir of Russia. The Emperor Francis Joseph wore the Russian and the Emperor Alexander the Austrian uniform. The Emperors were followed in a second carriage, and a third was occupied by the Prince Regent of Prussia and the Prussian Princes. The Emperor of Austria paid a visit to the wife of the Emperor of Russia, who remained for half an hour, and afterwards visited the Prince Regent of Prussia, with whom he stayed for a shorter period. General Manteuffel likewise attended the Emperor of Austria. In the evening the whole Court visited the theatre.

At noon on Tuesday there was a grand military parade, at which the Emperor Alexander himself assumed the command. The Prince of Hohenlohe-Sigmaringen arrived early in the morning, and paid a visit to the Prince Regent. Count Thun, Austrian Ambassador at St. Petersburg, was at Warsaw.

On Wednesday morning the Prince of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen visited the Prince Regent, and Count Bernberg conferred with the Emperor of Austria.

Up to Wednesday no special conference of the Ministers of Austria, Russia, and Prussia had taken place.

THE PRINCE OF WALES IN THE UNITED STATES.

The Prince left Washington on the afternoon of the 6th, and arrived at Richmond, the capital of Virginia, in the evening. He was received by a large crowd, who, unrestrained by either police or military, pressed upon him in the most unceremonious manner. On Sunday, the 7th, he attended Divine service at St. Paul's Church, Richmond, which was densely thronged. In the afternoon he visited the Capitol and made the acquaintance of Governor Letcher, and subsequently proceeded to the battle-field and inspected Libby Prison. His progress almost everywhere was impeded by crowds, who insisted upon shaking hands with the Prince.

His Royal Highness quitted Richmond at an early hour on the 8th, and did not reach Baltimore till one o'clock that afternoon owing to a detention on the railroad. As the Washington depôt a crowd had collected to greet him on his passage through, and on his arrival in Baltimore he was received with considerable enthusiasm. He was to have attended an operatic entertainment, but he arrived too late.

On the 9th the Prince left Baltimore for Philadelphia, a distance trip from Baltimore. He was received and entertained in an unostentatious manner by Mayor Myer and the municipal authorities. Although his reception here was not marked by any great demonstration on the part of the people, his arrival being comparatively unknown and unannounced, the most elaborate arrangements for the election than in progress. Crowds were assembled at Wilmington and other places on the route, but no stop was made.

The following despatch announces the arrival of the Prince at New York on the afternoon of the 11th inst.:—"His Royal Highness and suite arrived at the Battery at two p.m. amid the booming of cannon and cheering of thousands. He was received by Mayor Wood and other notables. After reviewing the Admiral's fleet in full dress uniform, he proceeded up Broadway in an open barouche, drawn by four white horses. The route was unusually enthusiastic. Broadway was densely crowded with people of all classes; house-tops, windows, and balconies were filled with spectators, and every available square inch covered. The demonstration here entirely eclipsed all others: the Atlantic cable and Japanese celebrations cannot be compared with it. Still, a million people hind Broadway and there was a splendid military display. The Prince looked well, and was greeted with the most hearty good wishes, cordiality, and welcome by the people. Seats sold, on Broadway, at from five to twenty dollars each. It was a grand success in the way of public demonstration. The Prince was in good display of British flags." The ball on the night of the 12th inst. went off with great eclat.

In letters received from the Duke of Newcastle at Chamber his Grace states that the party of Mr. Lorillard, himself, and suite, expect to arrive in London on the 30th or 31st inst.

LOSS OF THE OCEAN STEAMER "CONNAUGHT."

The steamer Connaught, one of the Galway line, has been totally destroyed by fire about 400 miles from the United States' coast. She had on board 150 cabin passengers, 201 in number, were saved by a passing vessel, the Minnie Schaffer, and have been landed at Boston. Captain Leitch, a native of the United States' brig, behaved nobly; he also did Captain Leitch, commander of the Connaught, all he was permitted to do, and was the last man to leave the ship, remaining till they were almost surrounded with fire.

The Connaught left Liverpool for Galway on Saturday the 6th inst. at eight p.m., 10 miles out of Holyhead. Her cargo consisted of 1000 tons of general merchandise. The hospital is below the fires until one o'clock on Sunday morning, when the fire burst out in the after part of the steamer over the fires. At half-past nine o'clock discovered smoke from the aft saloonhatch. Subsidiary engine was immediately started, and the fire was extinguished, and very soon drove the cabin passengers on deck. As the water and fire increased, the fire burst out from the after part of the saloon. Steam was got up, and the first boat that was lowered was stoved. Six other boats were lowered, and immediately filled with the cabin passengers. About twelve o'clock the brig Minnie Schaffer saw our signals of distress, and bore down to us. At one o'clock the steamer was left by the last boat, and the passengers on board the brig, that vessel having attached a hawser to the steamer's bow. The steamer lay on her side two days before she sank, and all the passengers were placed safely on board of the brig. The mails of the Connaught were lost.

The Connaught was fallen in with on the evening of the 7th by the schooner Minnie Schaffer, which was bound to Boston, and which the Connaught went down.

On Monday the Minnie Schaffer arrived at her wharf at Boston immediate steps were taken by the agents of the Galway steam-ship Company in that city to provide for the wants of the passengers. They were immediately supplied with clothes of every description at once. These bound out of the city were freely furnished with tickets to their destinations. The passengers remaining in Boston with boarding-houses and money. Everything that was possible was done to alleviate the misfortune of the passengers.

The Connaught was quite a new ship, having been launched only last May from the yard of Messrs. Laird, of Birkenhead. She was 1,000 tons burden, and this Journal of May 8 appeared an Engraving of this vessel. Her loss will involve a sum of £100,000: she was insured to the extent of £70,000.

MOLDO-WALLACHIA.—Prince Couza intends to claim from the Porte the right of coining money, and also to be styled Prince of Wallachia in one single Administration. It is said that France will support the claims of the Hospodar.

Florence is making preparations for a grand exhibition, which will be opened in September next, and which is to be known as the "Italian Exhibition." The principal towns will co-operate by means of money. The gifts of Milan will be 50,000 francs; Naples, 50,000 francs; Rome, 30,000 francs; Milan, 20,000 francs; Leghorn, 10,000 francs; and Pisa, 5000 francs.

At the weekly meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works, held yesterday week, the several tenders were read for the construction of the northern portion of the main line of metropolitan railway, from the terminus east of St. G. Furness, which was for the amount of £95,000. This was the last estimate given in for the works of the line.

A subscription has been opened at Naples, with a view of erecting a monument to the late General Garibaldi. The Syndic has presented the victories of the General in 1859, and on the other his triumphs in the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies in 1860. The sum of 1000 francs is to be engraved in gold on the pommel, which will represent a hand breaking the chains of Italy.

The ship Glenbervie, bound from Glasgow to Valparaiso, with a cargo of coals, took fire on the 6th of September, while off the Falkland Islands, and was totally destroyed. The crew took to the boats on the 7th inst., and were taken on board the Lady Jocelyn, which took place at Buenos Ayres, and arrived safely on the 14th inst. The Glenbervie was built in the Clyde.

THE CURRANT CROP.—A letter from Patras (Greece) states that the crop of currents is unusually abundant this year, and of good quality. The produce of the Ionian Islands is estimated at 40,000,000 kilogs. All the Ionian Islands at 16,025,000 kilogs.; Sales to the amount of 4,170,000 kilogs. have been effected at Patras. The crop in the first five districts amounts to 1900 Venetian pounds (127 kilogs.), but it gradually declined to 20 colonies, which produce only 100 pounds. The crop in Achaia amounts to 2,000,000 kilogs. England and Germany; the former country taking from 25,000 to 30,000 tons from Patras alone. The crop in the Morea is one more favourable than the last, and the quality is superior. Of the fifty-six vessels which left the Straits-Procurator, Hey Miller, spoke of English tourists generally in terms of praise, and of the conduct of the Greek people towards them as contrasting against the language used by that functionary. An inquiry is now being made into the matter. In the mean time, it seems, the Greek people and authorities from instituting a prosecution for libel against those who signed the memorial against Miller, on the ground that it amounted to an incitation of "cross impolent blackguards." It is scarcely necessary to say that such a prosecution would be a most serious force for the Government to contend with in the original source of complaint, and the matter has been taken up by the Greek press generally, which is unanimous in condemning the acts of the bulgiers of Herr Miller.

TURKEY.—Turkish papers publish a telegram, dated Beyrout, October 12, asserting that the English squadron left on the 11th inst., it was said for the Adriatic. Admiral Martin remained at Beyrout. It is reported that agitation prevailed at Damascus, and that threats had been made against the Christians in consequence of the war tax. Fuad Pasha and the French and Russian Consuls had returned in haste to Damascus. From some details of the march of General Ronikoff Emineff's troops into the Lebanon, which are furnished by the correspondents of the London journals, it appears that the Christians who follow the banner of the Lynch troops are guilty of atrocities which clearly show that they only lacked strength and opportunity to treat the Druses as the Druses treated them. Some of the French soldiers seem likewise not to have been restrained from petty pillage in the mountain Druse villages. The outrages of the Christians do not have provoked a sharp altercation between General Ronicy, who commands the Turkish troops, and General Beaufort d'Hautpoul.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Sir John Lubbock has proposed to remove the deposits of the London bankers from the Bank of England, and to form a kind of joint-stock reserve.

Mr. Frederick Peel has accepted the Financial Secretaryship of the Treasury, vacant by Mr. Lusk's appointment as a Master of Council at Calcutta.

Mr. Parker Snow anticipates that he will be in a position to start in March next on his expedition in search of further traces of the fate of Sir John Franklin and his companions.

Sarah Tilling, a domestic servant, aged twenty-two, at Lambeth, committed suicide a few days ago by hanging herself with a crinoline hoop in consequence of the hard conduct of a young man, a valet, who was on the host night company.

William Mills, a pupil-teacher in St. Peter's School, Pimlico, has been convicted at the Marylebone Police Court of stealing a number of caps from the shop of a tradesman, to whom he had used to visit as a friend and entered to their mothers' hard labour.

The Society for Promoting the Employment of Women, besides having set up a working-office, which, as we believe, as a flourishing condition, have instituted in Portugal-street a law-copying office.

A singular wedding took place on Monday at the Church of St. Marylebone, the happy couple (Mr. Alfred Thomas Maxwell and Miss Rosina Pauline) being both deaf and dumb. The ceremony was performed in the finger-and-sign language by the Rev. Samuel Smith, Chaplain of the Association in aid of the Deaf and Dumb.

The annual dinner to celebrate the anniversary of the birthday of King Edward VI., the founder of Christ's Hospital, took place on Tuesday evening at the London Tavern, and was attended by nearly two hundred gentlemen connected with Christ's Hospital and the Royal foundation of the City of Bridewell, the form of foundation of Lessingian Grammar-school, occupied the chair.

CLUB FOR WORKING MEN.—A public meeting was held in the Colonnade, Clare Market, on Tuesday night, for the purpose of hearing an address from the secretary and operatives of a working-man's club which has been established in the neighbourhood. Speeches were delivered by Mr. J. G. Gilbard, a Middlesex magistrate; Mr. Hepworth Dixon, Mr. W. H. Killick, Rector of St. Clement Danes; by the Rev. C. M. Robins, to whom considerable praise was given for his exertions; and by other gentlemen. A large number of members was enrolled, and the new institution a fairly launched, with every prospect of success.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 890 boys and 861 girls, in all 1751 children, were registered in London. In the corresponding weeks of the years 1859-68 the average number was 1376.—The deaths in London in the week ending Saturday, the 16th, were in the week ending last Saturday to 1116. In the ten years 1859-68 the average number of deaths in the corresponding week was 1040. Of the 1116 deaths in the present returns approximate closely to the average rate of mortality at the season of the year. The deaths of persons above the age of 60 years; two widows died aged respectively 98 and 99 years; and two spinsters, aged 94 and 95 years, died.

IN THE COURT OF BANKRUPTCY last Saturday was presented a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy on behalf of Mr. John Hullah, the well-known musical professor, who is described as a Barrister at Hall, and 3, Langham-street, Portland-place, bookseller. Adjudication was made, but on petition to annul it, on the 19th of June, 1866, now in the train to the feet, suggests:—"If everybody who has directly or indirectly benefited by Mr. Hullah's labours in the services rendered by Mr. Hullah were to give a trifle, if it were only the two-hundredth part of a year's income, a fund might be raised sufficient to relieve the necessities of the present and digest to establish himself in a first-rate West-end musical establishment."

THE CASE OF THE MURDERED BABY AND HOB LANE.—Highstreet, Shoreditch, was the scene of a small riot on Saturday night. For some time past an attempt has been made to establish a fruiterer's shop in a shop early next on Saturday night. An agreement was entered into; but on Saturday night it was found that the shop had a larger stock than usual, the alleging that some of his neighbours had not kept to their bargain. A dense crowd collected round the shop, and a number of stones and other things were thrown in at Mr. Lloyd. The act of the police having been called in, seven persons were taken into custody, and were charged at the Worship-street Police Court, on Monday, with disorderly conduct and assaulting the constables in the business. There did not appear to be any charge against Mr. Lloyd, who has given a verbal promise to the same effect.—The secretary of the Early Closing Association, in a letter to the Home Secretary, claims Mr. Lloyd as a victim of the movement, and, of course, severely censures the conduct of the rioters.

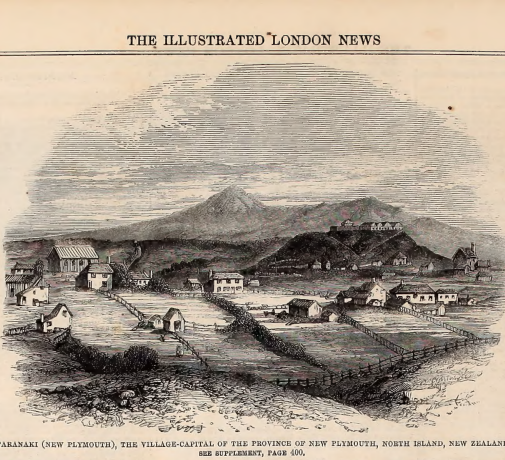
STREET RAILWAYS.—The Select Committee of the House of Commons on street railways in London occasioned considerable excitement at the meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works which was held on Saturday last. When the hall was crowded with deputations, who attended for the purpose of presenting memorials against the Bills, Mr. Cowper, M.P., who occupied a portion of the public residing in Baker-street, Edgware-road, and other localities interested in the Bills, was received with great handsomeness by the Duke of Portland and Lord Portman, made their appearance. They had a great deal to say about the Committee, but they had not much that they ought to take; and one of them intimated that if it was persisted in there would be a meeting of ratepayers at Mr. Lloyd's house, and, to make matters worse, discussion took place on a motion which was made, that the report recommending compliance with Mr. Train's proposals should be received. Ultimately the debate was adjourned.

RELIGIOUS SERVICES IN THE THEATRES.—On Sunday four of the metropolitan theatres were thrown open for special religious services for the working classes. At the Victoria Theatre the afternoon service was conducted by the Rev. F. Reid, of Greenwich, while that at the Surrey in the evening was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Lester, Incumbent of St. Luke's, Norwood. At Sadler's Wells the service was conducted in the afternoon being conducted by the Rev. Dr. Kenny, Incumbent of St. Andrew's, Well-street, and in the evening by the Rev. H. R. Ingram (Congregational). At the Standard Theatre, Shoreditch, the service was conducted by the Rev. J. Knapp, of Pertree; and at the Britannia Theatre, Hoxton, by the Rev. Newman Hall, of the Early Closing Congregationalist. In addition to the above theatres, opened under the auspices of the Early Closing Association, the Princess and Deseberry's Theatre were applied to the purpose of Divine worship by the Dissenters Alone, the sermon being preached by the Rev. William Landels, M.A. At St. James's Hall there were two services, conducted by the Rev. Samuel Macin and the Rev. Dr. Cumming.

CHARGE OF MURDER AGAINST A SHIP'S MATE.—Mr. W. B. Webb, the chief mate of the ship Beverly Hill, just returned from Australia, was charged at the Greenwich Police Court, by Thomas police constable, on the charge of murdering a seaman named Brown. According to the evidence of three of the crew, the deceased was ill on the 6th of August last, and when the ship was some twenty-four hours sail from the Island of Ascension, he went to the cabin to ask the captain to allow him to sail in the boat for a fresh supply. This he refused to do, whereupon Brown said that "if he did not he would have to be tied down." Mr. Webb, the first mate, thereupon immediately proceeded to his cabin for a pistol, and, on his return, shot Brown dead. The captain, it appeared, at the log-time, took the pistol away from Webb, and further, that Brown attempted to seize the captain, and was already to draw a knife when Mr. Webb interfered. The jury, after a short inquiry, declined to fill the witnesses examined, and the prisoner was discharged.

SOCIETY FOR THE RELIEF OF DISTRESS.—A letter in the Times announces the formation of a society having the following objects:—"1. To constitute a central board, or society, which shall differ both in fact and in principle from any existing society. 2. To relieve distress by the co-operation of all who have so excellent an organ in view. It would seek to relieve the poor by employment, and not by gifts of money, unless where the poor to help themselves, and try as far as possible to bring employer and employed together. 4. To encourage thrift, and to discourage the present system of known impurity and high position that the public will not hesitate to support the undertaking. 5. That the most our point not to give but to assist, and to enforce which your powerful advocacy would mount to our cause. 6. That the society should not be a rival to existing charities, but rather supplementary to help, in conclusion, state that these details it is impossible to say before it is known what hopes seem to be in a position to assist the society. Engineers who will address themselves to H. A. H., City of London Club, E.C.; or R. N., Melton Club, Pall-mall; or W. D. B., Essex Library, 20, Old Bond-street."

The Dean of Down, D.D., Thomas Woodward, has published the declaration of the Catholics of Downpatrick by refusing to permit an Orange sermon to be preached to the Orange lodges of Lecale in that sacred edifice on the approaching 5th of November.



LITERATURE.

THE LIFE OF GEORGE FOX, THE FOUNDER OF THE QUAKERS. By the Rev. JOHN SELBY WATSON, M.A., M.R.S.L. Saunders and Otley.

Recent events have shown very decidedly that the sect which is popularly called Quakers is on the decline. The peculiar observances and characteristics of the body, which at one time were so strictly adhered to as to have formed essentials of their creed, have, in solemn conclave, been voted incompatible with the feelings and tendencies of the present generation; and the constant revolt of members in these matters has been admitted as proving the necessity of a relaxation of rules which, valuable and powerful for certain objects, in the earliest times of the existence of the Society of Friends, have now become practically obsolete, if they do not rather militate against the preservation of the inner system of a class of religionists who have won a name for excellence and purity of life unattained by almost any other. Several works having Quakerism for their subject have been published within the last year or so; and now we have, with a certain appropriateness, a life of the founder of the society, which we are assured is fully and impartially related on the authority of his own journal and letters and the historians of his own sect. The chief object with which the biography has been composed is stated to be, to show how much may be effected by the resolute perseverance of one man, notwithstanding opposition, danger, insult, ridicule, and vexation of every kind. The narrative is not intended either to favour the Quakers or to throw undue contempt or censure upon them. I simply relates the fortunes of their founder, as they appear in his own pages, or in those of the historian of his own sect, among whom are Crosse, Sewel, and Gough. A few, but only a few, notices of Fox's assistant preachers are introduced, because the adventures of each of them so nearly resemble those of their leader that one story tells almost all. They all adopted Fox's tenets, and all suffered similar persecution for the dissemination of them. Nevertheless, the occasional references to some of his followers are not among the least interesting parts of the books. The singular mode in which Samuel Eccles manifested his adhesion to Quakerism, and his contempt for other religions; the moving of John Stubbs, Henry Fell, and Richard Costrop, to go towards China and Prester John's country; and their actual setting out for the East, getting as far as Alexandria, and the impediments which stopped them on their way; the journeying of George Robinson to the Holy Land; and of Mary Fisher to Constantinople "to admonish the Sultan Mahomet IV.;" and other adventures of the like kind, have an air of romance about them—we will not say of spiritual Quixotism, which is very notable; and this sort of statement is so woven into the narrative as not to interrupt, that, on the whole, to forward and illustrate it. The account of the birth and parentage of George Fox, of the rise and progress of his peculiar tenets in his mind, his notions of a Church, his imprisonments, the remarkable applications for his release, the dissemination of Quakerism, his interviews and intercourse with Cromwell, his adventures during the time of Charles II., his voyage to the West Indies and America, and his visit to Holland in company with Penn and Barclay, his labours generally in the pursuit of the object of his life, his last illness and death, are carefully told, without pretension, but with a fulness and precision which bespeaks accuracy; while the style which Mr. Watson has adopted is strikingly coincident with and appropriate to the subject-matter of the book, which, whether as a record of the founder of a sect, which will probably ere long be absorbed into the colourless uniformity of modern population, or as a contribution to a singular phase of contemporary history, will, we think, be received with favour by every class of the reading public, who will only find in it so much doctrinal statement as is necessary to the development of character and the exigences of the narrative. Of the special interest of the book we think there can be no doubt. The characteristics of early Quakerism, and the immediate effects of the extraordinary energy, enthusiasm, and activity of Fox, are every way remarkable. His converts, with the exception of Penn and Barclay, were mostly of the humbler and more illiterate classes of mankind; and yet professors of his creed have held a place apart in the world, second only to that of Judaism, and have continued from generation to generation, until they have reached the verge of that moral maelstrom, the nineteenth century, into which so many things singular by means of external characteristics and peculiar observance are gradually being swept. However strictly the Quakers have adhered to their religious doctrines and tenets as regards distinctions of dress and the furniture and decoration in their houses, they have little by little receded from the rules and practices of their forefathers, and ere long, as individuals to be marked in the crowd of their fellow-men, they will probably entirely disappear. Something of this may be owing to an approach on the part of the generality of mankind to an abstract admission of some of their morality; but more is no doubt due to the practical antagonism of the bulk of their tenets to the ways of the work-o'-day world into which the Society of Friends is in rapid progress of absorption.

SPECIMEN VOLUME OF A PROPOSED COMPLETE EDITION OF EXISTING PUBLIC STATUTES. Edited by JAMES BIGG. Simpkin and Marshall.

It is a presumption of law that every man is acquainted with the law as it exists—that is to say, no English citizen can plead ignorance of the existence of a statute as an answer to his having come under its penalties, which is absurd. The debates in Parliament, pamphlets, reports of commissions, and discussions in newspapers, have by this time pretty well informed the public as to what is the condition of that collection of laws which in familiar and picktooth phrase is called "The Statute-book." The present volume is making familiar approach towards the Statute Law. It contains a collection of the public statutes relating to the general law of England passed by the seventeenth Parliament of the United Kingdom, with an explanatory preface, tables of all the public statutes passed during each Session, a register of public statutes amended, and indexes to English statutes. The immediate purpose of its publication is to submit for examination the plan of composition proposed for a permanent issue of volumes of the like nature; and it is meant to ask the questions—first, whether such a plan will render the Statute-book more intelligible? and, secondly, will the arrangements for its publication make the statutes more accessible to the public? Such an attempt demands favourable consideration; and, as the facts stated in the explanatory preface go so far to prove the hopelessness of any efforts on the part of the Government to attain the end in view, it is worth while to see whether it cannot be gained by the exertions of private enterprise.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1860.

THE semi-official announcement on the part of the Emperor of the French that, as regards the Italian question, he assumes to act simply as Moderator, and that he allies himself neither with the party of revolution nor of despotism, but intends that events shall take their own course without intervention by other foreigners, has created at an opportune moment. It can scarcely be said to oppose itself, by anticipation, to whatever dynastic dogmas may be promulgated from Warsaw, inasmuch as the three Sovereigns who meet there had taken pains to assure France that nothing in their deliberations would be offensive to her interests. But it formally recognises the work which is now being done in the south, and talks of an organised and powerful Italy as an institution that would be for the benefit of Europe. It would seem that the Emperor "tries back" as it were upon the policy of Zurich; but in the interval the situation to the Pope to be entirely forgotten? Meantime Austria has broken the treaty, by marching soldiers over the boundary; and, unless she means to act decisively, has placed herself in a position of disadvantage, of which, should need arise, France will not be slow to avail herself. The Neapolitans declare, by universal suffrage, that they decide upon becoming subjects of Victor Emmanuel; the troops of Francis II. have again retreated; the new King is rapidly advancing; and, to all appearance, the Venetian and Roman questions remain questions of the Pope—is free. It is something to live in an age when one can write those words of the land of Virgil and of Dante.

Louis Napoleon has permitted a great license of scolding to the French press, perhaps from the logical consideration that, while the Pope indulged himself in such a passion of abuse, his subordinates in the Church had a right to be moved to sympathising wrath. But everything has its limits, and the Gazette de Lyons has been so preemptorily suppressed in its echoes of the Vatican, that the Emperor has suddenly stopped the clerical trumpet altogether. English journalists, of course, are opposed to this kind of dealing with any paper which does not actually offend against public morals; but it is impossible not to admit that the Lyons press have spared their fate. Either by way of reprisals, or in impotent rage that the sword of the Eldest Son of the Church is not to be drawn against his Sardinian brother, the Pope has called away his Nuncio from Paris—rather a marked excommunication of dissentsem. In the Sardinian Chapel in London prayers for the King have been discontinued, and, in short, the Churchmen, who were a little time ago so very anxious to fawn upon the swordsmen, have taken up an attitude of universal scilt.

Our Queen, safe at Windsor, resumes Cabinet Councils. The Premier's reception at Leeds has been as gratifying to the veteran statesman as his capital oratory has been to his hearers. From America we learn that the Prince of Wales has been received in New York in a way that eclipsed all previous manifestations in his honour, and that the enormous Broadway was one mass of spectators of his entrance, whose cheers were something portentous. He had reviewed the Militia—and, simple as is the phrase, what a suggestiveness there is in it. American Militia once more reviewed by a Prince of the house of Brunswick! As for certain Militia reviewed by a comparatively small numbers of low people at Richmond and elsewhere, it is really scarcely worth mention. There is no city in which there is not a gang of riffraff, whose brutalities one would as soon think of connecting with the people as one would charge the riots at St. George's-in-the-East upon British Protestantism. The more elaborate spite of some silly Irishmen, who declined to join in the hospitalities of the Republicans, is merely ludicrous, as most Hibernian heroics just now are fated to be—we add that the respectable Irish population in the States repudiate the antics of their countrymen. The Prince's most successful tour in America closes with a splendid scene, which alone it would have been worth his while to cross the Atlantic to witness.

In less than a fortnight the new President will have been chosen, and the result of the election in the "keystone" State, Pennsylvania (which has twenty-seven votes in the Electoral College), is thought to be almost decisive in that. Abraham Lincoln's favour, though New York is still regarded with wistful eye by Mr. Breckenridge's friends. England's interest in the election is considerable, inasmuch as the former gentleman represents the moderate views of this country in reference to the "domestic institution," while the latter would call for the Presidency of the South. We have a right, therefore, to express our hope that "honest Abe," as it seems his admirers familiarly call him, will be elected on the 9th.

Mr. Frederick Peel has joined the Ministry as Secretary to the Treasury, in the room of Sir Hugh Cairns. Mr. Moffat, Liberal, has been returned, unopposed, for Honiton. Elsewhere there has been a good deal of speechification, good and bad. At a Conservative gathering at Hinckley, Major Beresford and Mr. Duncan were earnest in their admiration of Garibaldi, and in their detestation of logic for the permanent freedom of Italy. The Solicitor-General has been laying the first stone of a "Primitive Methodist Chapel." A county vacancy has been caused by the succession of Lord March to the dukedom of Richmond, on the demise of his gallant and much-beloved father. Hastings is the offensive to the Conservative "well-conserved" district, but in some of the boroughs now vacant there will be determined battles. From the appalling accounts of the decay which is wasting the walls of the new Palace of Westminster it may be permitted to us to fear that the Houses of Parliament will not be ready for meeting in, unless the most resolute measures are promptly taken. We do not discuss here whether sopisos or anything else in the specific way is the article wanted, but it is shocking to hear that you can scratch away the front of the House very easily with a nail. Not so built the blinded Egyptians who raised the Pyramids: French cannon, trying to batter an opening, were harmless against the work of the decorated heathens.

It was announced one morning that Sweden had entirely done away with passports, and we applauded the step. Next day came a Norwegian, who claimed for his country the honour of having preceded Sweden in the reform. The day after a Dane stood forth, and declared that Denmark was the first of all to get rid of the system of folly, jobbery, and bureaucracy—namely, that of requiring persons coming to, or passing out of a country they wished to enter, but which perpetually makes it troublesome for honest people to travel. The North, as usual, takes the lead in the march of enlightened action.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

St. Mark's Church, Dursley, having been enlarged, principally through the exertions of Mr. R. Yard, was reopened on Tuesday week by the Bishop of Gloucester.

The Rev. Henry Dennis has been presented, on resigning the incumbency of Ingoldisthorpe, Norfolk, with a gold pencil-case and a purse of sixty guineas.

Two memorial windows are to be immediately erected in Gloucester Cathedral. The first is to the memory of Mrs. Evans, a lady lately residing near Gloucester. The second is erected by Lady Dewy.

The parish church of Lyndhurst, in the New Forest, was reopened on Tuesday week by the Bishop of Winchester, after the rebuilding of the greater portion of the edifice from designs by Mr. Ferrey.

The Bishop of Oxford presided at a meeting in Oxford on Tuesday week in behalf of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. The Bishop of California spoke as considerable length in favour of the mission.

St. Clement's Church, Ipswich, which has been for some time undergoing restoration, was reopened for divine service on Tuesday by the Bishop of Norwich and the Rev. James Bardsley, of St. Ann's, Manchester, who have kindly lent additional aid to the parochial clergy.

A new window, by Clayton and Bell, designed by Mr. Street, has been placed at the east end of the south aisle of the choir of Oxford. The subject is an embodiment of the idea of Christian worship, as seen by St. John in the Apocalypse.

The Chancellorship of St. Paul's Cathedral has become vacant by the death of the Rev. Henry Somers, M.A., who had held it eighteen years, having been appointed to it in 1842 by the late Bishop Blomfield. There is no endowment attached to the Chancellorship, the duties of which are little more than honorary.

The Convocation of the Prelates and Clergy of the Province of Canterbury was duly opened in the Jerusalem Chamber, Westminster, by the Vice-General, Dr. Travers Twiss, under a commission from the Queen to the Most Reverend Archbishop Longley, Primate of all England and Metropolitan, pursuant to the Royal writ, issue Wednesday, Nov. 7.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. R. W. Browne, Professor of Classical History in King's College, London, and Rector of Bucknell, Oxfordshire, to be Archdeacon of Lincoln.—The Rev. C. L. Exham to Wiesto Gunn; Rev. R. Bartholomew to Hartorton, near Ludlow; Rev. J. Bowdler to Acton Burnell, Shropshire.—The Rev. J. W. Bloch to St. Dunstan-in-the-East, City: Rev. H. L. Gilbert to St. Paul, Dalkeith.—Rev. T. Humphreys to Bullington, Chester; Rev. H. Linton to St. Paul's, Stirling.—Rev. J. G. H. Stracford to Potterne, Wilts.—Guardian.

EXTRAORDINARY SCENE IN A CHURCH.—The Sussex Express states that on Sunday week, while the Curate of St. Nicholas Church, Guildford, was preaching, he made a sudden pause and exclaimed, "I feel that heat!" The gentlemen to whom it was addressed replied, "It's the Bible;" but the appeal was strengthened by the more pointed remark that the pulpit was on fire. At length the preacher advised Mr. —— to shut the book immediately, upon which the gentleman took up his books and left the crowded building, accompanied by his wife.

THE COURT.

The Queen has received their Imperial Highnesses the Grand Duke Michael and the Grand Duchess Frederowna of Russia at Windsor Castle this week. Their Imperial Highnesses arrived at the Castle at two o'clock on Monday, having travelled by a special train on the Great Western Railway. Viscount and Viscountess Hardinge left town on Wednesday for Mr. Beckett's seat near Leeds, where the noble Viscount and Viscountess intend to stay until to-day (Saturday).

Lord and Lady Overstone and the Hon. Miss Copley have arrived in town from Folkestone, after passing more than three months at that watering-place.

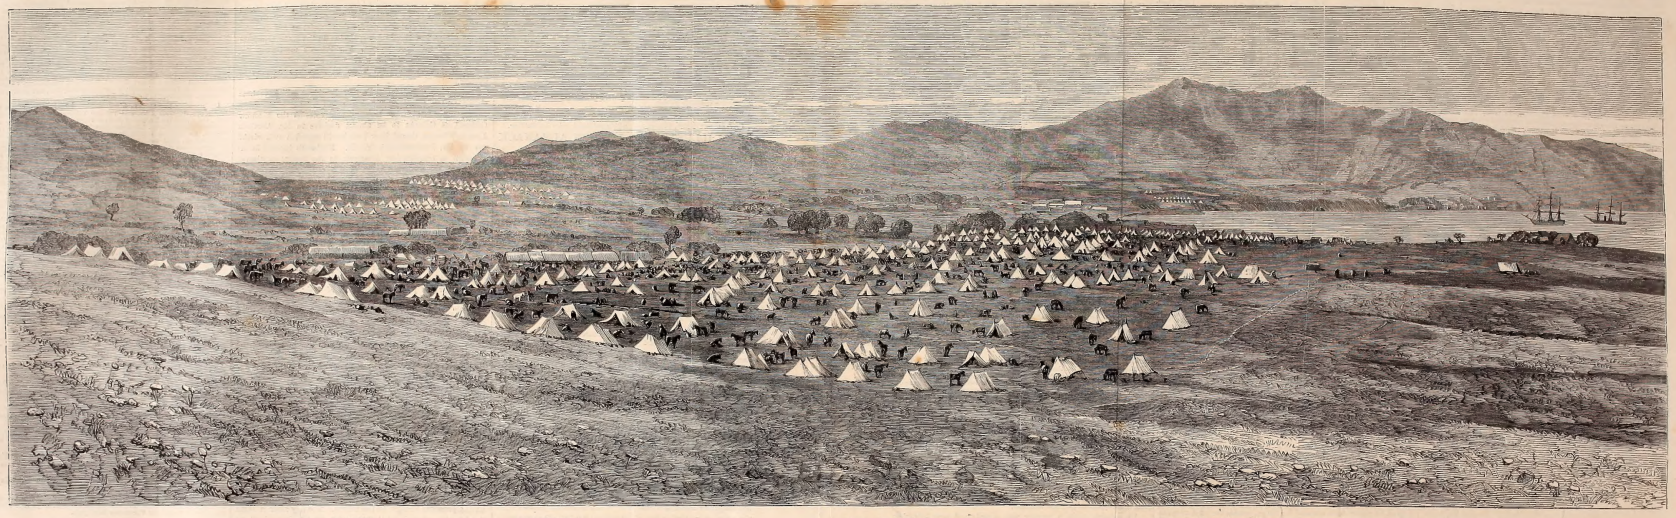
Lord Stanley, M.P., arrived in St. James's-square on Friday night from Knowsley. The Earl of Derby is progressing favourably towards recovery.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer left town on Saturday for Hewarden Castle, Cheshire.

A marriage is arranged to take place between Mr. Charles Bolfour, of Newton Don, in Berwickshire, and the Hon. Augusta Barrington, daughter of Viscount and Viscountess Barrington.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The Rev. David Laing, M.A., Rector of St. Olave, London, and also residing at Bonnington-road, St. Leonard's, has made his will on 8th of December, 1857, whereon he appointed his wife the sole executrix, who duly proved the same in the Prerogative Court on the 14th of last month, under the value of £5,000. His property was sworn under £8000, besides which there are personal estates. He will and testament he has given to his wife the sum of £1000 per every description to his wife for her own sole use. He has constituted in his will a number of testamentary wishes, but has left no legacy, for instance, a gold snuffbox and silver inkstand by the Sir Walter Scott Club, to remain clear and free from encumbrance by the Governor of Heriot's Institution, and a testimonial from the district of Trinity Chapel, Edinburgh, consistently with these gentlemen's request, to be given to his widow. This excellent and well-known clergyman was regarded generally as a man of great learning and piety, and for the last thirty-six years he filled the incumbent of Trinity Church, Haverstock-hill, and was formerly Chaplain to the Lord Provost of Edinburgh. The Rev. Robert Barbour, London: this latter living he only held for the term of three years, having died on the 14th of August last, in the sixty-fourth year of his age.



The Right Honourable James Wilson, P.C., Chancellor of the Indian Exchequer, and a member of the Supreme Council at Calcutta, &c., where he died on the 11th of August last, aged 55 years, has left a personal property of £90,000 (sic), passed the last of her Majesty's Court of Probate in London; consequently it is not at present in the power of the Editor. It has, however, been sworn to by the executors and trustees, three of whom are the brothers of the deceased. We have not hitherto published the names of the parties who are residing features of the contents of the will:—The widow appears to be amply provided for by settlement, and the daughters are also made testamentary legatees. The personal property in this country was valued at not exceeding £30,000. We may here remark that the deceased was a native of Hawick, and to this will, when it has become, as we have above said, a public instrument, we shall refer as a matter of interest to the natives of that locality.

Captain Joseph Cummiller, R.N., C.M.G., lately residing at Cliffonville, Margate, and late of Ramsgate, who died on the 11th of September last, has executed his will on the 11th of April, 1859, which was attested by Charles C. C. Forsyth, B.A., and Charles G. C. Mee, B.A. This testator's property is strictly that of a family disposition. He appointed three executors—namely, Mr. Nichols, of Ramsgate, Mr. Charles Forsyth, of Lincoln's-inn-fields; and W. F. Nichols, of Lombard-street. He bequeaths the residuary property of his £6000. To his relict, to his son, Joseph Cummiller, and to his daughters, &c. &c. even, the testator has merely life tenure of his daughters he gives the sum of £1000. To his younger son, Charles Cummiller, he gives the sum of £1000. To his younger son, Charles Cummiller, he gives the sum of £1000, and all his medals, naval drawings, maps, prints, &c. The testator gives the residue of his property to his wife and children, share and share alike. The above-named Frederick Forsyth, share and share alike. This gallant Captain has directed that his funeral shall be conducted by the Rev. Lord St. George (as he is returned, in the usual manner, to the proper authorities.

FATAL ACCIDENTS IN COLLIERIES.—On Tuesday three persons were killed, and two injured, at Cramlington Colliery, which were working in the Bear-moor Colliery at Cowgreaves, in the parish of Rowley Burn, South Tynedale, Northumberland. A body of coal took down at the same time, instantly.—On Wednesday an accident, which resulted in the death of two persons occurred at the Llangennech Anthracite Works, Swansea. A new engine had been recently laid down, but, as a more powerful supply of water was necessary, two men and a boy were sent down the same pit to assist in repairing in constructing a cistern at the bottom of a shaft. Bishop was about to descend to the shaft, requesting one of the men to go with him, when the latter, seeing by which the descent was to be made caught one of the nuts of the coupling-box, the result of which was that the cage fell to the bottom, killing Bishop instantly, and their bodies so frightfully mangled that they died shortly afterwards.—A fatal accident occurred at the Ramstone Colliery, near Alcester, Warwickshire, on Tuesday. The pit was flooded with water from the workings in the neighbourhood; and at least five feet, it is supposed, one and boys in the at the time the alarm was given there were about forty people in the pit when the water workings. Some forty of them were working on the bottom of the shaft—had come in upon them, and they at once made for the bottom of the shaft—a rush, unfortunately, which proved disastrous to many, as the darkness and the rush of the water overpowered them. Efforts were at once made to raise the men to the mouth of the pit, but so rapidly did the water rise that before the whole forty could be got out—and nearly all the rescued were carried to the cage and saved themselves up, they had to cling to the upper portion of the pit, men saved after the water had reached within a few feet of the mouth. The extent of the mischief, which had been wrought by the irruption of the waters, it is all but certain, will be further defined by the following.

MUSIC.

The "run" of "Robin Hood" at HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE continues to be as great as ever. Every night of its performance the house is crowded to the doors, and not a place can be had in any part of it unless it is previously engaged. Who will say, after this, that the English public run after foreign music and foreign performers to the neglect of our own? For our part, we have never observed a foreign opera or other music work applauded that was worthless, on our first-hand recollection neglected that had real merit. The common cry about "native talent" is a species of cant, the prevalence of which in England is by no means confined to the present day. The immense success of this work of a native composer, acted and sung by native performers, has for the time thrown into the shade the Italian performances at the same theatre. Even the masterpieces of MOZART and VERDI, supported by the transcendent talent of TITIENS and Giuglini, do not at present "draw" as "Robin Hood" does. The next novelty at this house is to be WALLACE'S "Amber Witch," which we believe, is now in preparation.

AT COVENT GARDEN Miss Pyne and Mr. Harrison are giving their favourite pieces of last season—"Lucia" and "Maritana"—to "Crown Diamonds."

On last opera there was proposed, in order to balance the attraction at the other house. Balfe is employed upon an opera for this theatre, which, we cannot but think, might be more profitably before this time.

A society has been formed for the purpose of giving what they call Philharmonic Concerts for the People. The performances are given at Exeter Hall, and consist partly of sacred and partly of miscellaneous music, both vocal and instrumental, at the moderate rate of admission (with the exception of somewhat higher prices for stalls and reserved seats) to only a shilling the unit. The orchestra near the orchestra is only a single one, but of considerable amount, executive, and other musical; the chorus, which is said to be "the People" on easier terms than his hitherto been, is not large, but yet the performances have not been inefficient or well attended; but we cannot, at present, form any opinion as to the future success of the undertaking.

We observe from the Bristol papers that Mr. and Mrs. Endersohn are giving their clever and lively musical entertainment, "The Two Bridges" there, with great success. Mr. Endersohn, as a musician, we have always considered very clever.

Mr. Balfe has been engaged by Mr. and Mrs. Wood to write a new opera for the Princess's Theatre, which is to be produced before this time.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.—We have only to report progress in this theatre. All the members continue to do their best in the light and grave business of the season commences; and, in "The Gamin of Speculation" and "Little Toddlekins," appears in his well-known character, "Poor Jack," called "Charley Bell," which has met with success to him.

It has previously been played, we understand, in the United States. The last piece is a Mr. Peter Goldwyn, who creates a romantic desire for an intrigue, and successively makes his own wife the object of it. The latter engages her walking-woman (Mrs. Charles Mathews) to wheedle him on the point; and out of his perplexities the interest of the action arises. Mr. Mathews is very successful in realising the strongest confusion and amusement in the part.

LYCEUM.—Miss Gougenheim, naturally desirous of establishing a reputation on the London boards, has appeared in a piece called "

NATIONAL SPORTS.

FINE weather, and abundance of horses and visitors, have brought the legitimate racing year to a satisfactory close at the Newmarket Houghton. Summerside won the Cambridgeshire Course Plate as easily on Monday that many fancied she had a chance for the great race. The Woolwiches 100 to 1 demonstration against Dolcibella, after the trial, had been so decided that—impossible as it would seem that one and the same stable could win the Cesarewitch in a trot, and have the last act contained within no very light weight, and made an equal certainty of the Cambridgeshire—the belief in the daughter of Weatherbit grew stronger and stronger, and at the post it was only 2 to 1 against her; about Golden Pippin there was considerable mystery, which "Lord Frederick's" movements did not tend to dispel. It was all over Newmarket on Tuesday morning that she had been poisoned, and then the rumour was modified into an attack of colic. Whether she were to be backed or not, and why, with 8 st 12 lb on her, and finished about sixth, along with Thunderbolt and Prelude. The latter was immensely fancied by the Whitewall stable on the Monday night, but not even weights with Cape Flyaway and Thunderbolt's clever defeat of Revoke Duchess at 2-lbs, earlier in the afternoon, could him some adherents. The jockeys rebelled outright at the pace. Invasion did Admiral Rous credit in front of them with Prelude's suspension if they did not pay more attention to himself and Mr. Marshall. Break away they would, and, at last, the word was given when twenty-six were well in line, and Moorcock, Fredeerovna, and Australian Maid (who had been unfortunate Swordsman) were not even in the betting. The race was a fair start of it, and the phalanx kept well together till near the old site of the Duke's wall, where England and Moorcock first turned to post account the rib, penalty on Folkestone, and beat him just as he liked. The latter was pretty well out of form, and Mr. Merry's Will Do Better was all he could accomplish. Pretendant gave France a turn in a 400 Plate, and Mr. Stanford backed his favourite to a little Quinine Selling Stakes with a spirit and determination which the result justified. Tom Bowline had not a ghost of a chance in his thousand guinea a-side match with Umpire, who had been in the stable when he licked. The early period for publishing the weights did nothing for the Woolwich Infantry, as only 2 lb and 3 lb were added to the pair for the Turpentine Hunt, on Monday; the Worcester, on Tuesday and Wednesday; and Stone-on-Severn, on Thursday, are the last meetings for next week.

The Black Doctor, who was originally purchased by Mr. Saxon as a two-year-old from John Osborne, for 110 guineas, was sold at Tattersall's last Monday for 30 gs. Underhand has been sold for 500 gs.; and Quintus for the market.

The coming meetings for next week are as follows:—Cuckington Club on Monday &c., Ashdown Park on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday; O on Tuesday, &c., North of England (Newcastle) and Diamor St. Leger on Wednesday, &c., and Ridgway Club (Lytham) on Thursday and Friday; and Epsom Summer Meeting is announced to be sold in London at the end of next month.

Tom Bowline's winner was attended by severity hunting-men. The Duke of Manchester was in the chair, and the cup and £300 were presented in due course, and very feelingly acquitted of. The money is, we believe, to be invested in Great Northern shares, and £200 still remains to be collected. The Durham county subscribers have been not a little stirred by the needs of their Northern Tom. There was a very leaping figure in the recent bound show at Middlesborough, where he won the silver flask for old dog hounds, with Splendour.

MR. GLADSTONE, in a letter to the Sunderland Conservative Society, states that the negotiation in which he is now engaged in Paris do not embrace the question of the French occupation of Roman territory, which remains wholly unaffected by the provisions of the commercial treaty."

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BATTLE OF LEIPSIC.—At Munich, on the 18th, the anniversary of the battle of Leipsic was celebrated by the assembling of a great number of persons in the gardens of the Hofbrau, where they drank to the King of Bavaria, the ex-King Louis, and "the veterans of the heroes of independence." In the King of Wurtemberg's absence, the commemorated by telegraph to the latter, and his Majesty sent the following reply by the same means:—"The King of Wurtemberg thanks the meeting now being held to celebrate the memory of the battle of enfranchisement at Leipsic for having remembered him on the occasion." The anniversary of the battle of Leipsic was celebrated in most of the towns of Prussia and Bavaria by processions and banquets. At Berlin the 18th of October is particularly brilliant at Augsburg, Nuremberg, and Bamberg, which were all illuminated. Similar manifestations took place in different towns in the Grand Duchy of Baden.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

ALTHOUGH only about £50,000 in gold has been withdrawn from the Bank of England on fresh account, there has been a marked absence of anything like speculative or money business in the market for Home Securities. The operations are confined to the purchase of investments for cash, on account for gold on Continental account; hence they anticipate a further severe drain, even if the Bank's resources, and, consequently, the rate of the value of money for discount purposes. The adverse movement in the rate of exchange is as follows:—The quotations being 109 to 109 to-day as yesterday, that very little gold will reach us from that quarter for some time. Considering that the value of the bullion now on passage from Australia is only about £600,000, and that the whole of the importations continue to be purchased immediately on arrival, it seems evident that no additions will be made to our available supplies during the next month or six weeks.

The demand for Money, this week, has fallen off to some extent; nevertheless, the rates of discount are maintained in very instance; and we may observe that the business now being done upon long-dated paper with considerable caution. In Lombard-street, and at the large discount houses, the quotations rule as under for the last week:—

	Per cent.		Per cent.
Short Bills	3½ to 3¾	Four Months' Bills	3¾ to 4
Three Months' Bills	3¾ to 4	Six Months' Bills	4 to 4½

The Directors of the Bank of England have made no change in their minimums. In the Stock Exchange money is plentiful at 2½ per cent, and the Bank continues to receive it at 2 per cent.

A meeting of the holders of Central American Bonds has been held to consider the proposition of the Salvador Government that Salvador to extinguish its debt, which, with interest, amounts to £79,472. The proposition is to issue £100 of new bonds for every £100 of old, and to pay 1841 of November, 1860; £200 in November, 1861; and £19,000 in November, 1862.

The Council of the Oriental Bank have declared a dividend for the half-year at 14 per cent per annum. The dividend of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company for the half-year is at the rate of 10 per cent.

The Credit Foncier, in Paris, have succeeded in raising a loan of £1,400,000 in a few days.

Shares in the newly-formed companies have sold as follows:—London Marine Insurance has been done at 1½ to 2 prem.; Thames and Mersey Marine, 12-10-6d to 15 prem.; Universal Life Assurance, 1 to 2 to 3 prem.; London and Provincial Marine, 6 to 8 to 10 dis.; and East India Irrigation, 4 dis. to par.

The annexed return shows the state of the note circulation in the United Kingdom during the four weeks ending September 29, current and last year:—

Bank of England	£21,488,365
Private banks	2,855,284
Joint-stock banks	2,595,991
England	£26,939,640
Ireland	6,149,377
Total	£33,089,017

Compared with the same period in 1859 the above return shows a decrease of £267,164 in the circulation of the Bank of England, and an increase of £1,000 in the circulation of the United Kingdom.

The following are the prices ruling for Home and Indian Securities on Monday as only moderate. However, on the whole, prices were well supported:—Consols, 93¼ to ¾ for Account; Ditto for Money, 93¼ to ¾; Ditto, New, 93¼ to ¾; Ditto, for Account, 93¼; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 93¼; Long Annuities, 14¼; Bank Stock, 215 to 217; India Stock, 215 to 217; India Bonds, 2s to 1s prem.; Exchequer Bills, 2s prem. to discount. The transactions on the following days were by no means numerous:—Tuesday, Consols were done at one-eighth better; Reduced Three per Cents, 94¼; Consols, 93¾ ¼; New Three per Cents, 94¼; Ditto, Four per Cent Enfaced Paper, 79; Ditto, Five per Cent Ditto, 101; Bank Stock, 216 to 217; India Stock, 216 to 217; India Bonds, 2s to 1s prem.; Exchequer Bills, 2s prem. to 2s dis. On Thursday prices had an upward tendency:—Consols, 93¾ ⅞; Reduced and New Three per Cents were done at 93¾ to 94; for the Account, 93¾ ⅞; the Reduced and New Three per Cents were 94¼; Enfaced Paper, 79; Ditto, Five per Cent Ditto, 101; Bank Stock, 216 to 217; India Ditto, 221; Ditto, New Loan, 104½; Ditto, Five per Cent Enfaced Paper, 101; Exchequer Bills, 2s prem.

In the Foreign House the dealings have been only to a moderate extent; nevertheless, the prices current are supported, and there appears to be rather a tendency to undergone very little change, compared with last week. The leading quotations were as follows:—Brazilian Five per Cents, 1829, 103; Ditto, Four per Cent Small, 86½; Ditto, 1839, 86; Buenos Ayres Six per Cents, 1857, 103; Ditto, Four per Cent Deferred, 73; Chilian Six per Cents, 1853, 107; Ditto, Four per Cent Deferred, 73; Danish Five-and-a-Half per Cents, 1857, and 1859, 103; Ditto, Five per Cents, 1854, 101; Ditto, Three per Cents, 1853, 70; Russian Five per Cents, 1864; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 1822, 93; Ditto, Four per Cents, 1849, 92; Ditto, Four per Cents, 1859, 92; Ditto, New Deferred, 40; Ditto, Consolidated Certificates of Coupon, not funded, 87; Portuguese Four per Cents, 1853, 44; Ditto, Four per Cents, Converted per Cents, 1861; Venezuela Three per Cents, 29; Ditto, One-and-a-Half per Cents, 1861; Venezuela Three per Cents, 29; Ditto, One-and-a-Half per Cents, 13; Ditto, Active Bonds, 1860, 19; Ditto, Passive Bonds, 1860, 4.

An increased amount of business has been transacted in Joint-stock Bank shares. Bank of London, 52½ ½; Bank of Egypt, 13½; Bank of Australasia, 39½ (marked 41); Bank of Egypt, 13½; Bank of London, 51; British North American, 42½; Chartered Mercantile, 20½; Colonial, 87½; Commercial of Canada, 22½; Commercial of London, 21½; London Chartered of Australia, 21; London and Westminster, 6½; London Joint-stock, 17½; London and South-Western, 69; Oriental, 47; Provincial of Ireland, 84½; Union of Australia, 41½; and Union of London, 31½.

In the value of Colonial Government Securities very little change has taken place. New South Wales Five per Cents realised 102½ ¾; Ditto, Four-and-a-Half Five per Cents, 1888 and upwards, 93½; Nova Scotia Sterling Debentures, 107½; and Victoria Six per Cents, 1855, 107.

The Miscellaneous Market has ruled inactive, as follows:—Anglo-Mexican Mines, 5½ ¾; Australasia, 64½; Canada Land Company, 11½; Crystal Palace, 21½; Ditto, Preference, 106; Electric Telegraph, 99½; English and Australian Copper, 42½; Ditto, Chilian, 8½; Ditto, Spanish, 4; London Discount, 25½; General Omnibus, 18; Malleable Iron Works, 3½; National Discount, 2½; Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation, 96½; Royal Mail Steam Packet, 51; Red River Land and Mineral, 48; Peninsular and Oriental Steam, 78½; Ditto, New, 15½; Ditto, Deferred, 8½; Royal Mail Steam Packet, 51; Ditto, New, 15½; and West India, 192; Commercial, 104½; Waterloo-bridge, 2½; Regent's Canal, 49½; Ditto, New, 15½; Ditto, Debentures, 101; Ditto, Debentures, 1860, 100; Lambeth, 49; and Vauxhall, 4½.

Although the transactions in the Railway Share Market have been numerous, little or no change has taken place in the prices current since the commencement of week. A fall of one per cent can be taken place in the value of the shares of the Great Northern, the Great Western, and the London and North-Western Railway companies have been commenced against the company. The report of the directors will be presented to the shareholders on Thursday next, and a special meeting is convened for Friday.

ORDINARY SHARES AND STOCKS.—Caledonian, 92; East Anglian, 1½; Eastern Counties, 2½; Great Northern, 115; Ditto, A Stock, 117; Ditto, B Stock, 104; Great Western, 61½; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 103½; London, Brighton, 113½; London, Chatham, and Dover, 24½; London and North-Western, 101½; Ditto, Fifty Pound Shares, 50; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 12½; Midland, and Lincolnshire, 87½; Metropolitan, 2½; Midland, 123½; Norfolk, 144; North British, 70½; North-Eastern, Berwick, 92½; Ditto, Leeds, 92½; North Staffordshire, and Granthorn Railway and Canal, 8½; Scottish North-Eastern, Aberdeen Stock, 93½; South-Eastern, 88½; Shrewsbury and S. THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Oct. 22).—Our market, to-day, was very sparingly supplied with English wheat, and the trade ruled extremely dull, at a decline of 1s per quarter. Foreign quality, at very full prices; but other kinds moved off slowly, at irregular quotations. Although there was only a moderate supply of barley, the trade ruled dull, at 1s per quarter less money. Malting qualities was steady, and, in some instances, prices had an upward tendency. Floating cargoes of grain were in fair request, at full prices. The arrivals of wheat and barley into the Mersey, last week, were moderate. Oats and beans realised full prices, at 1s per quarter more money. Beans and peas realised quite last weeks currency, but the demand for the latter was extremely limited. Flour was in good request, at full prices.

LIVERPOOL.—Most English food supplies moved off sluggishly, at very full prices. All foreign articles were in good request, at full quotations.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 53s to 56s; ditto white, 56s to 57s; Norfolk and Lincoln, red, 52s to 55s; ditto white, 55s to 57s; Yorkshire, red, 52s to 55s; ditto white, 55s to 57s; Scotch, 52s to 55s; Northumberland, red, 52s to 55s; ditto white, 55s to 57s; Rhenish, 52s to 55s; Baltic, 52s to 55s; Barley, 34s to 36s; Chevalier, 36s to 38s; Peas, Grey and Maple, 36s to 38s; White, 36s to 38s; Boilers, 38s to 40s; Beans, Mazagan, 34s to 36s; Harrow, 36s to 38s; Tick beans, 40s to 42s; grey peas, 38s to 40s; maple, 42s to 44s; white, 42s to 44s; Oats, English, 24s to 26s; Scotch, 26s to 28s; Irish, 24s to 26s; Foreign, 22s to 24s; Flour, per barrel, 36s to 38s; Canadian, 36s to 38s per barrel; Indian, 30s to 32s; Spanish, 36s to 38s per sack.

Seed.—Clover and cloves seed have remained more attention, and prices have had an upward tendency. All other seeds have moved off slowly, at barely previous rates. Cakes and linseed were in fair demand.

Linseed, Baltic, crushed, 32s to 34s; Calcutta, 30s to 32s; Seasonal, 31s to 32s, per quarter; cakes, per ton, 12s to 13s per cwt; linseed, sowed seed, 56s to 58s; White mustard, 12s to 13s; Brown, 10s to 11s per bushel. English rapeseed, 42s to 44s per quarter; linseed cakes, English, £10 to £11 10s; foreign, £10 to £11 10s; rape cakes, £6 10s to £7; Canary seed, 60s to 62s per quarter; Hempseed, 36s to 38s; Coriander, 18s to 20s; Tares, 6s to 7s per bushel.

Wool.—The prices of wool remain unchanged.

Potatoes.—Fine qualities of potatoes are in good request, at full prices; but other kinds are very slow, at late rates. Yams, Cocoas, and Onions are in fair demand, at full prices.

Provisions.—Scarcely all kinds of Irish butter move off slowly, at fully last week's prices. Foreign qualities are in good request, at full rates. Bacon, last week's prices, is in moderate request. Hams are in fair demand, at full prices. Lard is rather dearer, and other kinds of provisions command very full prices.

Tallow.—Most kinds of tallow are in fair request, at late improvement. Town tallow, 33s to 34s per cwt.

Oils.—Linseed oil, £30 10s per ton, on the spot. All other oils move off steadily, at very full prices. Rape, £38 10s per ton; Cocoa-nut, £41 10s; Palm, £39 10s; Olive, £51 10s; Sperm, £91 10s.

Coals.—There is still a full supply of coals on hand, but the demand is very limited. Hetton, 17s 6d; Lambton, 17s 6d; Hartley, 17s 6d; Wylam, 17s 6d; Stewart, 17s 6d; Tanfield, 17s 6d; Tees, 17s 6d; Tyne, 17s 6d; Wear, 17s 6d; Hartley's

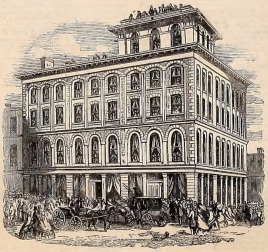
PASSING ENGLISH NARROWS.



STEAMING THROUGH THE ICE IN WIDE CHANNEL.

H.M.S. "TERMAGANT" CONVOYING THE GUN-BOATS "GRAPPLER" AND "FORWARD" THROUGH THE STRAITS OF MAGELLAN.—FROM SKETCHES BY C. ROYLE, R.N.

PASSAGE THROUGH THE STRAITS OF MAGELLAN.

THE gun-boats Grappler and Forward, 60-horse power, left Plymouth in August, 1859 for Vancouver's Island; but, on arriving at Monte Video, they were detained, in consequence of the disturbed state of Buenos Ayres and Uruguay, till the 4th of February in the present year, when they sailed, in company with the Termagant, 31-gun screw-frigate, for their original destination. The voyage down to the eastern entrance of the Straits of Magellan (under canvas) was necessarily slow and tedious, owing to the gun-boats being, like all vessels of their class, dull sailers.

On reaching the Straits, however, steam was got up by the Termagant, and the small vessels were towed by her through the entire length of the Straits of Magellan, Smyth, Sarmiento, Wide, and Messier Channels, out into the Pacific Ocean. In consequence of the intricate navigation in the above channels, it became necessary to anchor every night, as well as at other times, to cut firewood for the steamers, whose stock of fuel was nearly exhausted by so much steaming. Most of the anchorages were very remarkable for their picturesque beauty and the scenery in their neighbourhood, also for the abundance of firewood to be found close to the water's edge. The weather, nearly the whole of the passage, was extremely fine, and the view, as the three vessels steamed through the various channels, most striking; the snow-covered Andes, upwards of 5000 feet in height on the northern shore, and the barren-looking coast of Tierra del Fuego, likewise glittering with snow on the other side; the water covered with myriads of wild-fowl and studded with numerous islands, overgrown with the most luxuriant vegetation. At one of the prettiest of these places, English Narrows (as shewn in our Engraving) as well as in other parts of the Straits, canoes crowded with Fuegians came off to the ship to barter skins for ships' biscuit, tobacco, &c. A party of officers visited some of these savages at their encampment and were civilly received. On the arrival of the vessels at Wide Channel a large field of drift ice and two icebergs were passed, as shown in the Engraving.

VICTORIA HOUSE, THE RESIDENCE OF THE PRINCE OF WALES WHILST IN OTTAWA.

At Valparaiso the gun-boats excited much interest, being the first vessels of their class seen in the Pacific, and were visited by the Intendente and other authorities. After a month's refit at this place the three vessels proceeded for Vancouver's Island, where they arrived on the 12th of July, 1860—the Termagant having convoyed the gun-boats a distance of more than 11,167 miles, from the Rio De La Plata to Esquimalt Harbour, Vancouver's Island, between the 4th of February and the 12th of July.

THE VOLUNTEER GUARDS.

THE 32nd Middlesex Rifle Corps, known to the public as the "Six-foot Volunteer Guards," was established last February, with a view to meet the requirements of men whose stature, being so much above the average height, render their appearance in the ranks of ordinary-sized corps somewhat awkward, and who might otherwise be disinclined to join actively in this movement of national defence. More than one hundred and fifty gentlemen of the required standard, including several military officers and six-footers from other corps, have been enrolled: and, notwithstanding that their size is exceptional, we have no doubt that the "Volunteer Guards" will have doubled its present effective strength by next season. Excepting a field-day in the Regent's Park, the Queen's Review, and the sham fight, on which occasions they acquitted themselves in a manner which called forth general commendation, this corps has appeared but seldom in public, limiting their drill to St. George's Barracks and to Rangerford Hall, at which latter place it will be continued every Monday and Friday evening until December, when a general muster will take place to notify the winter arrangements.

We hear that auxiliary six-feet corps are forming in some of our provincial towns. Liverpool having taken the lead. They will have a truly British welcome whenever they may come up to headquarters in London.

THE ARSENAL AT NAPLES.—FROM A DRAWING BY S. READ.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE ARSENAL AT NAPLES.

THE dockyard and arsenal of Naples adjoin the Castel Nuovo and the Royal Palace. The arsenal was built by the Viceroy Medina in 1677. The Wet Dock, or Darsena, was begun, in 1688, from the designs of a Carthusian monk called Bonaventura Presti, who, having been a carpenter in early life, and acquired some knowledge of architecture, induced the Viceroy Don Pedro of Aragon to intrust to him the construction of a new dock. In spite of all circumstance, he persisted in carrying it on on the narrow site below the palace. During the progress of the work the accumulation of water proved too much for the engineering talents of the monk. The story is taught school-boys in a rhyme by Francesco Picchiatti, who completed the work with great skill. Considerable additions have been made to these works in recent years, particularly since the introduction of steam navigation. The Darsena now communicates with the Porto Militare, and through the latter with the sea.

TARANAKI, NEW ZEALAND.

THE provinces of New Plymouth, or Taranaki (its native name), the seat of war in New Zealand, is situated on the western coast of the North Island, or New Ulster, as it is sometimes called. There are scarcely any outlying settlements in this province, the inhabitants being nearly concentrated in the village capitals, as in the case of farms, sheep, and cleanings lying around it within a circle of ten or a dozen miles. The capital of Taranaki has been known since the earliest days of New Zealand; and, whether regard be had to the security of its climate or the fertility of its soil, it is surpassed by no province locally in either island. The town of Taranaki—which, according to the last accounts received from New Zealand, has been in a state of siege, and will be attacked by the natives, and of which we give an Engraving on page 386—is the chief, and indeed the only, town in the province, and, with the suburban hamlets of the Mill Road, Omata, and Tataramaka, may reckon about 3000 people; the majority residing on their own farms, within six miles of the town. The suburbs of the town, or rather village, slopes upward from the sea-beach, and, with its neat white houses, contiguous cultivation, and background of wood, forms a picturesque object. The streets are few and straight, and the houses, though for the most part only of wood, are generally roomy and comfortable. The site of the town is finely undulated, and commands a pleasing aspect. It has a substantial granite-built church, observatory chapels, an hospital, and a handsome barrack station. The village capital is sketched by Mr. Hutchinson in the following words:—"Regularly planted on the sea-shore, with its substantial and small gable huts, and watered by the Huirakei Mangotaki, and other tributaries, it displays its progress and wealth in its public halls and breweries, sash-fronted, post-offices, stores, and primitive shops; but affecting no 'town airs,' stands out before the world a robust, working village, from a cluster of cottages, the rural fair for the troops of rosy children, nursery-maids, tiny mutton, and dairies of Devonshire cottages. The appearance of the place can be seen in five weathers is very beautiful. The taste for syrian scenery and quiet nooks has been gratified by the occupation of the site, the broken, glen and valley, pasturage and rain fields dotted with cattle or yellow with corn: whilst for the Salvator-Rosa eye there is the giant snow-capped mountain, towering up from a sea of dark green bush to the brilliant sky." Mount Egmont, which forms no conspicuous an object in our Engraving, although not the highest, is certainly the most picturesque, remarkable, mountain in New Zealand; and may be seen from a vessel's deck, at a distance of 100 miles, from a clear sky and open horizon. It rises in a perfect cone, from a base thirty miles in diameter, to a height of 8190 feet above the sea, and presents nearly the same appearance on every side. Its lower region is clothed in the densest forest, is flattened, and is covered with perpetual snow for nearly a quarter of its entire elevation. Mount Egmont is about ten miles to the south of the town of Taranaki. The hill to the right near the town is Mount Taranaki, and the buildings on its top are the barracks.

PAH IN TARANAKI.

On the page containing the View of Taranaki is one of a pah, or fortified village, of the Maories (natives), in the Taranaki province, New Zealand. Records with isolated and rude forts, or pahs, refer to the different tribes places of refuge. On such hills they have built villages, which are fortified with palisades and ditches, and to these hill fortresses they return when pressed by their enemies. These village fortresses are called pahs, and, as recent events have shown, have arms and ready ammunition stored in them when so despised. The Pukekaroa Pah, so noted in the recent conflict in Taranaki, consisted of two stockades—one on the commanding point of the old pah of the same name, the other new, and apparently without intrenchments. They stand on a ridge formed by two small gullies. These gullies have a little below the pah, and on the level ground in the Waitara Valley, forming a sort of long Y, the small stream, its river, and the cultivations of the Ngatiawa Hurakhowes, in his work on New Zealand, thus describes the mode of life and domestic habits of the natives:—"The people usually lives together in little communities of from 50 to 200 individuals in various villages (pahs) scattered over their district. These villages depend on some hill or peninsula near the coast, or perched on some river's cliff, cover half an acre or two or three acres of ground, and sometimes are surrounded by a double two or three feet apart) of stout split paling, ten to twelve feet high, lashed with flax and strongest vines and occasionally with wire, entered by two or three narrow postterns, and divided by similar palings into numerous labyrinth-like passages, courts, and squares. Here we find built the houses—about ten-and-a-pole verandah-less, dovecot door, shed, or chimney, and displaying the husbands smoking on the floor. Here, too, are stored the fish, the Vegetables, and the rats and birds of man's house, and prechase a bell-decked wooden chapel. Here, too, is the larder—the fish-baskets and potatoes, and kumera, and taro, and roots, and berries, stowed aloft on shelves or poles away from rat and dog. Here, too, will congregate the hundred pests of the village—pigging with their shrillest cock, mewing with their mother, a goat or two, pet calves and foals, intrusive pigs, the mocking tui, caged bell-thrushes, and the large parrot of the bush. Here, too, and bewailing his fate in indignant screams, lies Hiwahiwa (teles raven." In several of the forest pahs are incursions of pilfers, with some formally with carved figures, executed with considerable skill, and probably having reference to the military exploits of their possessors.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE WAR IN CHINA.

THE last mail from China brought us particulars (given in our Journal last week) of the first operations of the combined English and French forces in China; and by the same mail we received sketches and photographs, by our Special Artist and others, in connection therewith, some of which are engraved in the present Number. On page 394 we have an Engraving, "The Heroine Gun-boat," with a shell on board, on its way to the Peiho." The text of the 15th Punishes at Pehtang describes the subject of another Engraving. A large pole with a green dragon (says our Special Artist) marks the spot where stood the Lin Ting Pagoda. This pagoda overturned, matted over—which can be rolled off by means of four strings that are made to down—the gallant officers may be observed, in every variety of picturesque attitudes, seated at a long table, either dispensing hospitality to their friends who call, or doing duty as officers. In the evening the scene is a charming one, pagoda lighted by Chinese lanterns and native dips in wonderful candlesticks. After partaking of a dinner with the officers of the ship, I took a stroll through the town in the sultry night. The coolies and darkies were seated in the open air doing the usual; and now and then we came upon a group of gamblers playing by the feeble light of a candle, while others were smoking or boiling opium." The British Encampment at Talien-wan, from photographs taken by M. Beato shortly before the breaking up of the camp at that place, is engraved on pages 389-391. We give, from various sources, some particulars of Talien-wan and of the rendezvous there of the allied forces:—

Talien-wan Bay, or more properly Talien Bay (for wan in Chinese means bay), may be described as a large inlet of the sea, measuring about eight to ten miles from north to south, and twelve to fourteen from east to west. It is open to the sea to the south-east, the entrance is twelve to thirteen miles across, and three small islets, called the Sau-Shan-tow Islands, lie in the entrance, about two miles from the shore, and form a natural breakwater against the force of the sea when rolling up into the bay during south-east winds. The south-east and north-west shores of the bay are steep and rocky, and in some parts perpendicular cliffs rise up from the water. On the west side, and in the south-east corner, the land slopes gradually to the sea, and forms a shelving beach. The shores of the bay are very much indented, running into a number of subordinate bays or harbours, the principal of which are Victoria Bay on the south-west, Hand Bay on the north-west, Buttard Cove in the south, on the west shore, and Odin Bay, a few miles to the south of the former. At all these places the anchorage and landing is good, and advantage was taken of them during the Chinese first campaign, as they afford different localities, by which arrangement crowding of the transports was avoided, and the troops landed, and a supply of water procured with greater facility. The 1st Infantry Division, under General Michel, was landed at Victoria Bay; the 2nd Division (General Napier's) at Hand Bay; the 1st Brigade of Buttard Cove; and the whole of the cavalry and artillery placed temporarily under General Michel, on the north-east side of Victoria Bay. The troops lived in bell tents, and the whole force was remarkably healthy. The commissariat department had the greatest difficulty in getting the ships in Victoria Harbour, a more convenient arrangement for communicating with the shore than the open roadstead, and every exertion should be made if head-quarters were on shore. Every morning a small steamer left Victoria Harbour at daylight, and proceeded from one of the bays, calling at each of the camps on the way, able to receive and deliver the daily mail and carry the Admiral's orders to the fleet. The commissariat officer attended each day, and received the orders of the respective camps, ready to receive the regiments on board when the time for embarkation arrived.

The English fleet in the Bay of Talien-wan is thus described:—"We distinguish the Encounter, with the flag of Admiral Hope at the fore, while that of Admiral Sir James Hope floats from the Sans Pareil on the eastern angle of the bay. Fourteen thousand miles from home (more splendid bay it is ready to receive the fleet and armies of Great England. By the aid of a good glass we make out sixty vessels, all told, in the bay, including the French and Chinese. Under her lee, leashed in like hounds and waiting to be slipped, are the venomous little gun-boats, ready for any mischief on hand. These are the Algerine, Opossum, Clown, Cracker, Drake, Wickful, Haven, Forester, Opossum, Starling, Fire, Snack, Snipe, and Janus. Then there are the transports, with the Commissariat of the waters—which will soon have about the Take Forts. The Nimrod, Cadmus, Assistance, Sphinx, Barracouta, Coromandel, Actæon, the larger size and greater draught of water, pray for a good tide to take them over the Peiho bar, where more than one have old scores to settle with the Celestial Empire. The Encounter, Sans Pareil, Chesapeake, Encounter, Cruiser, Ferox, Sanson, Odin, Furious, Megicienne, Centaur, Sphinx, Inflexible, Perseverance, and Actæon, are too large for the shallow coast of Pechelli Bay, but they will lend a hand with the boat squadron. The Ajax and Agamemnon are also in the offing. Add the war troop-ships Sesostris, Adventure, Valeria, Urgent, and Hooper, and the steamers of the Bengal Government, and you have a very pretty armada. In the bay are transports of the French Government, and seven hospital and troop-ships at Hong-Kong. 128 transports are waiting to receive the troops at Singapore in the course of action, so that nearly 200 vessels can be counted from the cliffs."

THE DEPTFORD RIFLE CORPS RAISING EARTHWORKS
BY TORCHLIGHT.

SOME time after the volunteer movement was started there were many who believed that it would be a mere flash in the pan. "It is all very well," a nine days' wonder;" and even now, when these prognostications have been so completely falsified, there are still persons to be found ready to exclaim, "So far all has gone on well—wonderfully well: but wait until the first excitement is over, till drill and rifle practice cease to be novelties which attract the eye, and the contributions to the funds for subscriptions, then you will doubtless find the whole affair collapse." The Deptford Rifle Corps is one which has given the lie to such forebodings, there would still remain elements of vitality among our rifle corps which would be sufficient to secure for them a permanent place in the shadowed forth: and we illustrate to-day one instance which may tend to convince such sceptics as we have referred to that there is to be found in our volunteers the true spirit of self-reliance and patriotism, and independence which forms the best guarantee for the stability of the movement. The corps to which we refer is the 1st Kent Rifle (or the 1st Deptford company of the Kent Rifle Volunteers, which was established in the 21st of May, 1860, and numbers at present 120 members, and panies in that county. Formed on a non-exclusive basis, its financial arrangements were such as to admit members of comparatively limited means, the annual subscription of 10s. 6d. per member, considered as a cost moderate in itself, and, furthermore, payable by instalments. Desirous of obtaining the most practical and efficient instruction, the officers applied to Mr. Edmund Lee, of Lewisham-hill, who kindly undertook the instruction. To use the language of the prospectus, a range of upwards of 200 yards, and an excellent position for the targets, at the foot of a sandcliff rising to thirty feet. This was selected and prepared by Government for the use of the corps, to ensure the safety of the range, it was determined by the corps to increase the height of the cliff to a third more. This work was soon experienced in the permission to use the defective bricks from his adjoining brickfield, and to the kindness of Mr. Lee in undertaking the practical experience of pioneering and fieldwork by constructing the proposed addition themselves. In a communication addressed to a contemporary, Mr. Lee commending the Deptford Volunteers as a practical testimony to the vigour with which the work was commenced and carried on:—"On the 1st of August, at 6 p.m., the members, officers, mates, and officers (even including the Chaplain), merchants, clerks, shopkeepers, and artisans, assembled together with pick-axes, shovels, digging, and wheeling together, in all weathers, and after, in many cases, a hard day's work."

The work thus successfully accomplished consists of a principal earthwork (faced with a brick revetment) of 62 feet front, 22 feet deep, and averaging 10 feet in height, with a parapet 6 feet thick, and a ditch in front (with passing on that side) of 37 feet front, which joins on to a small ditch of 6 feet, which runs round the back portion of the work and round the earth. This work was commenced on the 26th of July, and completed on the 13th of October, occupying in the interval twenty-four evenings from seven to ten o'clock, and was interfered with by only three wet company and battalion drills of the corps, which, of themselves, are considered a test of the constant spirit in which corps, particularly of the past wet season was found a great hindrance, for though it is often even more wet in the trenches than it was on the 13th inst., yet it sometimes materially lessened the number engaged, bringing it down on several occasions as low as ten, and reducing the average attendance to about 30 men. The work was completed by torch-light, at the commencement of the work and one hundred at its close. This conclusion was celebrated by a supper, accompanied by one of the members of neighbouring companies, and of several residents in the neighbourhood, who had taken an interest in the progress of the work.

The accompanying Sketch was taken on the evening of the 8th instant, when the work was approaching completion, and while the volunteers were still labouring, as they have done nightly for the last two months of the time, by the light of lanterns, torches, and coal-fires.

As an instance of the economical scale in which corps, desirous to work for themselves, can be conducted, it may be mentioned that the whole of these engagements, including the hire of tools required in the question do not amount to £100, of which no small portion still remains unexpended. Indeed, were the Government to supply, as it has been urged upon them, the mere labour, and defray the other expense, the company would in all probability be entirely self-supporting.

It is to be hoped that the experience earned by the men of the 34th Kent Rifle Volunteers, and of their brethren in arms throughout the brethren-in-arms throughout the country, will not be without its fruit. More campaign have probably been won in modern times by the use of the pick and spade than by cannon and rifles; and we need not go further back in the pages of history than to Garibaldi's recent victory on the Volturno, which was in a great measure secured by the earthworks hastily thrown up in the open country by his gallant Italian volunteers. It is, indeed, worthy of consideration whether Sir John Burgoyne's idea of detached forts round London might not be partially carried out by means of our volunteers, were sites handed over to them—say on Penge-common on the south, and Highgate in the north, where all the earthworks, and possibly even part of the masonry, might be constructed by them, the Government supplying a superintending engineer and the necessary trenching tools from the stores at Woolwich. Were each battalion of volunteers in the metropolis and suburbs to undertake the completion of a certain detailed portion of each fort a generous rivalry as to which should succeed best with their self-imposed task would tend materially to maintain the esprit de corps among them.

The example of self-reliance which has thus been shown by the Deptford company was originally suggested by Captain Allan, of the Pylades London Rifles, a resident in the neighbourhood, from whose assistance this company has derived much benefit, and who has throughout, with his usual energy, taken a lively interest in the undertaking, and cut the fieldwork of which we now give an illustration.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

THE SORGHUM SACCHARATUM has been naturalised in Sicily, where its growth will serve at first merely. From these, cryptogamic spores can be readily obtained, but an excellent crop is made, from which is produced excellent white sugar. The stalks are eaten by children, and also cattle.

THE COMBINATION OF NITROGEN WITH IRON was determined some years ago by M. Margueritte. The subject has been investigated by M. Fremy, and the results of his experiments, which will be useful to steel manufacturers, have been laid before the French Academy of Sciences. Several remarkable compounds have been produced. At the same meeting M. Despretz stated that he had succeeded in adding to the series of ammoniacal gas (a compound of hydrogen and nitrogen) for eight or ten years. The iron forms a white, lustrous, crystalline substance, more alterable in air and water than ordinary iron. It preserved its easy solubility in the acids, and its magnetic properties. These researches have also an important relation to the cementing of iron and steel.

THE ABSORPTION OF RADIANT HEAT BY THE MEDIA OF THE EYE is the subject of a long memoir by M. Jules Jansen in the Annales de Chimie et de Physique. The author has divided the subject into the passage of obscure rays of solar heat through a black glass which excludes the luminous rays, and attributes the loss of heat which is lost by the humours of the eye. His memoir comprehends a determination of the quantity of heat which passes the retina, the lens, and the vitreous humour, and a determination of also the fraction of absorption due to each medium out of the total effect, and a study of the thermic spectrum. In conclusion he refers to the researches of Professor Tyndall, of the Royal Institution, on the same subject.

INDIAN CONCHOLOGY.—A series of illustrated papers on this subject, by Surgeon-Major Benson, who, being on the staff of the geological survey, will have great opportunities of acquiring specimens), has just been commenced in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal.

SACCHARIDES, a new class of combinations of sugars with acids, are their organic and inorganic chemical bases. Pelouze and his described five of them (Glucose stearique, Glucose butyrique, Glucose sulfique, Glucose chlorhydrique, and Glucose phosphorique). Mr. Stenhouse considers it to be of the same species as the glycerin.

THE HIPPOPOTAMUS.—M. Gratiolet has recently laid before the French Academy of Sciences the result of his researches on the circulation of the blood in the hippopotamus, with especial regard to its powers as a physiological curiosity. The conclusion, that the results of the observations detailed by him tend to confirm the idea, instinctively accepted from the very infancy of physiology, that the mammalia are distinguished from the rest of beings from their large the greatest part of their blood, doing so every moment by a vivacity of which the vessels of other animals, in which they resemble the reptiles among whom the pulmonary circulation is only a partial development, can give no conception.

CHEMISTRY.—The first volume of the treatise on "Theoretical and Practical Chemistry," by Professors Fresenius and Will, of Giessen and Fremy, has appeared. It contains the metalloids—described in 1096 pages, illustrated with 181 figures. The second volume will be devoted to the manufacturing classes. M. Bonnemaison has also just published the first volume of a treatise on "Chemistry especially as applied to Industry under the title of 'Agronomie,' &c.

THE LOCUSTS IN ALGERIA HAVE BEEN recently investigated by Dr. C. L. Phipson, with the view of ascertaining if it were really due to the presence of phosphorus in the organisms of the innocuous matter taken from a asylum into a fluorish as a little cotton wool, and which he supplied the proper reagents; but was unable to discover any trace of phosphorus. He also examined the excrements of the insects, but failed to detect the presence of some cryptogamous plants, and was at first somewhat inclined to attribute the mischief done by the insects to some of these plants; but the phenomenon in question is due to some organic compound yet unknown, which, probably, exists in the saliva of the insect. The Academy of Sciences of Berlin in 1672 regarding the humanity of the fault of some of the mammals, especially the rat.

"RECENT GEOGRAPHICAL RESEARCHES" form the attractive title of the scientific article in the new number of the Edinburgh Review. It is a most appropriate subject for the pages of every leading Review because which Burke calls "an earthly subject, but heavenly study." Due justice is done to the enterprising travellers and explorers of the day, to the geological Society, and the grant impetus given to the study of physical geography by the weeks of the British Association. Somewhat out of date, but carefully compiled by Mr. Keith Johnston, amongst the contributors to which were Sir Roderick Murchison, Professor Ramsay, Mr. Oldham, and other well-known men of science, is the "Physical Atlas of Natural Phenomena," the fourth edition of which has been published by Messrs. Blackwood. The first edition was published in 1848, and the present one contains the results of the researches of the last twelve years. The Atlas includes maps illustrating the geographical distribution of plants, animals, and the various phenomena connected with the physical history of the globe, and the wonderful natural phenomena are described and explained in the letter-press. The progress which science has made with Britain has increased above 100 per cent. Brazil is described as happy in the possession of a liberal and enlightened constitution, a stable government, and all the elements of probable future greatness.

NEW PLANETS.—In a recent communication to the French Academy of Sciences M. Chacornac announced the discovery of seventy-discovered planets:—M. Chacornac's, No. 59; Mr. Ferguson's (at Washington, U.S.), No. 60; Mr. Goldschmidt's, No. 61. The latter planet was discovered the 43rd at Berlin, on September 14.

THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.—The most remarkable case of this has been laid before the French Academy by M. Flourens. A healthy young man at Bagnères, in the Pyrenees, had his arm fractured in such a manner that amputation had to be deferred. M. Mottet, his surgeon, by great care, effected the use of an instrument which he had invented for the purpose, or rather to make such arrangements as would permit it to renew itself. Extensive suppuration took place during which large pieces of bone came away, which were gradually replaced. Fifteen months after the accident the patient was able to walk, and could move the limb in all directions except its sciatic, length, and straightness.—Comptes Rendus.

THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH AT EXETER is attended with great loss of heat, rendered latent by the conversion of the water into steam. The late Mr. Faraday suggested that the steam from which the condensed water is to may not only be rendered consistent with the best economical results, but be also successfully employed for the purpose of heating the buildings in which the tests which occur. The furnace is described and figured by professor R. Brunton, jun., in the last number of the journal conducted by his father and himself.

A NEW FUSIBLE ALLOY, composed of cadmium (1 to 2 parts), tin (2), lead (4), and bismuth (8), has been presented by Mr. Wood, of Nashville, Tennessee, U.S. It fuses at a temperature between 150 deg. and 160 deg. Fahrenheit, and is said to be as hard as lead. It is recommended by Professor Silliman proposes naming the new alloy "Wood's fusible metal."

THE CHEMICAL ACTION OF LIGHT, ORIGIN OF SPECIES, with reference to Natural Theology, is discussed in the American Journal of Science. The paper, which is in the form of a dialogue between two readers, concludes with the assertion, by Mr. Darwin's supporter, "That the argument for design in nature, as drawn from the existence of species, is just as valid as it ever was, and perhaps more so, after than before the theory was promulgated."

A MODE OF COLOURING STONE has been devised by M. Lepage, who has found it upon a kind of paving-stone found in the neighbourhood of Firma, in Saxony. The stone is dipped into a hot solution of gelatine of such consistency as to prevent its penetration to any great depth, and then immersed in a solution of tannin by which it becomes coated with a tanned insoluble pellicle of the colour termed antique brown, which resists the decomposing action of the atmosphere. Details of the process are given in Dingler's Polytechnische Journal.

A PAIR OF SERPENT-SKIN BOOTS were lately exhibited at a meeting of the French Academy of Sciences by M. Jules Gueroult. The skin (that of a boa-constrictor) was well tanned, and is strong and flexible. It was presented to the Academy by the Governor of Cayenne, and manufactured boots. M. Gort stated that ladies' boots of this material had appeared at the Paris Exhibition in 1855.

LITERATURE AND ART.

TRAVELLING in the interests of literature and art—we were fresh from Brighton and its exhibition of paintings, and from Liverpool, where we had grazed on the magnificent free library, the gift of William Brown—we wandered last Saturday as far as Huddersfield. That good old eschewaloring town was in a ferment of delight, for Lord Derwhamm, in performance of a promise made to the Yorkshiremen a twelvemonth since, was to preside at the annual soiree of the Mechanics' Institution, to be holden that same evening. We duly found ourself in the Philosophic Hall, at seven o'clock p.m., and very noble and very touching was it to see and hear the welcome given by the men of Huddersfield to Henry Boreham. Imagine some seven or eight hundred men all waving in the dozens of "Derwhamm" hat pegs; imagine some five or six hundred more Indies waving their handkerchiefs, and a white platform full of county magnates applauding with might and main.

It is thirty years since the great statesman, now Lord Boreham and Yare, entered Huddersfield in his famous service for the "West Riding of Yorkshire. A post-chaise and four took him tearing over the Yorkshire hills and moors, halting now at one inn and now at another to make a speech, be cheered to the echo, and tear off again. How the times are changed, and how many of the old inns and old friends and stuff! Many a man should not help seeing this. Those who stood by him could watch his working face, and the vein efforts he made to control his emotion. He felt it when the applause ceased: he spoke of his dear friend, the late Milton, Earl Fitzwilliam. And, most of all, he felt it when, rising after the wavering cheering had subsided, he began—"My old constituents," and fairly broke down in a flood of tears. But these tears were not weakness: they won the tears of wisdom and virtue. They came from a heart that age has not withered, but which a hale old age has left green, and tender, and human, and true. Reverently sang of the great man the men who thought of Dr. Hume, reading the list of killed to the Duke of Wellington on the night of Waterloo, when the fight was over. We thought of the conquering Captain sitting up in his camp-bed, and, as the doctor counted out the names of the noble and valiant comrades who would never see the sun again, wringing his hands in passionate grief, while the tears coursed in rivulets down those stern cheeks, blackened with the powder of battle.

But Lord Brougham bore up, and made an eloquent oration. And three was plenty more of Henry Brougham, master of Parliament, clergymen, and so forth. And the prizes were delivered to the juvenile students of the Mechanics' Institute by Lord Brougham, popping and headed young "teasers," errand-boys, and shop-lads, by the hand. The men of Huddersfield cheered themselves hoarse, and then, by way of a change, indulged in hooting the Lord of the Manor, a good-hearted worthy young gentleman, but who is, for some petty local reason, unpopular among certain of the lieges in the town. And, finally, we came away from Huddersfield most favourably impressed with the energy and enterprise of the place generally as it is a precious and prosperous an a discount, and still more deeply sensible of the munificence and hospitality of the cloth-lords of Huddersfield—the Brookes, the Whigfers, and the rest. We should have mentioned that we are to see Robin Hood's grave, and poor Charlotte Bronte's tomb at Haworth, but Time forbids: we must to the train for London, and leave it to you and him by the foreside.

In about three weeks' time Messrs. Scothgate and Barrett will sell by auction the remaining copies of three magnificent works—the "Art-Treasures of the United Kingdom," Owen Jones's "Grammar of Ornament," and David Roberts's "Holy Land." We are told that the stones used in the lithographing of the sumptuous illustrations to these works (published at about £20) need not be to be destroyed, and will remain for further issue impossible. Now, what is this but Vandalism? Why this lamentable waste? Why not, in the name of all that is reasonable, set forth by the destruction of the steel plates of engravings after Landseer had been sufficient to these these combinations of printsellers from making "difficult and dear" the "eye for every man?" Why not destroy Marc Antonio Raimondi or Albert Durer had destroyed their plates after a certain number of copies had been struck off? Why not? Why not Hogarth had obliterated his copperplate dramas the moment after the requirements of the public had been satisfied, and the "Rake's Progress" &c., the publishers of the splendid Livres d'Art we have mentioned, should perpend, and stay the rash hands of their stonebreakers.

Stones, after all, are but an imaginative term, which merely reminds us of the title of what promises to be an interesting work, "Lithiaka"—a history of stones, by Mimus. Mr. Murray, of Albemarle-street, Mr. Bentley is to put forth in November. We hope Mdme. de Barrera will sell us the stone of her mother's house in Peru, whereof Prescott made the Indian as he lay sleeping. We should like to hear, also, the true story of the "Stone of Scone," likewise of the celebrated "Blarney Brooch" which originally formed part of an order of chivalry sent by a German Landgrave to George I., and which for certain dreadful reasons had remained for a hundred and forty years in the best gents of blood. The new historian of jewels need scarcely trouble himself to tell over again the story of the "Pitt" diamond, the Koh-i-noor, except as it is with the lives of Marie Antoinette, Cagliostro, and the Cardinal-Prince de Rohan—the Thomas Carlyle has so told that story that it will not bear repeating.

The mention of Mr. Carlyle's name reminds us that the good people of Melbourne in Australia are about to erect a statue to Shakspeare memorial (where is our monument, oh, shame!) propose to refer adjudication of the designs submitted to a "Committee of Taste" composed of—whom do our readers think?—why, Mr. Thomas Carlyle, Sir Charles Eastlake, and Mr. John Bookin. Mustard, oil, and vinegar! sugar, salt, and spice! Friar Bacon, Hollingshead, and Mother Goose! We very much fear that Mr. Carlyle would be apt to denounce the whole thing as "mummery" and a "plastering," and recommend that the Melbourne people as "Apes of the Dead Sea." At any rate, Art is not to be trifled with. Let the Australians be content with nothing enough of an esthetic nature on his hands without the worry of a committee of taste. Bookin must be by no busy with his wonderful political economies to think about Shakspeare memorials. If a committee of taste be needed, much better would it be to solicit the opinion of the well-accomplished and intelligent Australian Shakspereak scholars and critics—our Collliers, Dyces, Staunttons, and Knights.

We spoke of Mr. Rouklin's cavas on political economy. He has got as far as of which is probably growing out of the Bankruptcy Court. We earnestly wish that he would settle that little difficulty between Mr. Gladstone and the rebon weavers of Coventry, who are obliged to pay paper duty on the ribbon and blocks necessary for printing their ribbons. The paper protectionists are in a beautifully cleft stick anent this Coventry question. On the one hand, they "go in" for "open knowledge," about which a cry is got up, and the continuance of the wicked old tax just ripens for repeal, for which the paper protectionists profess so affectionate a solicitude.

Among the notices of literary notices we see that the entire stock remaining on hand of Mr. Henry Mayhew's "London Characters and London Poor," as also of his "Great World of London," will be sold next month. Each advertiser is to be allowed to "bid" for the stock, and that either of these important works had reached completion. So far as continuous publication was concerned they resembled the Story of the Boar and the Biddle—

Begun, and broke off in the middle—

but, if Mr. Mayhew had indeed been daring to bequeathe to finishing "Labour and the Poor" and "The Great World," we must congratulate him and the public on the fact. If Henry Mayhew had been a poet, a man he would have received Governmental assistance in the prosecution of his unfinished work, or by this time a Knight of the Legion of Honour and in the receipt of a handsome pension for literary merit. As it is, auctioneers sell up the back stock "if up order of the executors" and—let us hope—all is well.

Other executors, by the way, have commanded the sale of the copious autiliary property of the late Mr. Ferdinand Ackermann. We knew him well. He was truly our friend; and ere this hand could wield the pen it held a pencil, and sometimes a graver or an etching-needle, and sometimes a lithographic crayon, that were all employed for years in the service of the great house of Ackermann. Ferdinand was one of the hand of brothers who carried on the business of stout old Rudolph Ackermann. Who has not gazed at the pictures in those vast windows of the shop at the corner of Beaufort-buildings, Strand? They name is now but a noise. The house is gone. Stay, we passed it but yesterday, and found Mr. Eugene Rimmel's soaps and perfumes in the "emporium" which was once the resort of the most renowned artists in England—in the place where we have seen Frost, and Cattermole, and Liversege, and Thomas Landseer, and Louis Haghe. The Ackermanns were the conductors' Ushers of "Lodge" sales" and the "Landseer Annuals." Keepsakes and Annuals, where are ye know?

NEW SHAKO FOR THE INFANTRY.

THE authorities at the Horse Guards have decided on discontinuing the ugly and cumbersome shako worn in the Army, and which tuting in place of a headdress of a much lighter and somewhat more ornamental character, and unlike the large-peaked forage-caps worn by several of the volunteer rifle corps, though the crown is somewhat higher. The weight of the cap is much less than that of the present unwieldy shako. The new shako is now being issued to the following regiments:—1st battalion Rifle Brigade, 4th battalion Rifle Brigade, 4th battalion Royal Fusiliers, 1st battalion Royal Scots, and 2nd Regiment. Should it be found to wear satisfactorily, the whole of the Army will hereafter adopt it in the place of the ill-shako now in use. The body of the new shako is made from two thicknesses of cloth stitched together by the sewing-machine, the outer piece of cloth being waterproofed. Ventilation is provided for by perforations under the open figures of the shako-plate, and under the ornament at the back, so that a current of air passes through the shako from front to back. The cloth lining elastic causes the cap to give to the shape of the head; and, the size of the crowners being considerably reduced, the shako, when complete, weighs about half that of the present pattern.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LADY DOWNES.

The Right Hon. Christopher, Baroness Downes, who died on the 18th inst. at her town house, 19, Grafton-street, was the daughter of James Buchanan, Esq., of Drumakill, in Ayrshire, and was born in 1795. She was married, first, in March, 1819, to John Willi Fleming, Esq., of Stoneham Park, Southampton, M.P. for Hants, by whom, who died at Athens in July, 1824, she had two sons, of whom the eldest son is the present John Brown Wills Fleming, Esq., of Stoneham Park, M.P. for Hants, by whom she had two daughters, of whom have been married—viz. Mrs. Armstrong, of Castle Iver, Kiley's County, Cork, to Henry Vansittart, and Mrs. Albert Bankes, to Sir Ludwig was married, secondly, the 4th of August, 1840 (she was his second wife), to Sir Richard Downes, Bart., of Downes Court, in the county King's County, K.C.B., F.T.S., a representative Peer of Ireland, and Colonel of the 54th Regiment, by whom she leaves no issue. Her ladyship is survived by her first husband, John Brown Wills Fleming, Esq., married, the 27th of February, 1840, Lady Catherine Caroline Fane, only daughter of the late Field-Marshal Earl Amherst of the First, Thomas, Earl of Dundonald, G.C.B.

THE REV. MRS. VESEY KNOX.

The Hon. Catherine Ann Vesey Knox died at her residence, Beraghbin in the county of Tyrone, Ireland, on the 7th instant, in the eighty-seventh year of her age, was the eldest and last surviving daughter of the late General Osborne, of Derbyshire, of whom mention is made in Jonas's Letters. General Osborne was Governor of Portsmouth Fort, and for some time Deputy Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in Ireland. His second daughter, Elizabeth, married a Fabre in the county of Surrey, and many years her grandmother to the accident of Clanricarde, and his third daughter was married to Mr. Vesey Knox, of Dublin, by whom she had a numerous family, and died in the year 1809. Mrs. Vesey Knox was married, on the 8th of October, 1792, to the Hon. Vesey Knox, the younger son of Thomas, second Viscount and first Earl Ranfurly, and brother to the late uncle of Thomas Granville Henry Stuart, the present Earl. By this marriage the Knox and the Vesey Patersons (1000) Mrs. Knox had issue only a daughter, Marian Diana, wife of the Rev. Richard Rogers Hornby (no issue) and Thomas Vesey Knox, born in 1811, and Hon. Reginald Vesey, in holy orders, who married Mary Anne, daughter of the Rev. Bernard Ward, and died in 1850, leaving issue.

THOMAS HARTSHORNE, ESQ.

Thomas Hartshorne, Esq., of Sillimore House and Johnson Hall, both in the county of Stafford, died at the former residence on the 12th inst., after a short illness, has for twenty-three years been a magistrate for the county, and for a series of years a deputy-lieutenant. He was a gentleman of the old school, a true shire. His open-hearted liberality, high principle, and clear judgment won the affectionate regard of all who had the pleasure to know him intimately. On the purchase of the Tixall estate by his attached friend the late Earl Talbot he was appointed, with an extra allowance, to the office of keeper of the celebrated Tixall tenant of the Brancote Farm—at first jointly with the present Earl of Shrewsbury, and afterwards solely—which office he continued each succeeding to his death, and there he erected that model farm which has made his name a household word for all who are interested in the improvement of the condition of the first class. The farm still remains a monument of his ability and judgment. Mr. Hartshorne was a thorough sportsman, a good shot, a good rider and skilful sportsman, and was well known as the leader of the Meynell and Ingestre hounds. The loss of Tixall and its neighbourhood by Mr. Hartshorne's close intellect in all matters, his kind and generous nature, and his pleasant social qualities, will be long and deeply felt by all who knew him.

HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF RICHMOND

HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF RICHMOND died on the 21st inst., very generally and deeply lamented. A memoir and portrait of this excellent nobleman will be given in next week's Number of this Journal.

THE CROSSIE BARONETCY.—This baronetcy, it seems, is not extinct, but is inherited by a gentleman long resident in London, now Sir William Richard Crossie, the sixth Baronet, who is cousin of the Baronet just dead, and grandson of Sir Paul Crossie, the fourth Baronet. We should have stated, in our recent notice of the gallant Sir William Edward Crossie, the Baronet just deceased, that he was among the five prisoners Baronets of Nova Scotia, and that he was severely wounded at the capture of Bergen-op-Zoom; and was consequently compelled to retire on half-pay. Sir William Richard Crossie, the present Baronet, married, in 1849, Catherine, only daughter of the late Rev. Samuel Madden, of Kilkenny; and niece of the late Sir William Gordon Cumming, Bart.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Last Saturday the Grand Duke Michael of Russia minutely inspected the iron-cased frigate Warrior now building at Blackwall.

The Royal Commission of Inquiry into the control and management of her Majesty's naval yards, under the presidency of Mr. Frederick Peel, commenced their sittings on Thursday week.

It is reported that Vice-Admiral Martin has requested to be permitted to resign the command of the Mediterranean fleet on the score of ill health until that he will be succeeded by Vice-Admiral Hope Johnstone, Commander-in-Chief at the Nore.

Lieutenant-General Sir James Outram is so far restored to health that he will leave Madeira early next week.

The interment of the remains of Sir Harry Smith took place at Whittlesea yesterday week, and was conducted in a quiet and retired manner, the funeral procession consisting of only the hearse and mourning coaches, and the whole ceremony being performed in about half an hour. The Duke of Cambridge was represented by Colonel Bagnold, and the Duke of Richmond by Colonel Steele. The Rev. Mr. Jones, rector of Whittlesea, officiated. The deceased was in his eighty-first year.

The Duke of Cambridge has appointed Major Hamilton, of the 1st Royal Scots, to be Major of Brigade, and in the absence of Major Lowe, to act as Brigade Major, and Lieutenant Hamilton, of the 1st Royal Scots, to be Aide-de-Camp to Major-General Sir Richard Dalbiac, K.C.B., commanding the Dublin district, vice Major Hamilton, appointed Brigade Major.

THE MILITIA.—The Denbigh Militia was inspected yesterday week by Colonel Wynne, Deputy-Lieutenant of Co., Inspector of Militia. The inspection was a minute one. The appearance of the men under arms called forth marks of approbation from the inspecting officer, who expressed himself much pleased at their cleanliness and soldierlike appearance.——The South Durham Militia assembled last week for their twenty-seven days' training at Barnard Castle, and the North Durham Militia, at Durham, for the same period. The muster at each place is represented as being indifferent.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

Captain Markham, of the Scots Greys, has accepted the colonelcy of the 7th West York Volunteer Rifles.

A Highland corps of Rifle Volunteers is to be formed in Aberdeen in connection with the battalion.

About 400 of the 6th Tower Hamlets Rifle Brigade were entertained at dinner by the officers of the corps on Thursday se'nnight, Captain-Commandant Hemming presiding.

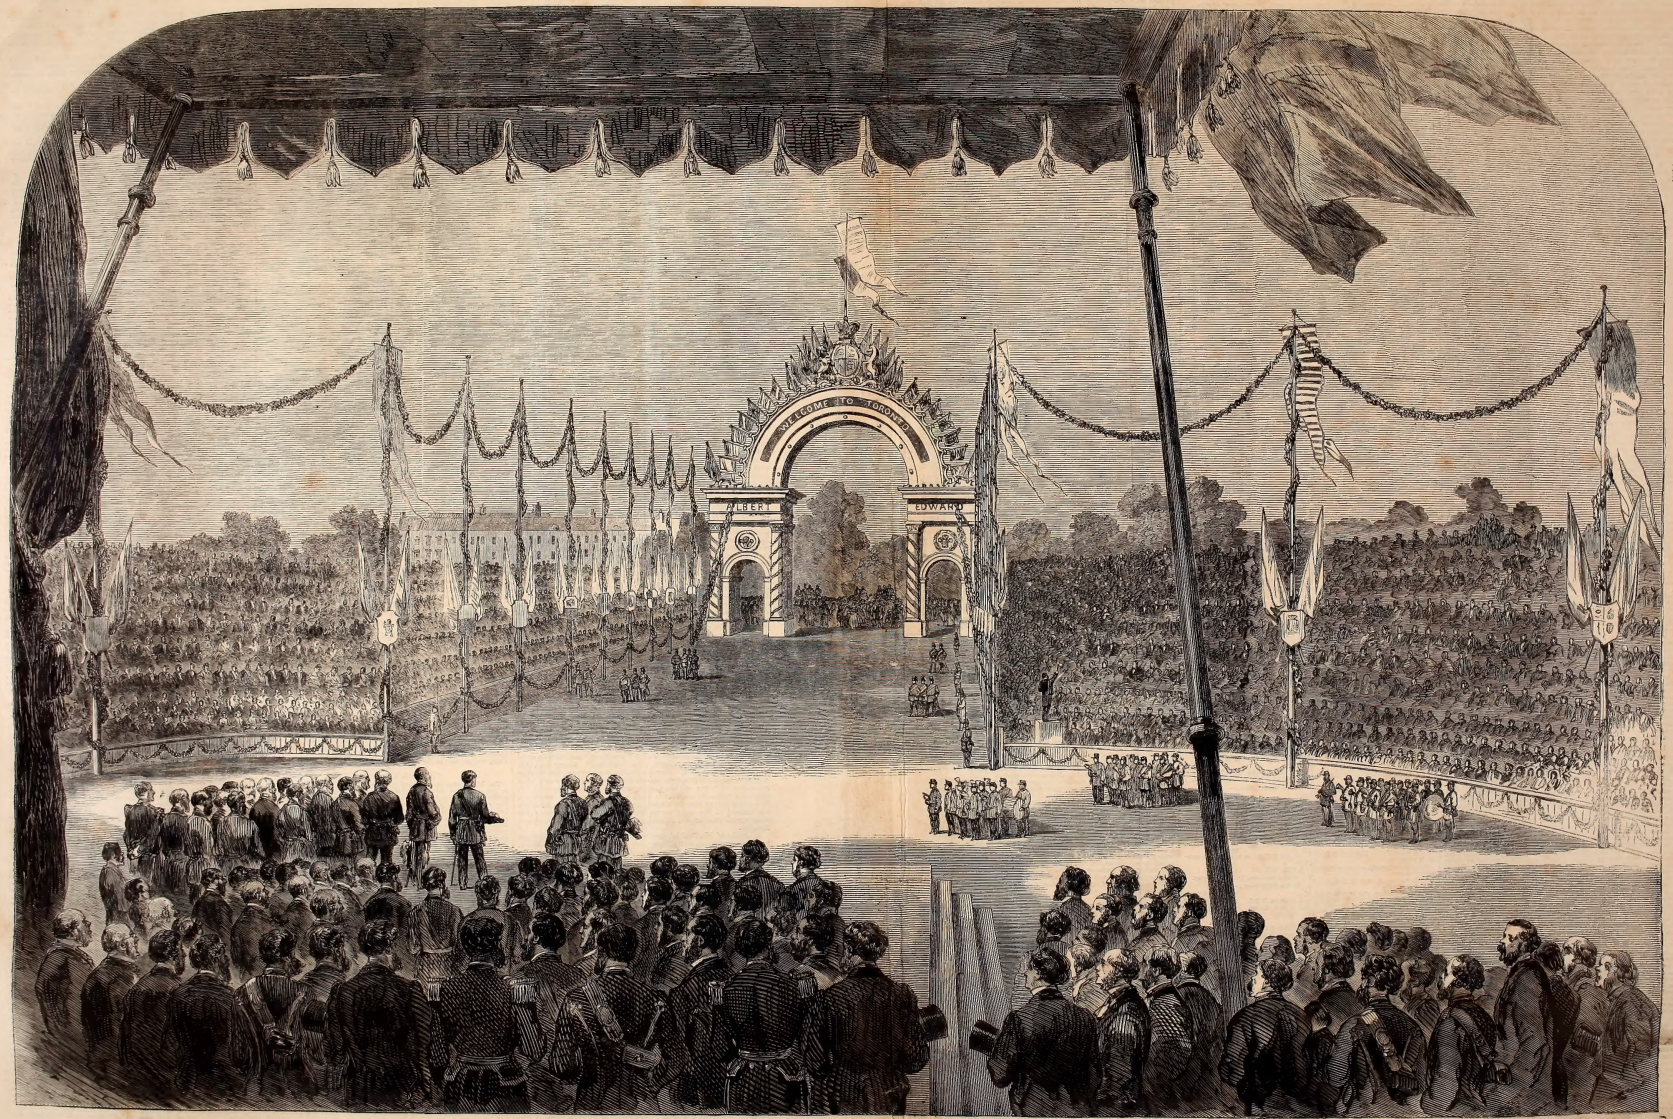
Yesterday week the 1st battalion of Sussex Rifle Volunteers, consisting of the Arundel, Chichester, Worthing, Shoreham, Bognor, and Petworth companies, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Nicholls, assembled at the village of Bognor, and marched to Felpham, Worthing, and West Dean for a number of evolutions.

The competition for the prizes announced by the Perth Highland Society took place on Monday and Wednesday last week, at the practising-ground of the Perth Volunteer Rifles in the Muirton Park, Perth. The silver cup, £10, was gained by Sergeant J. F. M'Corquodale, F.V.H.

There has been a rifle competition at Dover, a challenge from Captain Murray, of the Whitton or Hounslow Corps, to the Harrow and Kingston-on-Thames Corps, each corps to consist of twenty men each corps. Prizes were awarded as follows:—To Private Dell, Harrow, an Enfield rifle; Corporal Hunt, Hounslow, a silver watch; Sergeant Ing, Colour Sergeant Hall, Kingston, a purse of money.

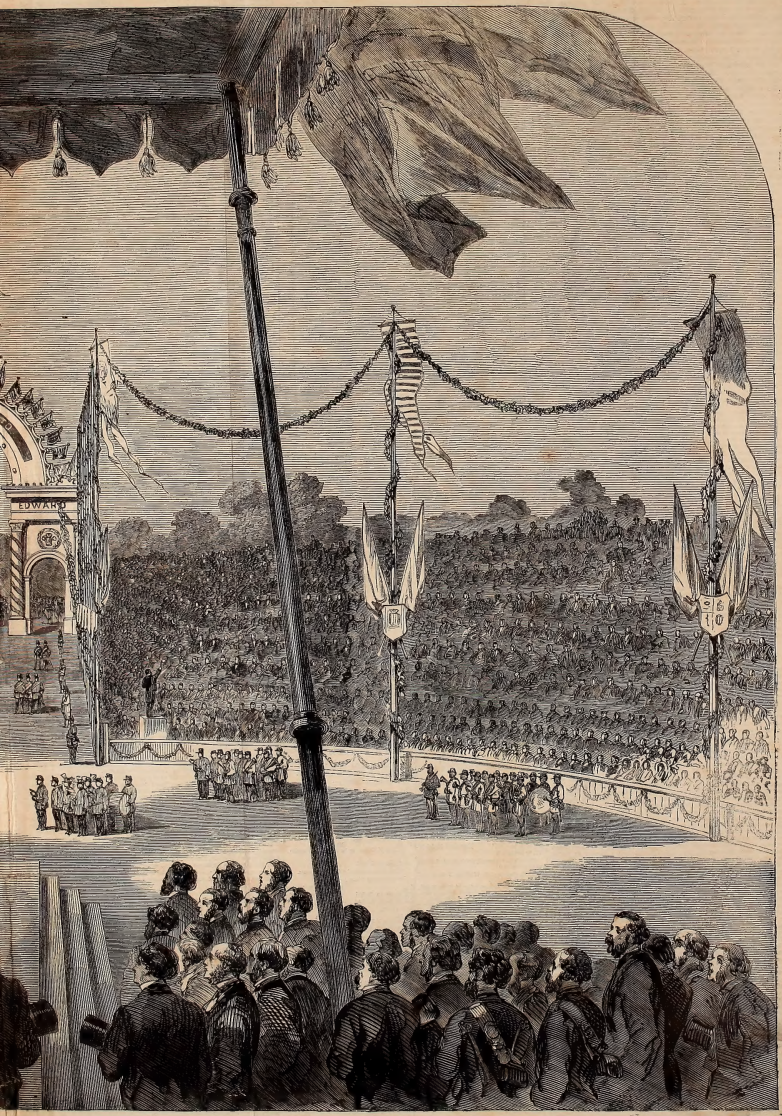
The Queen's Westminster banquet was given in the city of York (over which the Lord Mayor presided) for the purpose of presenting to the corps of rifle and fire prizes in the recently contest. To mark the successful conclusion of a magnificent silver cup was presented to the commandant of the corps, and the dinner that a county association was being got up, of which Lieut.-H. Wood, of York, was appointed secretary. The subscription list for the new volunteer members would be admitted on the payment of half a guinea.

Lord Ranelagh the inspection of the Volunteers on the Stanley Park were presented on Clifford Down. The corps mustered in goodly numbers, about 400 strong, and 14 officers. The band of the 2nd Battalion Royal Regiment, under the direction of Mr. Lyon Campbell and Colonel Bush, was about £350.



On Tuesday and Wednesday last week the 2nd rifle took place at Northey Beetle, the seat of the Captain of the Kentshurst Volunteers, Mr. James Whatman Balcombe, and was attended by Captain and Mrs. Balcombe. The first was a silver cup, given by Mrs. Legh, for the best marksman. Sergeant Cruse won the cup. The second competition was a match of ladies' and gentlemen afterwards dined at the hall, on the invitation of Captain Legh. On Wednesday the second for the second prize of Northey Kilkenny (Kilkenny rifle), given by Captain Legh, took place on the same ground. There was a tie between Sergeants Stevens and Cruse, which was decided in favour of the latter, and Sergeant Cochran won the prize. A third prize (an Enfield rifle, offered by Captain Legh) was also competed for under commissioned officers, and won by Sergeant Stevens.

Yesterday week the oath of allegiance was administered by Sir Archibald Alison in the City Hall, Glasgow, to the 6th, 21st, and 23rd Lanarkshire Rifle Volunteer Corps, and the Lanarkshire Artillery Volunteers. A splendid assemblage of ladies and gentlemen occupied the platform, galleries, and the sides of the body of the hall. The corps were marched into the hall, the different companies entered the hall preceded by six pipers playing "Highland Laddie." The companies were then formed in front of the spectators. The oath of allegiance was then drawn up in the form of a square, the Sheriff and the Rev. Dr. Hill, the chaplain of the Glasgow Volunteers, standing in the centre. Headed by the Sheriff, the Sheriff administered the oath in the usual form. Sir Archibald Alison then addressed the corps in a speech which was received with great cheering.



The 37th Kent Rifle Volunteer Corps was inspected on the 9th inst., in Cranbrook, the head-quarters of the corps, by Lieut.-Colonel Hamilton, assisted by Lieut.-Colonel Leard, Assistant-Inspector of Volunteers. The corps is a very efficient one, and during the past year has had a few months formed a increased in numbers. Nearly 800 men were present on parade, and went through several battalion and light infantry movements with considerable steadiness and precision. The Lieut.-Lieutenant expressed himself much pleased with the appearance of the corps, and the manner in which the movements on parade had been performed. After the inspection a dinner was given to the battalion by Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton, at which nearly five hundred guests were entertained.

The 1st Surrey Rifle Volunteers on Friday, the 19th inst., at Clavering Park, the seat of Mr. Andrew Arrestecke, for a silver cup given by that gentleman, to be competed for by members of the corps. A little over 100 volunteers came from the various neighbouring corps. The prize was carried off by Mr. Sergeant Hutchinson.

PRESENTATIONS OF BUGLES, ETC.—Last Saturday, at Holly Lodge, Miss Burdett Coutts presented a silver bugle to the 1st Surrey (Lord Ranelagh's) Highgate, to the Highgate Rifle Corps. The ceremony was at a more than usually attractive character, in addition to the usual military entertainment provided by Miss Coutts for her own immediate friends of the ladies' company there was a large party. The health of the various corps marauded, substantial refreshments were also provided for the men. Lord Ranelagh attended to hand to Miss Coutts the Engraving of the presentation ceremony.——At Wycombe Abbey, in Buckinghamshire, Lord Carington presented a bugle to the Chipping Wycombe corps, subsequently three silver cups, the presents of Lord Carington, were shot for by the members of the corps.——At Worksop, Nottinghamshire, Lord Lord Carington, by Private Ward, Aylesbury; and the third cup, by Sergeant Hall, Aylesbury. The presentation was made by Lord Carington to the corps, and to a banquet given by the officers and other friends, and on Thursday evening a dinner was given at the Bell Inn, Aylesbury, to the members of the corps by Lord Carington.——On Tuesday, in Sussex, a silver bugle, subscribed for by the ladies of Chesterfield and the neighbourhood, was presented to the 1st Derbyshire Rifle Volunteers, by Miss Georgiana Louisa Cavendish, the daughter of his Grace the Duke of Devonshire, the Lord-Lieutenant of the county. The presentation of Wolsingham's bugle was presented to Captain Ellison, of the 1st Lancashire Engineers, by the officers and men of the corps.——On Wednesday week a presentation of the 12th Middlesex Corps took place on Wednesday week, and on the same occasion a silver bugle, the gift of Charles Lyall, Esq., was presented. The members of the corps assembled at Barnet at six o'clock, and, headed by the band of the 1st Middlesex Volunteers, marched to Mount Highwood Hill, the residence of E. Cox, Esq., in Hadley Park, where the ceremony was to terminate. The number of the practice 800 yards in extent has been granted for their use. The bugle was presented, on behalf of the corps, by Captain Edward Williams, M.P. The prizes were then awarded by Mrs. Wilbraham Taylor, after which a dance took place, and the proceedings terminated. The following is the result of the contests:—First class—1st prize (a handsome revolver rifle), Sergeant C. Brooks; 2nd prize (a handsome rifle), Mr. Hall; 3rd prize, Captain Wilbraham Taylor. Second class—1st prize (a short Enfield rifle), Sergeant Mr. Pearson; 2nd prize, Mr. Pearson; 3rd prize, Sergeant Gordon; 4th prize, Mr. Schmoll. Third class—1st prize (a short Enfield rifle), Mr. Dupree; 2nd prize, Mr. Dupree; 3rd prize, Mr. Dupree; 4th prize, Mr. J. Hodgkinson. Most of the handsome prizes was won by Mr. Dupree, who was followed by Mr. Pearson. Mrs. Wilbraham Taylor, in the course of the evening, presented the prizes to the successful competitors, the ladies of Wells, took place, by permission of the bishop of Bath and Wells, on Friday week, in the Bishop's Palace, and was attended by a large audience of a numerous concourse of spectators. The ground was kept by the members of the North Somerset Yeomanry Cavalry, under the command of Mr. R. L. Tudway, late member for Wells, made the presentation.——The Haverfordwest Rifle Corps paraded, under Captain Peel, last week, for the purpose of having a silver bugle presented to them by Mrs. Phillips, wife of the Lord Lieutenant of the county of Haverfordwest. It was subscribed for by the ladies of the place. When the ceremony of presenting the bugle was concluded, Sergeant-Major M'William, of the Pembrokeshire Artillery, late instructor to the Haverfordwest Volunteers, was presented by Captain Peel, in the name of the corps, with a handsome silk purse containing fifty-one sovereigns, in consideration of the care and patience he had used in his instruction of the corps.——The Lord Lieutenant of Lincolnshire intends to give one or more prizes to each of the three battalions of rifle volunteers of his county, to be shot for in the spring of next year. The Lieutenant of Lincolnshire will also offer a cup to each battalion, to be shot for at the same time as the Lord Lieutenant's prizes.

RECEPTION OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES BY THE INHABITANTS OF TORONTO, CANADA WEST.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, G. H. ANDREWS.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

ADA WEST.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, G. H. ANDREWS.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE PRINCE OF WALES AT TORONTO.

THE fine capital of Western Canada, Toronto, gave to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales—as recorded in this Journal—a noble welcome and magnificent reception. At every step during his progress the Prince was welcomed with genuine British cheers; but at Toronto he first heard a hundred thousand British American throats gave out the loyal cry. Extending along the whole front of the city is a magnificent esplanade. Near its western extremity was erected facing Prince's dismantled fortress. Here a splendid pavilion was erected facing the city; it stood upon raised ground, and upon a dais was placed a throne, upon which were seated the Governor-General, his wife, and Royal throne. The hangings were of crimson velvet, and the roof, the whole admirably disposed and adorned with green leaves and festoons of flowers. The whole was surmounted with a royal crown. Standing on the dais under the canopy, but somewhat in front of the throne, was being conducted pavilion a sight met the eyes of the Prince on his arrival from the steps in the place of disembarkation on which probably he will never forget. On each side of the pavilion an immense amphitheatre had been erected capable of containing 10,000 persons. Beyond this, and on a wide street, flanked with a further pavilion. The whole amphitheatre was exceedingly gay with the dresses of the ladies, and armorial bearings on shields affixed to tall posts, each of which was ornamented with a gaily-coloured garland. But the pavilion was ornamented with a gaily-coloured garland. But the pavilion was the charm of the place was the entrance-arch, which spanned the street, and faced the dais at the distance of some hundred yards. This was constructed in a magnificent arch. It was of the Grecian order, but certainly a mean ornament. Its height was upwards of sixty feet; exceedingly rich in ornament. Its height was upwards of sixty feet; exceedingly rich in ornament. Previous to the reception of the Judges, &c., his Lordship will receive the Lord Mayor elect and the members of the Corporation of London, to signify the Queen's approval of the selection made by the citizens.

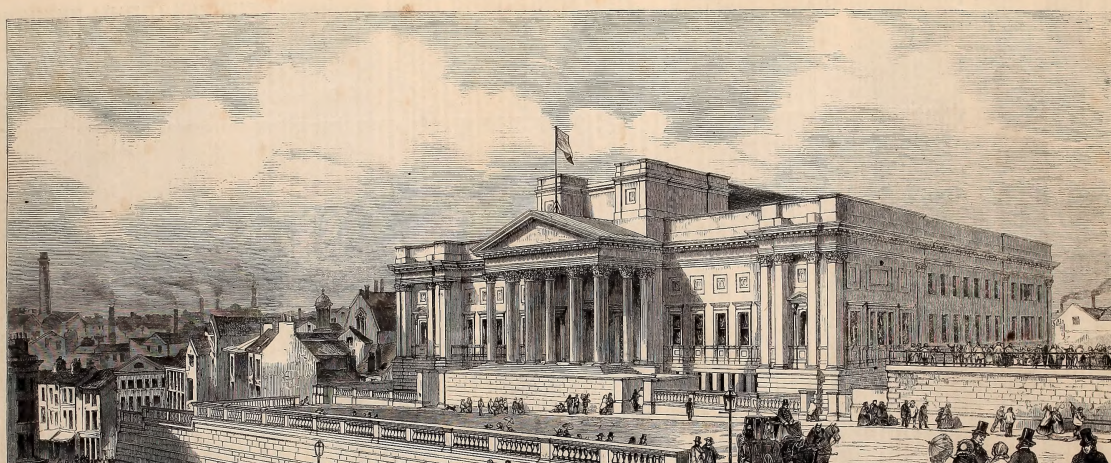
OUT-DOOR AMUSEMENTS.

NOVEMBER.



THE 1st of November is a proud day in the kalends of the sportsman, for upon it commence the public advertisements of the respective packs of foxhounds in England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. It is true that during the two previous months the lover of the noble science may have indulged in his favourite pursuit, and may have witnessed the death of many a gallant cub; but that is a mere little woodfeeder amidst the tangled coppice, or down the green rides, compared with a burst of five-and-fifty minutes over the open, or a scurry of fifteen across the grass land's? To the master of the hounds, the huntsman, and a chosen few who are devoted to the chase, in all its branches, and to his pleasure in the pack and the kennel, the summer months of hunting canine and vulpine race is most interesting and exciting. First, there is the drafting of the young hounds, and the anxious consideration of seeing the steady working of the old hounds after so long a holiday. And the drafting of the young ones; then there is the delight of once again exchanging a word with the old earth-stoppers, and listening to the tales of the doings of the vermin during the summer months, as they echo through the woods; and last, not least, the exhilarating sensation of killing a cub and "blooding" the young hounds. Then comes the anxious, but pleasant, task of the entertainment, for he must be up at daybreak, or, according to the old hunting song, the lark's early song

Will chide the huntsman for sleeping so long.

He must be content to wait patiently in wet or fair weather, under a broiling September sun, or within the influence of a cold easterly wind, before the hounds are laid on to the scent. Then the melodious will in time be dispelled by the deep tone of "Merrylass," or some other steady working hound, as the scent is lit or left by the fox crossing the ride; and positive delight will be experienced when the whole pack join in the tuneful chorus, and, after a run of some fifteen or twenty minutes, the view halloo announces the approaching moment the death of Reynard. With what exultation does he possess himself of the brush, and with what complacency does he exhibit it! Even in North American Indian experiences more gratification after a successful onslaught upon some wily redskin or grizzly bear than the possession of the scalp. "Black game" than does the huntsman when he deprives the crafty animal's skull of its tegaments. "There are two brace missing!" exclaims the sportsman, as he counts the bag after a day's shooting in the lower plantation;" and away gallops one of the whippers-in to Farmer Stubble's, to see if the truants have not been there. Delighted coveted and well-contested prize; and growl, and fight, and scramble, and all in as much gusto as a gourmet does a haunch of venison at a rose ordinary in the country. "Hector" having returned with the absentees, and the day being yet young, another cub is tried for his mettle, and found wanting.

We now turn to another November sport, that of shooting; and here we are reminded of an incident of a day's sport which came upon being asked to take a gun, gave the following reasons against shooting. "We quote Sydney Smith's own words, because he is simply unable to improve them, because I found, on laying at Lord Grey's, that the birds seemed to consider the muzzle of my gun as the safest place to sit upon, because I could only discharge it by sitting down and I fired my gun, so was not likely to improve; and, thirdly, because, if I did fire my gun, one of the coachee body could not tell me in their natural enemy, and I thought it more clerical to be at peace with both. Now, if every man stood in November with a gun and a bird, the number of gunners would be greatly decreased. We recollect last season hearing of a capital reply that was made to a noble Lord who, when he was a Member of the House of Commons, was asked by a Member, a zealous Reformer, and an eloquent speaker, would scarcely vote for any one who was not a Reformer. "Then you will vote for the ship to the head keeper, when staying at a friend's house in the country. "Why, no, not much the worst ship in the world," was the reply. "Not by any means," responded the other. "I've met with scores that are worse; for you always misses them to very clean—never as much as touches the feathers." Then, in November, woodcocks, snipes, and woodcocks, furnish excellent sport to the lover of the trigger; and, although the latter are not considered worthy of the spit, yet various devocations compel them to reside a great portion of the winter in the neighbourhood of Smithfield bulls; and we have known Woodcock Hall, miles of Hyde Park-corner, it was necessary to start the day before, that the birds might be found in time for breakfast. Then, in accordance with the Royal Staghounds, one was called in the middle of the night, had to undergo the dreadful misery of having candlelight, and probably started before breakfast in a dense fog, in order to arrive at the park, Salt Hill, Maidenhead Thicket, Ascot Heath, or Longford, in time for the commencement of the day's sport, and then to ride home for the amusement by a drive or ride home in the dark of, perhaps, twenty or thirty miles, and to be up and at work the following day. Now, a comfortable breakfast at a reasonable hour, a Hansom cab (instead of a heavy old broad-wheeled conveyance), and a ride of some five-and-twenty observations I have ventured to make, without expressing to you all, collectively and individually, that I cannot find words sufficiently strong to make known what I feel, and how much I am overpaid by your kindness and reception, for my endeavours to add something to the useful institutions of our country.

Mr. Brown then proposed as a toast, "The House of Stanley," and in doing so expressed his regret that the head of that house, through serious indisposition, was unable to be present. The toast was drunk with loud cheering, and acknowledged by Lord Stanley. Other toasts followed, and at a late hour the party broke up.

On Friday night the Mayor, T. D. Anderson, Esq., gave, as a finale to the Brown festival, a grand soirée in the Townhall. The rooms were elegantly decorated; and amongst those present were Lord Brougham, Sir John Bowring, Lord Stanley, Sir Rammerson Temmeh, T. B. Horsfall, Esq., M.P., W. Ewart, Esq., M.P., and other persons of note.

The following details connected with the munificent donation of Mr. Brown to his fellow-townsmen are taken from the Liverpool Mercury :—

The new library and museum is situated on the northerly side of Shaw's-brow, and presents a centre, flanks and wings. The centre is a deeply-recessed hexastyle Corinthian portico, after the Temple of Jupiter Stator in Rome, having an inner row of four columns, two intercolumniations being omitted to gain width to the entrance; the floor of the portico being attained by steps from the footwalks, inclosed within screen walls, and landings at each end of the portico, and not laid across the middle. The remainder of the front is inclosed from the street by a stone balustrade and iron gates. The two wings have each four Corinthian pilasters, irregularly spaced, the two in the centre standing forward about two feet; between them is a niche, with pedimented cornices on curved trusses; above are small panels and wreaths. The flanks between the central portico trusses; above are small panels and wreaths. and the wings have each five windows, with horizontal cornices on trusses, above which are small panels with large wreaths in them. The ends are screened from view by lofty attics or parapet walls. The masonry of the front is returned for a short distance at each end of the building, the remainder of the external walls being finished in Staffordshire bricks, of a cream colour, with stone dressings. The masonry is constructed principally of stone from the neighbourhood of Wrexham. Yorkshire and Derby Dale stone has been used to a limited extent. The surface of the site, a sandy gravel, is very unsuitable for the style used in the building; but the architect, having level, is very unsuitable either for the site or the style. we understand, is not responsible either for the site or the style.

On entering the building through the centre portion, the visitor passes into a vestibule 11 feet by 23 feet, with a panelled flat ceiling; beyond the vestibule is the central hall, the principal architectural feature of the interior; and beyond the hall is the principal staircase. The central hall is divided at each end from the vestibule and staircase respectively by a screen of two Doric columns in antis. It is 90 feet long, 45 feet wide, and 46 feet high. It is divided basilica-wise into three portions—a centre or nave, and the side aisles or corridors; the latter are separated from the nave by an arcade, which supports the gallery floor and the Ionic columns which carry the roof. At each end of the hall the entablature on these columns is continuous, but at the sides it is broken round each column, and from the cornice spring arches, which are groined into the vaults over the gallery. Over the centre of the hall or nave the ceiling is flat, coved down to the cornice with panels, the mouldings of which are enriched. Those of three panels are glazed, but the principal light is derived from seven round-arched windows on each side. Between the columns in the gallery is a stone balustrade. The principal staircase is 24½ feet by 30 feet. The stairs consist of a central flight with a continuous landing the full width of the staircase, and two return flights; the outer string of the stairs is a plinth of Yorkshire stone, with dado and moulded capping in lieu of balusters and handrail. The steps are from Craiglleith quarry. This arrangement of the vestibule, central hall, and staircase gives a vista nearly 150 feet in length.

On the ground floor, to the right of the principal entrance, is the door to the free library. The reading-room, which is 110 feet long and 50 feet wide, is divided into two portions by two Doric columns in antis near the south end, and here are two windows looking into Shaw's-brow. The remainder of the room is lighted by two large skylights, and by windows in an attic raised upon panelled segmental arches, of bold and simple design, springing from piers intended to form shafts to be used in ventilation. The Doric entablature is continued all round the centre part of the room. Adjoining the reading-room, in the extreme south-east corner of the building, is the student's reading-room, 60½ feet wide by 26 feet; and running northwards from this, parallel to the principal reading-room, and along the eastern end of the building, is the reference library, 75 feet by 27 feet, fitted up with bookcases in two tiers, the upper accessible from a light iron gallery; additional storage for books is provided in three rooms, all lighted from the roof, which are over the rooms just described. The total accommodation provided is estimated at 150,000 volumes. In the basement of this portion of the building are the rooms for the reception of the books, and for classification and binding. Returning to the principal entrance, on the left hand is the entrance into the museum, which consists of five rooms upon the ground floor, and also on the upper floor. Two of these rooms are each 50 feet by 27 feet, two 40½ feet by 26 feet, and one 70 feet by 27 feet. Access to the upper rooms is gained by the principal staircase. They are being fitted-up for the reception of the Derby Museum. The basement under three of the rooms of the museum have been prepared with solid floors for the reception of sculpture and other heavy articles; the others will be used as workrooms by the curator. In the extreme north-east corner of the building, on the ground floor, are three class-rooms and a committee-room; above the committee-room is a lecture-room, 38 feet by 25 feet; and over the class-rooms a larger room, also for lectures, which is intended to accommodate nearly 350 persons. In connection with the different portions of the building are lavatories and other conveniences, including a dépôt for the parcels of exconsumists. Not the least important part of the building is that designed to accommodate the gallery of inventions. It occupies 84 feet by 56 feet, which was intended originally to be left for future extensions. Mr. Brown, however, considering that in a town like Liverpool practical science ought to receive more attention than it was likely to have unless special provision were made for the purpose, thought it was desirable to convert this space to the purpose. Before doing this he consulted, in the first instance, with the Council of the Polytechnic Society, and ultimately all the learned societies were invited to cooperate with Mr. Brown in realising his useful and valuable design. The gallery of inventions will consist of a floor on the level of the basement story, and of two galleries on the level of the ground floor and upper floor, each gallery 20 feet by 12 feet. The entire cost of the building, including the fittings-up by Mr. Brown, and ventilating, will be nearly £40,000, and the whole will be completed by May next. In consequence of the unfortunate defect in the site to which reference has been mentioned, it is necessary to construct extensive foundations—a sort of platform upon which the building is placed—and also the terraced approach or plateau, which is usually regarded as the beginning of the high level road over Byrom-street into Dale-street. We are not aware that any authorised estimate has yet been furnished of these works; but it is believed that, including the land and the alterations in the levels in Shaw's-brow, a sum nearly approaching £100,000 has been expended. This amount would be furnished in part out of the surplus revenue of the Corporation, and in part out of the money raised upon the security of the museum rates. The area actually covered by the building is 3770 yards.

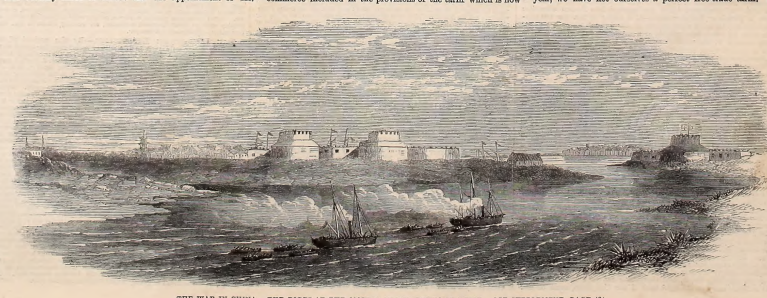
THE REALITY OF THE TREATY WITH FRANCE



THE official publication of a part of the Tariff as arranged under the Commercial Treaty with France very obviously suggests a consideration of the important questions and the large interests involved in the practical completion of the terms of that instrument. As a great national and international question, we believe that the treaty and its concomitants are not understood by the English public. A good deal of the misconstruction and misunderstanding which have prevailed with regard to this subject is owing to a wilful attempt on the part of certain organs, or rather of a certain so-called organ, of public opinion to perplex, and mislead, with reference to the motives which led to the initiation of the treaty, and to misrepresent the probabilities of its results. It would be a mere truism to speak of the effect which a clever, active eloquent, scandalmonger produces, by the mere force of persistence and continuity, on the better, the reluctant, and even the rejecting judgments of those among whom such a character delights to move and have its splenetic being. A parallel to this is to be found in the consequences on the public mind of England by a diurnal absorption of a certain quantity of leading journalism. I say by day, and early in each day, every prominent topic is presented to the notice of the public in a shape rendered attractive by the combination of every quality which forms the perfection of didactic writing; and, with an insensible bias towards a particular point of view, the readers of the newspaper in question enter on the consideration of every subject, great or small, which, for the time being, may interest this country or agitate the world. In the matter of the French Treaty the leading journal did not lead—that is, it was not permitted to anticipate in its columns the announcement of the initiation and negotiation of such a matter. This alone would have been sufficient to excite hostility; but when it was known that the measure probably originated with and was under the conduct of a public man—Mr. Cobden—whose fortune it has been many times to afford material for a great deal of excellent abuse in the columns of our great contemporary, the offence was complete. It is also no secret in certain circles, and it is tolerably well understood in the House of Commons, that personal antagonism to Mr. Gladstone on the part of a scarcely-concealed contributor to the Times has had no little to do with the tone which has been adopted in that paper with regard to the Commercial Treaty. The attempt to remove the excise duty on paper capped the climax. The last proof of this animus is to be found in the fact that the supposed ignorance, or readiness to be led by the nose, of the British public has been so far presumed upon that they have been actually asked to believe that the appointment of Mr. Frederick Peel to the Secretaryship of the Treasury will act as a special interposition between this country and the ruin which is sought to be brought upon it by an ambitious and too daring Chancellor of the Exchequer.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN OF SPAIN.—SEE PAGE 417.

As we have said, it is necessary that some effort should be made to disperse the cloud of prejudice and misstatement in which it has been sought to cosbroud the ideas of our countrymen on the subject of the Treaty with France. The conductors of this Journal have determined that the question shall be thoroughly examined in all its practical bearings; and with that object they have commissioned gentlemen of known ability and reputation to enter on a course of direct inquiries into the statistics connected with every article of trade and commerce included in the provisions of the tariff which is now in process of settlement at Paris. The information so obtained will be embodied in a series of articles which will appear in succession in the columns of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, and in the result it is confidently believed that it will be shown that the French Treaty is a good thing, and worthy of all acceptation by the people of England. It is probable that no adequate opinion of the nature and extent of the new tariff can be generally formed until it is published in its complete form. In a comparatively brief space after that the various trade circulars and the local organs of our numerous industrial districts will go far towards enabling every man who chooses to examine into the matter to decide for himself as to the real character of the Treaty. We believe that every line of the tariff will afford proof of an earnest and honest determination on the part of the French Government to carry out a thorough reform in their commercial system; and it will be found that, as a whole, the scale of duties will be far more liberal than that of the Zollverein, of the United States, or of any other large State out of England. In the meantime, having had placed at our disposal many facilities for acquiring the best and most assured information, it will be our purpose to put the subject before the public on its simple merits in a practical and an intelligible shape.

If the question is approached with a preliminary understanding of certain broad principles, which, as it appears to us, have been the bases of the original negotiation, and have been the guiding influence of the subsequent arrangements, it can hardly be otherwise than that the mists which have to a certain extent arisen between public opinion and a due appreciation of what has already been done, and a hopeful anticipation of what is to come hereafter, will be dispersed. In its very inception the treaty is a tribute and something more to the principles of free trade. We are all freetraders now in the abstract, and it is not necessary to commence the argument with a disquisition on those principles. The main objection, in fact, is that the treaty is, as regards free trade, simply onesided. There is an everlasting bleating about our having given everything to France and got nothing in return. To hear these ignorant or interested arguers, as the case may be, one would think that England had never been haunted or overshadowed by Protectionist principles or Protectionist practice. Just as we think of our existent liberties, we deem of our existent commercial system—we forget that we have not attained to either the one or the other per saltum, but by long years of patient endurance and judicious struggle. In point of fact, we have been fighting the battle of free trade either imperceptibly or overtly since 1815. Up to this moment, notwithstanding the changes of this very year, we have not ourselves a perfect free-trade tariff. It is net certain that even Gladstone and Cobden will see the absolute realisation of these principles which Huskisson advocated, and for which Peel accomplished so much. Are not the wretch paupers of free trade freetraders with exceptions in their personal favour for the retention of protection; and have we not found one of the most ardent abolitionists of the duty on corn fighting against his own party for a retention of a protective duty on corks? All this, and more, may be said of essentially commercial trading, mercantile, barterage, buying and selling England, and yet it is expected that France, a country so self-contained, so self-supporting, so self-reliant, so justly and proudly national, not in the main a commercial country, should at once, without preparation, in a great measure without knowledge of the subject, break down all her fiscal traditions, and spring with one bound into the very heart of the mystery of free trade.

Should it be forgotten that France, in reference to her commercial tariff, has been one of the strongholds of absolute prohibition? For all practical purposes now, prohibition may be taken to be dead. Then, as regards protection, not only have many breaches been made in that solid rampart, but the process of sapping and undermining has been going on. Three species of duties which have been already agreed upon are to be still further relaxed in 1864; and who shall say what may be the effect of the introduction of what we believe to be true commercial principles and the creation of new commercial requirements? Those principles are essentially aggressive. They do not and cannot stand still, but, owing their strength to their truth and justice, they gradually overwhelm the puny opposition of a shortsighted commercial economy. Perhaps in the next three years France and England may have even discovered that iron may be put to a better use than to plate ships-of-war, or to be forged into rifled guns. As to the absence of reciprocity in the terms of the treaty. In the first place, it is not true that we are nothing, with regard to reciprocity in the treaty. We have already got as much as she, considering the difficulties with which she has to contend, can give; we shall get more: and we have got, perhaps, more than we could have given ourselves twenty years ago. But, even if this were not so, we, in entering into a commercial treaty, were not to sell our own principles in their integrity. Could we expect our neighbours to believe in them if we did not carry them out according to their broadest sense? It was our business to teach by example as well as by precept. What we think good for ourselves we offer to others as we possess it; and if France chooses to go by steps in this matter she is pursuing only just the course which England has herself adopted. Of the direct and growing advantages to the trade of this country arising out of this treaty we have no doubt; but we should be loth to see the subject without expressing a conviction that higher and nobler aspirations ought to influence the consideration of the question. The smoothing down of international asperities, the better understanding of international character, and the habit of more abstract and fanciful international jealousies are inevitable on increased commercial intercourse between France and England; and we confidently believe that the time will come when this Treaty of Commerce will be treated historically as a Treaty of Peace.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

On Tuesday the Emperor reviewed the Imperial Guard in the Bois de Boulogne, on which occasion there was also a sham bivouac and encampment. The review was a brilliant affair. There appeared About 20,000 men were present.

After All-Saints' Day (Thursday) the Court was to proceed to Compiegne for a month.

The Prince recently feasted "six hundred" of his "young friends," enfants de troupe of the Guard, and others, in the galleries of Versailles, and took a share in their games in the gardens of the Palace.

The consecration of the cross on the new Russian church in the Rue de la Croix de Roule took place on Tuesday in the presence of a considerable crowd, notwithstanding the inconvenient state of the weather. This handsome gilded cross is, in accordance with the custom of the Eastern Church, raised fifty yards above the roof on which supports it.

It is stated that the Emperor has decided, after having consulted the Marshals of France assembled at the Palace of St. Cloud, that a fourth battalion shall be raised for every infantry regiment of the line, and that battalion is to be called "the battalion of reserve." The Minister of War is already taking measures for the immediate carrying into execution.

By Imperial decree an extraordinary credit of more than thirty-three and a quarter millions of francs is opened to the Minister of Marine for "unforeseen armaments and supplies of provisions and transports required by the expeditions to China and Syria."

Monday's Moniteur publishes the following decree concerning those articles of merchandise of British growth, produce, or manufacture to the treaty of commerce, which are imported into France otherwise than in French or British vessels:—1. Articles of the tariff of Decembergrammes will be levied upon articles of merchandise which are either free from all entry dues or liable to a maximum duty of 5f. per 100 kilogrammes. 2. The section of paragraph 3 of the decree of 18th April, 1860, will be applied when the duty exceeds 5f. per 100 kilogrammes.

Publications put forward by M. Granier de Cassagnac, the editor of the Pays, have given rise to a lengthy correspondence between the Minister of the Interior and the Public Prosecutor, which has been followed by legal proceedings against him, as responsible editor of that paper. These assertions were to the effect that Baron Haussez had received 20,000f. de Tascher, the Minister of the Emperor to interfere again in Italy, and that he had put the question to the French Senate, what French interests were compromised by it. The Opinion Nationale published besides a complete programme of the policy to be henceforward followed by Austria, which policy was embodied in a communication of the Austrian Embassy at Paris to various organs of the press.

ITALY.

The voting in the Neapolitan kingdom has been almost unanimous in favour of annexation. The votes were taken, on Wednesday, that since than a millionvotes have been given for annexation, and about two thousand against it.

From the seat of war the news is brief. On Friday an engagement took place halfway between Teano and Sessa, between the troops of the 5th corps d'armée and the Neapolitan Royalists. After a combat of two hours the latter fell back by way of Sessa upon Garigliano, leaving a great number of prisoners in the hands of the Piedmontese. The Patrie affirms that on this occasion King Victor Emmanuel commanded in person. The tide of war has thus rolled up to the banks of the Garigliano. The result of the engagement, skirmish, or whatever it may have been, between Sessa and Teano, left Victor Emmanuel to the margin of the last bit of territory occupied by an often dynasty in Southern Italy. The line of communication between Capua and Gaeta was certainly in his hands, and everything not shut up in Gaeta, or not in battle array on the right bank of the Garigliano, must be considered as lost. On Monday the outposts of the Piedmontese were skirmishing with the Neapolitans in front of Trajetto, across what is now the frontier river of the small territory held by King Francis. Garibaldi's troops began to cross the Volturno as soon as Cialdini appeared as a conqueror at Isernia, and on the 29th two brigades marched over pontoons towards Cajazzo; but the brigades at Santa Maria, Maddaloni, Caserta, and San Leucio remained in occupation to control the garrison of Capua, the English brigade occupying the farmhouse in advance of Santa Maria. Garibaldi's army is now, therefore, in direct communication with that of Victor Emmanuel, by Cajazzo, Formicola, and Teano; and, indeed, a telegram from Naples reports that the two armies have already effected a junction at Teano.

The English volunteers soon after their landing and reception at Naples—about 400 in number—had interviews of congratulation with the enemy. They landed on the 14th ult, and were brought into action on the 19th. They were in reserve in that day's fight, but not idle. Attacked by two battalions from Capua, they not only defended themselves with bravery, but thrashed the Royalists in such a manner that they will never forget the steel of Saddle Bay. Lieutenant Dunn, Captain Tucker and Private Lewis Mitchell were killed; and Corporal Barnes, Privates Clarke, Wilson, Fisher, Wilkinson, Hall, Dickson, Matthews, and Bate were wounded.

Advices from Naples to the 26th ult. on the 27th ult. the Sardinian flotilla commanded the Royalists near Gaeta. The French Admiral dispatched the frigate Desaix to the scene of action. Admiral Persano in foreign words expressing his regret at the conduct of the French, and afterwards returned to Naples.

From Rome we learn that General Lamoriciere has been created a Roman noble. A decree orders a medal to be struck in his honour. Padre Saccucci, Padre Nuncio, and Padre Ramiere have left Rome for a limited leave of absence. Mgr. Berardi has resigned the Secretaryship of State. His health has been diminished from his post as the Ministry of the Interior. The Duke de Grammont has addressed a protest to Cardinal Antonelli against the answer published by General Lamoriciere in the official journal, Il Giornale di Roma, on the 20th ult. On the 26th inst., in reference to the telegraphic despatch sent by the Duke de Grammont to the French Cabinet, Antonelli

THE VOTING AT NAPLES.

We have animated accounts of the scenes at Naples on the 21st ult., on the day on which the Neapolitan Island underwent the process of annexation. The enthusiasm was very great, and the votes were nearly a universal "Yes." A letter thus describes one station:—

The manner in which the plebe is gratified with the National Guard, who relieve an entrance to all who are not provided with the "pass" given to every elector. On getting this ticket they come up to the table very coolly, and say, "Will you vote 'Sì' or 'Non?'" and the ticket corresponding to the answer is given by the presidents, who sit at the table. The large urn like washing tubs, only made of better wood and turned out in somewhat better style, stands round in the centre, and the crowded state of the room is such that the centre one is closed with a narrow lid for the admission of the tickets, which on the other side fall into the left urn. The object of the arrangement is that everyone goes and helps himself, but in practice the officer takes in succession a number of tickets sufficient for the voters, and "Sì" or 'Non,' which will you have?" "Sì" or 'Non," shouts the president each time he takes a ticket. The majority of the voters say "Sì" as soon as he chooses, and the work goes on merrily enough. Every one knows a "Sì," with the exception of some few who say "Non per Vittorio Emanuele" with all their might, and deposit their tickets, and up the steps we went, and down we came, to see all the sights we could in the time of Santa Lucia presaid, and priests not a few, some monks as well, and blind, lame, and halt, and old men and women, and children, and soldiers and civilians, and, in short, every colour and every shade of opinion, voted peacefully. Oh, Sì, Sì, was uttered with impatience by many, who, hearing the majority of the day had voted, were anxious to begin, and to fully record their full change was to bring them relief from misery, and persecution, and poverty. I was off to the other side of the town, to Monte Oliveto, to see the voting at the city. But it is difficult to get up there, so vast a crowd fills the streets and the many new Garibaldi guards are unwilling to let any one through. The colours of the rainbow were there—the red jackets of the Garibaldini, the various uniforms of the National Guard, the dress of the Neapolitan citizens; the white, and the black, and the grey dresses of the civilians; and, if hats-a-la-mode were to be seen, they were unknown and invisible. Every Neapolitan of all would have been represented by the Neapolitan lads, who are often such fine fellows as to be quite picturesque. There were the boys selling fruit, and uttering the usual shouts, and processions of the populace out of the National Guards, and the Garibaldini, and a great deal of "Viva Garibaldi" in their gyrations, calling out "Viva Garibaldi."

A busy time was up to the Chiaia quarter, Monte Calvario, all the openings into which are so densely crowded that we know not by which to enter. There, however, we succeeded in getting to the spot, and were admitted into the Piazza, which is adorned with evergreens, and arches, and flags. There the same enthusiasm existed as elsewhere, shouts, and bands played at frequent intervals the most popular airs of the day. Here, and in Portinari, I got a glass of lemonade, and a pot of lemons, and bought a basket all that goes forward. There is the same apparent acceptableness in obtaining the vote, with voluntary votes of the people. "Sì or Non, which will you have?" is called out continually, and is sometimes answered with a shout of "Sì, Sì," and sometimes with an expression of contempt for the voter. "What do you think I came here for?" "There were many shouting sights in the streets, and many sights of joy, and many of sorrow, and many of sympathy for the poor old King, who is to be exiled again, so that they did not much time longer to live, who came up to compose the life of Garibaldi, and falling into the arms of the Duke of Genoa. The sight was touching in its rare semblance. A woman called Marianne la Giovannara seemed to excite much interest, and was followed by a crowd wherever she went, and cheered, and listened upon voting. She, an old patriot of the quarter, who had year after year been persecuted by the Bourbon Governor was permitted to vote! It was not to be thought of, and so this exceptional case was permitted, and she voted with many words, which I could not hear, and overwhelmed by a dozen flags. Sgurenta followed her, who passed so many years in the dungeons of Ischia and Procida. A chain of prisoners was called at the fortresses of Maximian party, and who had now returned once more to overcome the effects of a long imprisonment. Amongst the reminiscences of the multitude, the band plays the hymn of Garibaldi, and the people sing the words of the hymn in the superior dialect of Naples. It was not, however, a more affecting sight than that of Felice Piras, captain of marine, who escaped and gave his vote with his crutches supporting him, so as if he were singing his "Nuno dimitis." He threw in his vote, and then fell on the ground, and was carried off, and he sang as if almost convulsed with feeling, and, then ringing, went away.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

A correspondent describes a scene with returned exiles at Naples :—

Poerio's house is in the road to our next station, and we go in to pay him a visit. He is surrounded by his friends, and by those who have returned from the sufferings which he endured whilst concealing himself from the police. Among the latter is Settembrini, who has suffered more than any persons seemingly to great ruin had a history of his own—a history of suffering and privation, which he has recorded himself in a book of great interest, and the Duke of ——, who had been his companion in exposse and of exile in the prisons of Ischia and Procida, and who had come to Naples to welcome him, who told me the following history of his life:—"This day is too full of joy for me to remember my own sorrows. I can remember the dreadful moments of the Bourbons were not merely cruel, they were degrading. Listen to my story. I had a wife and two children, and I was in the enjoyment of a moderate income of 800*l*. My father died in exile, one of my uncles was sent to the Ponte Ischia, where he died, and I was left to the care of my mother and wife. Despite Government espionage, I was employed in 1850, exiled, recalled, and appointed to a post in the Ministry of Finance. I was engaged in preparing a report on the state of the finances, and was working in what and to best I can. This day compensates me for all I have suffered. I was arrested in consequence of the information given to the Government by the officers of the police, who had watched my house. I was dragged to the police-office, and there I was kept for hours. Poerio entered the room, and all thronged to meet him. So affectionate was the welcome, that I remained for some time with Poerio's neck and wept like a child. "Cain yourself, earn nile," said the prison, but he remembered that I was a married man with children, and he left the room; one after the other they all embraced and kissed the guardian of the prisoners, and I was taken to the dungeons of Santo Stefano Ventotene, and buried inquiries were made, and tearful allusions to the past.

AUSTRIA.

The official Wiener Zeitung of Wednesday contains the following Imperial resolution, dated the 20th ult., decreeing the appointments of the different officers in the Court:—Hungary—Councillor of the Empire, Count Mayláth, is appointed Tavernicorum Regalium Hungariæ Comes Perpetuus; Count Jerome, Chief Gentleman Usher; Count Andrassy, Chief Cupbearer; Count Nicholas Esterhazy, Chief Gentleman Chamberlain. Another resolution appoints thirty-nine provincial judges and six referendaries to the Court of Chancery, among whom is Count Cornelius Zeedenyi and Bishop Kotsmizer.

The Cardinal Primate of Hungary has been ordered to commence proceedings for the coronation of his Majesty as King of Hungary, which is to take place at Presburg next spring.

The concessions of the Austrian Government have caused great disappointment in Hungary. An attempt to illuminate led to a riot at Pesth, when some of the mob were shot by the soldiery, and a bad feeling has been hence engendered.

The Austrian Government has promulgated the organic statute for Carinthia; it is somewhat similar to that of Styria, which has caused such great disappointment. The number of deputies is to be thirty-six, among whom are five ecclesiastics, eight landowners, three manufacturers, six deputies of towns, two deputies from the chambers of commerce, and twelve members from the communes.

A Paris telegram states that, according to instructions received from Count Rechberg, Prince Metternich has explained to M. Thouvenel the Austrian policy in the following four points:—1. The interior policy of every State being intimately connected with its external policy, Austria will fulfil with sincerity the reforms announced by the "Diploma" of the 20th of October. 2. Notwithstanding the complications in Italy, Austria will maintain her line of defensive policy. The present armaments are in consequence of events in Venetia have no other object than that of repelling any attack. 3. Austria will not abandon the cause of conservative principles. Austria considers that the assembling of a Congress would not bring about the country's welfare. The Italian question, unless the great Powers agree beforehand on a common programme, is, in her opinion, beyond the reach of conciliation.

The warlike preparations of Austria on the line of the Po, says La Presse, has become, in consequence, more menacing. The recent intelligence announces that a corp of between 40,000 and 50,000 men is concentrated between Brigida and Mantua.

Recent and authentic news from Venetia represents that country as a prison camp. The young men emigrate to serve in the Italian army. Those who remain are subject to endless restrictions and vexations. Every commune is called upon to pay a heavy fine for every youth who goes over the border. Such is the aspect of the country's warlike. Actual civil war with the people—preparations for a war either of defence or aggression.

SWITZERLAND.

The result of the elections for the National Council, which took place on Sunday, is that the friends of the national party remained by M. Stämpfli. In the Pays de Vaud, the Opposition party obtained a majority in the Legislature.

The Federal Council has replied in a verbal note to the demands of French Government, through the Editor of the flag at Son. The Federal Council observes that before the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France no vessels holding foreign colours ever landed on the Swiss shores, and maintains the right to observe in a former despatch in reference to international offences.

SPAIN.

Government has presented a project of law to the Cortes, fixing the strength of the army for 1861 at 100,000 men.

Spain having protested against the entry of the Sardinians into Roman and Neapolitan territory, her Ambassador has received orders to quit Turin. A Charge d'Affaires will remain to conduct the business of the legation.

Marshal O'Donnell declared in last Saturday's sitting of the Senate that the Government had not yet asked for a further delay for the payment of the war indemnity. The Marshal also declared that Spain has Rosa is Rome on a mission, but that Spain is resolved to observe strict neutrality as regards the affairs of Italy.

TURKEY.

The Grand Vizier and Riza Pacha are concerting measures for the improvement of the finances. Ismail Pacha has returned to Jassy in a third servitement. Prince Couza left Constantinople on the 17th ult. Nothing important during his visit. The Grand Vizier is said to be favourable to a forced loan. Auli Pacha has been named Minister for Foreign Affairs. The withdrawal of Riza Pacha from the Ministry is expected. A fresh fight took place at the election of the Greek Patriarch. The British Government has proposed to the Porte an amendment of the commercial treaty of 1838.

UNITED STATES.

The question of who should be President was the absorbing subject in all the States.

A great Wide-Awake torchlight demonstration took place on the 15th, at Boston. The torchlights numbered nearly 8,000 torches.

A terrible gale has passed over the Gulf of St. Lawrence; several buildings were destroyed, trees were blown down high and dry up into the banks. Several vessels are reported as lost.

Accounts from Utah state that Brigham Young has very little idea of the proposed visit of the Prince of Wales to that city, but that with his followers, even for the more genial climate of a Polynesian or an East Indian island, he is not at all Mormon. Mormonism is a religion of prolog on, which is likely to lead to a more firm establishment of the saints in that region. The tabernacle, which for some time after the advent of the Gentile Governor remained closed, has recently been once more opened for public worship.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The Athens, Captain Hall, with the Cape mail, arrived at Plymouth last Saturday morning. She left Table Bay on the 22nd of September, St. Helena on the 1st of October, and Ascension on the 5th. Admiral Keppel was still on his eastern cruise. The H had been taken, and everything, excepting the guns, was thrown overboard. She was going to the Mauritius. The Cape Parliament had been met at a standstill since the Prince's arrival, but were expected to become prorogued after his departure. The Governor was going to Natal, and would proclaim it a separate dependency. A strong feeling adverse to a new war with Kaffirland existed in Cape Colony. The postal money-order system had not been introduced. It was much desired and expected. The South African Turf Club had petitioned that a race on an annual day should be given at the Cape was very inactive. Several failures had taken place. The Colonial finances were satisfactory. The income was £15,000 over the last corresponding half-year.

THE IRISH BRIGADE IN PARIS.—A body of nearly 500 Pontifical prisoners, most of them Irishmen, arrived in Paris three days ago by the Lyons railway terminus. Many of the men had left Rome days by which they were to return to their respective countries, they encamped near the Champs de Mars, and occupied the quarter of the Invalides and of the restaurateurs Bidelaine. These unfortunate men were in want of everything, and with sweet Irish simplicity soon set to work to the amusement of the neighborhood heard of their destitute condition, they sent shirts, stockings, caps, and other articles of clothing to the camp, and made a public collection for the kind treatment they had met with. The Irishmen, about 483 in number, were divided into two bands, one of which left Paris, and the German, till they can be embarked. Several of them seem not to like the idea of returning to their native country, and have found employment at their trades, some as carpenters, tailors, shoemakers, bricklayers, coopers, &c. Some days ago a number of them were taken to the Hôtel-Dieu Hospital, looking only at their distressed condition, are making efforts to find them employment in the capital.

THE LIVINGSTONE EXPEDITIONS.—By the arrival of the Zanzibar dhow, the Rev. Mr. Rebmann has received letters from the expedition of the progress of Dr. Livingstone and his fellow-travellers in the interior of Africa. Mr. Rebmann's letters are dated from Kisuludini, on the 20th of June, one of the Zambesi mountaineers :—"Nyasa, Matabile Country, April 1, 1860.—We have had sufficient rain to make the grass grow, and to cultivate the soil, the year, so you may imagine we are in a state of darkness. Moselikatse has a feeling against us, and will not allow any traders at all to pass. We have been buy the last three months in gardens, and in getting up some sort of dwellings. We have had fever, but not severe. Mrs. Livingstone has been for some time in approaching confinement. I have personally little to complain of. Our supplies of provisions appear to be in a fair state, and we have no reason to complain. We are in security in this district, and we have access to our patience and unpleasant journey to the interior. We have had a little trouble with the natives, but that was owing to their ignorance and great duty that we feel. I am sorry to say that our wheat has utterly failed. We were late in the year, and the rains came on before we expected supplies come, we may have to take to native corn—which is never stuff compared to the wheat. Mr. Rae has gone down to the coast from the time he started the 8th of May, 1860. The writer says:—"No letters have succeeded in getting up to us, except one from Mr. Rae, which was sent back to him, and came up with the Moffatt party, had arrived at Sechele, and brought the news that the old King was on very good terms with them (the missionaries) and Moselikatse. Mr. and Mrs. Mackenzie, of the London Missionary Society, had passed Sechele on their journey to the Matabele, where they intend to stay for the future. A great many traders had reached as far as Sechele during the previous year, and Mr. Oswell, with Mr. Vardon, were accompanied by the Honourable Captain Vernon Harcourt, of the hunting season left. The hostility of the natives had greatly abated since the last account.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams were received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday) :—

NAPLES, Oct. 31.—King Victor Emmanuel has crossed the Garigliano. Capua is taken and besieged by Garibaldi. The bombardment has commenced.

THE WARSAW CONFERENCE.—Berlin, Thursday.—The three northern Powers agreed at Warsaw to decline any proposition for the assembling of a Congress on the Italian question.

TURKEY.—Constantinople, Oct. 27.—There is no political news. The financial fluctuation has taken place during the week. It is expected that Government will negotiate in Paris a 5 per cent loan of £10,000,000 sterling, at 53½. A national forced loan is in contemplation. The Levant Herald has received a warning for an article on this subject and on the corruption of Riza Pacha. The American Legation has not met with a severe accident; his leg is broken, and he is considered to be in a dangerous state. The provinces are all quiet. No news has been received from Syria.

THE WAR IN CHINA.

CAPTURE OF THE TAKU FORTS.

The Taku Forts were captured on the 21st of August, after five hours' hard fighting at the northern forts. The others surrendered.

The enemy was allowed to march out, leaving munitions, &c.

The allies lost 400 killed and wounded.

No British officer was killed.

The 67th and 44th Regiments and the Marines, with 1500 French, were the troops principally engaged.

The allied Plenipotentiaries arrived at Tien-Tsin on the 26th. They would start shortly for Pekin, escorted by cavalry.

The Chinese Government has promised them an honorable reception.

The rebels have withdrawn from Shanghai, and a better feeling of security has since prevailed. On the 18th and 20th of August they attempted to enter the city, but were repulsed with terrible loss.

THE WARSAW INTERVIEW.

The Conference at Warsaw broke up without any definite line of action. On account of the illness of the Dowager Empress of Russia alterations were made in the arrangements for the departure of the Sovereigns. There was no banquet on occasions. The Emperor of Austria left before noon on Thursday. The Emperor of Russia and the Prince Regent left Warsaw the same afternoon.

Count Rechberg has given explanations to the diplomatic corps in reference to the interview at Warsaw. According to him, the conversations Austria put the three following questions to Russia and Prussia, viz.:—

Will Russia and Prussia recognise the facts which have been or may be accomplished in Italy?

Should Austria be attacked by Sardinia, and the latter be supported by another great Power, what would be their attitude?

In the event of another war, part of Italy might be transferred to any part of the territory of the German Confederation, what would Prussia do?

Count Rechberg informed the Diplomatic Corps that the Austrian Government is about to address a circular note to its representatives abroad on the nature and result of the Warsaw interview.

PRINCE ALFRED AT THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

THE reception of his Royal Highness Prince Alfred throughout the Cape Colony has been of the most gratifying character. After visiting Bloemfontein on the 23rd of August he left the capital of the Orange River Free State, and passed through the Cape Colony territory to Port Natal on the 27th. A presentwithstanding a triumphal arch was erected, an address presented by the Mayor, and an entertainment was given at the residence of the Acting Lieutenant-Governor, Major Scott-Nelson. On the 4th of September the Prince presented the 85th Regiment with a new set of colours. Bishop Colenso presented his wife and daughters. Four thousand Zulus, in different bodies, under their separate chiefs, performed their war dance for the entertainment of the Royal Party. On the morning of the 8th of September, at daybreak, the party started on horseback, and, after a rapid ride of fifty-six miles, reached D'Urban dusk. A competitive review was subsequently held by the authorities, and in the evening 300 Kaffirs danced round an immense fire. On the 11th the Prince returned to Cape Town; on the 15th he visited the Botanic Gardens. Nearly half an hour was occupied in viewing a Mokumonkaka specimen of the Kaffir. In the evening there was a ball at Government House. On Sunday, the 16th, his Royal Highness attended service in St. George's Cathedral. On the 18th Table Mountain, 3582 feet high, after receiving deputations from Malmesbury, Riversdale, &c., the Royal party went to the ancient Dutch town, where the Kaffir ball-dance in the open air also present. The great event of the Royal visit in the estimation of the inhabitantsthe laying of the foundation-stone of the breakwater—took place that afternoon. After a suitable prayer by the Dean, Prince Alfred pulled the trigger of a big lever, and, with the assistance of a few men, let loose the first load of stone into the sea—this, with the inauguration of the Sailors' Home, the public library, and a long round of festivities given on the occasion of the Prince's visit, will be a series of brilliant affairs likely to form prominent points in the history of the colony for many years hence. The Prince's embarkation was also a gala scene, the colonists doing every honour to the occasion. His Royal Highness embarked on board the Euryalus on the 19th of September for England.

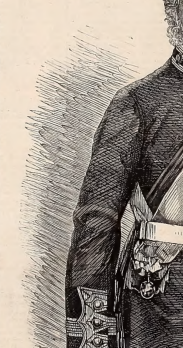
The effect of Prince Alfred's visit upon the native mind is considered to be most favourable. The following is an extract from a letter, one of those reception scenes in Africa which, described by a colonist paper :—"I must further on for the Prince's arrival. A party of men from the Native Reserve were drawn up on each side of the road, those dressed in European clothes being on one side, while the Kaffir-dressed in European clothes being on one side, while the Kaffir-dressed in European clothes being on one side, while the Kaffir-

LITERATURE.

A Book about Doctors. By J. Corbet Jeaffreson. Hurst and Blackett.

About twenty years ago a member of the medical profession, now confessedly standing at the head of a peculiar department of the healing art, to which he has devoted himself, published a work entitled "Physic and Physicians." In one of the pages of Mr. Jeaffreson's work he permits us to know that he has seen the volumes to which we allude. It is very far from our intention to intimate that there is any identity between "A Book about Doctors" and "Physic and Physicians;" but the main idea and some of the features are coincident. Mr. Jeaffreson professes simply an endeavour to collect in a readable and attractive form the best of those medical "sns" that have been preserved by tradition or literature. In doing so, he states, he has not only done his best to combine and classify old stories, but also cautiously to select his materials, so that his work, while affording amusement to the leisure hours of idleness learned in their craft, might contain no line that should render it unfit for the drawing-room table. To effect this it has been found necessary to reject many valuable and characteristic anecdotes, some of them entering too minutely into the mysteries and technicalities of medicine and surgery, and others being spiced with a humour ill-calculated to please the delicacy of the nineteenth century. We are informed that much of the contents of both volumes has never been published before, but, after being drawn from a variety of manuscript sources, is now, for the first time, submitted to the world.

We believe that Mr. Jeaffreson has a blood connection with the medical profession; so that it is easy to account for the peculiarities of his book, while this circumstance probably gave him facilities for obtaining that access to many of its information, both personal and otherwise, which he very pointedly acknowledges. There is no doubt that he has produced a very amusing work. He has evidently approached his subject with a fulness of material which appertains to an embarrassment; and he seems to have plunged into the midst of his heterogeneous matter, and endeavoured to cut his way out of it, without any very special reference to plan or sequence. Looking to the professed character of the book, we are not prepared to say that a kind of nervous desultoriness, so to speak, is to be ranked as a fault. If the information be there, and it seems that he did, that one might take up either of his volumes, open it at any page, and be sure to find something to entertain, and often a good deal to interest, there is no doubt that he has quite succeeded. We also reference to his own conclusion, we may say that among his anecdotes we meet with some old acquaintances, and under circumstances which, unless there has been a restoration of them to their original proprietors, bear the appearance of having been pressed into the immediate service of the present writer. The first volume bears on it more of the defects or merits, as the case may be, of purely random reading, running as it does through such subject-matter as Sticks and Wigs, Early English Physicians, Sir Thomas Browne, Sir Hans Sloane, the Apothecaries and Sir Samuel Garth, Pimlico, John Radcliffe, the Doctor as a bon-vivant, Pets, Pedagogues turned Doctors, the Generosity and Parsimony of Physicians, Bleeding, and Richard Mead. In the body of these chapters the transitions are often abrupt and sometimes apparently not adapted for antithetical purposes, but as if the author found he has a good story which the thought of at the moment, and which, perhaps, refers to Brodie, when his immediate subject is Garth or Radcliffe. It may be said in passing that the narrative of the latter personage is among the best in the book. In the second volume, as we think, Mr. Jeaffreson's qualities as a practised author are better brought out. The tone is higher; there is less effort to be droll; but what is set down is, nevertheless, not less amusing. The chapter on "Doctoresses" and "Wise Women," to whom our ancestors intrusted the care of themselves, their wives and children, with as much confidence as we of the present generation repose in the members of the College of Physicians, is especially notable. We continue to not having the heart of Joanna Stephens, a most successful "wise woman," who, ignorant and vulgar, just before the middle of the last century, proclaimed that she had discovered a sovereign remedy for a painful malady which, like the smallpox, has become the bane of modern surgery so manageable that ere long it will be ranked as little more than a "contagious discomfort." This Joanna was a courageous woman. She went straightway to Temporal Peers, Bishops, Duchesses, and so on, and told them she was the woman for their money. They believed her, testified to the marvellous cures which she had effected, and allowed her to make use of their titles to save scoptics into respect for her powers. On her offering to make her remedy public on consideration of £5000, subscriptions from persons of the highest rank poured in, but the amount demanded was not reached, and an application was made to Parliament for a grant of the required sum, which was actually acceded to. A Commission was appointed by Parliament, which gravely inquired into the pretensions of the woman alleged to have been performed by her, and a certificate in her favour was signed by the Commissioners, among whom were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor (Hardwicke), half-a-dozen Peers, two Bishops, and last, and under the circumstances by no means the least, such members of the medical craft as Chandler, Mead, and Sharp. The "full discovery of the medicine" for which £5000 of the public money was given proved that the "wise woman" had only guiled twenty more or less wise men. In the most cursory glancing through these volumes it would be easy to pick out many bits, and they contain many temptations to make extracts; but for the very reason, in common fairness, we abstain from quotation. As this is a book which is likely to be very much read, that is the reason why as little as possible of its contents should be anticipated in that which we intend to be a decidedly recommendatory notice.



A Primer of the Art of Illumination for the Use of Beginners. By F. Delamotte. E. and F. N. Spon.

The art of illumination or miniature-painting has ever been held in veneration and esteem, not only for the sacred uses to which it was in early times applied in multiplying and adorning copies of the offices of the Church and other devotional books, but for the having been with means, in the seclusion of the cloister, of perpetuating the practice of painting through all the period of the dark ages when in the other world the arts of design and all their refining influences were crushed and annihilated. And the general harvest, the reaping which took the fourteenth century in Italy, and as late as to the sixteenth in England, miniature-painting affords the sole means of tracing the progress and development of art, the sole record of many of the manners, habits, and peculiarities of national manners, costume, &c., which the painter's hand could minutely realise. Any one who contemplates, therefore, who would make intelligent research amongst these unique and invaluable remains in all countries, with a view to the gaining a sense of them in colours, in a form and at a price adapted for general circulation, would confer a boon both upon art in the abstract, and upon archæology, whose secrets are locked up in it; and we hope one day to see the experiment attempted.

But it is a very different thing to esteem and study the illumination of past ages for the art-history and archæological revelations which they supply, and to seek to revive the art itself for mere purposes of ornamentation, and by the hand of "beginners." It must be obvious that in the ornamental work so produced the interest in art-history, as well as the archæological interest, is wanting; and with some rare exceptions, the high inventive mind and technic excellence are absent also. Amongst the miniature-painters of olden time were Giotto, Simone Memmi, Fra Angelico, Sparacino, Julio Clovio, John van Eyck, and Memling—names holding the highest rank in purest art; and anything that would spread a knowledge of their works in this form would ripen and improve our appreciation of art in its noblest and most interesting period. Beside such works as them the mere efforts of "beginners" and apprentices to decorate books with coloured and gilded effigies—too often unmeaning, or of useless meaning—must be looked upon as a mockery.

Nevertheless, the practice of illuminating is becoming more in vogue amongst us, perhaps from a right hand in hand with that of architectural decoration; and the taste for them appears to have taken so deep a root that it will not easily be eradicated. It is certainly desirable, if the thing is to be done at all, that it should be done as well as possible—from at least, as far as may be found practicable, of defects attributable solely to a want of knowledge of the materials to be employed and the proper method of using them. We therefore give welcome to Mr. Delamotte's little volume, the necessity for which is thus stated in the preface :—

> Persons possessed of real artistic skill turn their attention to it (illumination), and, after designing and executing work which, according to all the rules of art known to them, ought to produce a correct and pleasing result, are amazed at the ungainly appearance which is the reward of their labour. The secret of this is, they are unacquainted with the fundamental principles of the art. Others, setting to work in a still more hopeless plight, have a specimen of medieval illuminating work, and endeavour to produce an accurate copy of it: they, too, are amazed at finding that, after all the pains bestowed on it, their copy has an effect so different from that of the original. The secret of this is, they are unacquainted with the peculiar method of manipulation, the process, so, used in illuminating. What is wanted is elementary instruction in, first, the principles; and, secondly, the practice of the art.

The author, in his opening chapter, states that "the science" (query, art?) "of archæology, and the power of its illuminating metal-working, wood-carving, embroidery, and perhaps we may add fresco-painting, passed hand in hand through a nearly parallel course of development through the middle ages, all culminating together, as far as chastenes of design and elegance of execution were concerned, in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and, as far as profuseness and richness of ornamentation were concerned, in the fifteenth," and he especially instances the parallelism between illumination and architecture :—

> Thus, whilst the seven straight lines and semicircles of the Norman school prevail, a corresponding simplicity of outline characterises the illuminations of the period; the same grouping of square lines and circles, the same absence of curves round the capitals of the columns, form the components or terminals of the initials in the service-books, as in the architectural details of the same period; and, in short, the mode of treating and the elementary forms of writing. When the graceful and luxuriant curves of foliage begin to steal into the pages of the MS. they are to be found also forming the capital of the column, though here it must be confessed the former somewhat outruns the latter—a style of illumination generally known as the Opus Anglicum, and claimed as the peculiar invention of this country, having been in use more than a century before the Italian, which is one of its characteristics, appears in the capital. Further on, when flowers are added to foliage in the one, they appear in the other; when the naturalist principle is introduced into architecture it shows itself in illumination; and when outline is in the one almost buried under profuse adornment of detail, the other seems to have all the richness, animal as well as vegetable, of the park and the flower-garden poured over its pages to embellish them.

The student is directed to look upon the mediæval books as the grammar of the art of illumination, and Mr. Delamotte recommends application to the fundamental principles involved in it for the guidance of modern intelligence in new and original forms of development appropriate to the genius of the age. What the author, however, has not the taste or inventive faculty to apply the principles to advantage, he would recommend absolute copying, rather than absurd originality; and he supplies a dozen pages of examples from accessible manuscripts in the British Museum, printed in colours and gold, for the purpose of study and imitation. Some useful remarks on colours and instruments to be used complete the work, which, pretending to be a merely practical manual, will be widely recommended for adoption to those who take practical interest in the subject.

The British Tariff for 1860-61. By Edward Bendell. Daily Brothers.

This is an annual work which has attained a very credible position among the class for whose information it has been compiled, as is shown by the simple fact that it has no less than four thousand subscribers. It contains the customs and inland revenue duties and drawbacks; the laws and regulations of importation, exportation, warehousing, and transhipment; the new customs charges on the entry of free and dutiable goods; a complete list of all the ports or principal places of shipment throughout the world, distinguishing the countries to which they respectively belong; the treaty with France; the Merchant Shipping Consolidation Act, with practical observations on the admeasurement of ships; registering, transfer and mortgage; safety; and prevention of accidents; wrecks, casualty and salvage; the Inland Bonding Act, the Wine Licensing and Refreshment-houses Act; practical information in respect to customs bonds and to the clearance of ships and merchandise; the colonial customs duties, the stamp duties, licences, and assessed taxes chargeable in the United Kingdom; the ports, subports, and creeks of the United Kingdom, with the name and rank of the officers and stations; numerous tables, comparison of timber and wood, ships' stores regulations, forms of entry and declaration, foreign weights and measures, besides orders in council treaty and customs orders, with tables of duties, information compiled from official sources, which are eminently calculated to be useful to merchants, Parliamentary agents, shipowners, shipbrokers, agents, and all persons engaged in foreign commerce. The requisite information, it will be seen, is brought down to the present moment, and embraces all the alterations which occurred in our commercial and fiscal arrangements in the last session. Of the value of the work we believe it is unnecessary to say anything; our object is to direct attention to the fact of its publication.

The Religiary. No. II. Edited by Llewellyn Jewitt, F.S.A. London : J. Russell Smith. Derby : W. Bemrose.

The second number of this depository for precious relics—legendary, biographical, and historical—includes notices of the habits, customs, and pursuits of our forefathers, the last being published. There is no falling off in quality from the first number, which was published in July; and, on the whole, it is rather more full, more varied, and embraces a somewhat wider field of research, although, for reasons that are apparent enough, there is a lingering tendency towards Derbyshire archæology. The illustrations are numerously and carefully executed.

Rodgrid it with Alice Baillie, Parochial Schoolmaster, North Berwick and Elsewhere. By William J. Steward. Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday.

This is one of those kindly books for boys which of late have assumed an important place in our literature. The scene is a Scottish parochial school, into which an English boy is inducted. The peculiar characteristics of the people and the country are strongly marked; and there is a freshness in the tone of the book which is calculated to give it a place beside those representations of English schools with which the public, old and young, have of late become familiar.

Handbook to the Geology of Weymouth and the Island of Portland. By Robert Damon. E. Stanford.

Mr. Damon is well known to the scientific world as a most industrious resident geologist at Weymouth. Having said thus much, we scarcely need add that his little book may be relied on as a trustworthy guide to the study of geology in this interesting part of our island. The natural history of the locality has not been omitted by our author, and he has included a complete record of the fossil remains discovered by the many scientific geologists who have visited this spot from time to time. The book is rendered complete by the addition of a map of the district, a sectional geological chart, plates of fossils, and numerous other illustrations.

A Description of the Human Body : its Structure and Functions. Illustrated for Popular Instruction Generally. By John Marshall, F.R.S. &c. Day and Son.

Mr. Marshall has evidently bestowed a considerable amount of labour on the preparation of this volume, which is in every way suitable to the wants of the non-medical teacher of anatomy. Doubtless its freedom from the action of the Government Department of Science and Art is an additional guarantee of the value of its preparation. The text is from trustworthy sources, and is accompanied by an atlas of fully-executed lithographic plates, which must clearly depict the various parts of the body, and which will be found of great convenience to teachers desirous of rendering their lessons illustrating the text. The work is well adapted to assist in communicating a general knowledge of the organization and uses of the different parts of this wondrous frame of ours.

THE ARRIVAL AND RECEPTION OF THE BRITISH GARIBALDIANS AT NAPLES.

Mention was made in our last Impression of the arrival at Naples of the British "excursionists," and its correspondent number, at page 411 and 414-415, we give illustrations of their arrival and reception. The Emperor and the Ardent, the two steamers chartered by Mr. Peto, on board, entered the harbour on Sunday, the 14th ult. Salutes were fired and returned, and all was at last alive with expectation. The landing of the volunteers did not take place, however, until the following morning. Their reception by the people was almost as enthusiastic as that of Garibaldi himself. The Neapolitans, with the English flag, went out to meet them, with music playing. Ten thousand people accompanied them to the quarters assigned to many of flowers. Everybody had a nosegay in his hand, and, if he carried a rifle, another in the muzzle of it. The streets were filled by the procession. A halt was made in the square of the Royal palace. General Türr went to salute the legion. Then the march through the Toledo began, the whole way to the barracks. All the windows were lined with ladies, waving handkerchiefs, strewing flowers, and showering bouquets, boxes, and baskets down upon the street, struck up the National Anthem while the legion passed them. The shower of confetti was incessant. Everywhere was a sense of security that it darkened the air like a shower of rain. Ladies and gentlemen, everybody of note in the town, went up to the volunteers to shake hands with them, and to express to them in English how glad the Neapolitan ladies shed tears from emotion. The scene evidently took these young men quite by surprise. They were not at all prepared for it. So under the embraces of the people, and kept on shaking hands, right and left, and waving the Union Jack, in funny confusion, they went. At last they hit upon crying hurrah and waving their rifles over their heads—a sign to be understood by everybody. In the evening, but the rain interfered with it. Wherever, during the whole day, one of the English legionaries showed his face he was cheered. A letter from Naples, dated Oct. 10, says:—"The Neapolitan Guards were drawn up in the square, and paid military honours to the generous sons of Albion as they passed along. Viva Garibaldi the soldiers were literally buried in flowers—flowers on every musket, flowers on their knapsacks, flowers on their caps. The Union Jack, the flag was borne in the middle of the legion; over the last of the body waved the flag of England. The English volunteers seemed to be overcome by their reception. Enthusiastic as the Neapolitans were the enthusiasm of the English was greater still. In short, all yesterday Naples was the scene of a great fête in honour of the English soldiers. The Neapolitan hackney-coaches were all filled with the soldiers, who kept driving up and down, clearly without any definite purpose beyond that of the coachman's driving as fast as he could, and of their cheering to their heart's content. From time to time they struck up 'God Save the Queen,' which the Neapolitans received with tremendous cheering, being clearly under the impression that it was a republican revolutionary appeal expressly composed for the political necessities of the moment.

something like reasonable limits, the admissions were too numerous to make dancing possible, and there was no room left of no consequence to stroll aided to interrupt the proceedings of the right. Whether some Orangeman had got himself engaged among the carpenters who had to floor the Academy where the ball took place, and avenged himself and his friends by withdrawing one of the supports, or whether the hurry in which the arrangements were completed caused the work to be "scamped," has yet to be explained. But certain it is that, at the time when the crowd was greatest, the floor began to sink, and the greatest alarm was felt by the astonished lords and ladies who found themselves in a sort of wooden pond. No harm was done; and it is to the credit of American society that there was no panic, no screeching and scrambling out, as is always witnessed in England when the slightest alarm is given at a theatre or other place. The floor was repaired, the Prince had a dance with "the stately Mrs. Morgan (wife of the Governor of the State), in a cloud of crape alive with diamonds"—we quote an American paper, But the whole affair seems to have been dissatisfactory to the Prince's hosts, though neither his Royal Highness nor his fellow-countrymen can feel otherwise than gratified at the demonstration. The visit of Prince Alfred at the Cape is also concluded. His reception throughout the colony has been most gratifying, and the effect of his visit upon the native mind is considered to be favourable in the extreme. Prince Alfred has taken part in many important ceremonies at the Cape. He has inaugurated a Sailors' Home, and has laid the foundation-stone of a Breakwater in Table Bay—setting out for a Kaffir Tribe, Moshesh, which numbers many high political purposes, and afford to our Princes the very best means of education, in an extended experience of men under diverse circumstances.

Lord Palmerston's progress in the north of England has been a very successful one, but it has been brought to a somewhat premature termination by the indisposition of Lady Palmerston, upon whom the Premier, as the only actually active piece of politics which has been transacted has been the Boston election, where Mr. Malcolm, a Conservative, has defeated Mr. Tuxford, a Liberal, by a majority.

In the obituary of the week will be found, we are sorry to say, the name of a very remarkable man, Lord Dundonald, for so many years known as the daring, the indefatigable, the persecuted Lord Cochrane. His whole long and energetic life has been active, and to the very last he was engaged in efforts for the vindication of the supremacy of his own country. It is gratifying that the brave man had not to wait for reparation for unmerited harshness until the end of his career, but that right was done to his manly spirit in time for him to enjoy it; whether he has left instructions as to the use of the terrible secret by which as he believed (though the authorities did not) that he could annihilate an enemy's fleet at a single blow. It may be useful in the days that seem to be coming. Lord Dundonald found time, though quite recently, to publish a couple of volumes of his own autobiography.

Sad news for the wine-drinkers. The vintage throughout France is declared to be a "lamentable" one. At Bordeaux the wine will be the worst that has been known for many centuries. In Champagne all will be bad. In Burgundy things are melancholy, but the proprietors are trying the aid of sugar—a hearing with small comfort in it. Cognac gives wine sorely deficient in alcohol, which deficiency will not suit the rocky metropolis of Hungary. Roussillon and St. Emilion are said to be capable of better things; but Orleans again is unlucky. And the Rhine and the Moselle are swollen by the tears of the proprietors whose wine will be "scarcely drinkable." Mr. Gladstone's Act is not inaugurated under very favourable conditions.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Major-General Henry Pemberton Berkeley, C.B., K.H., Commander-in-Chief of the forces in Ceylon, and acting Lieutenant-Governor of that Island, was sworn under £40,000 by the London Gazette, and proved by Rev. George A. Longdale (two of the deceased's sons), and Francis S. Clayton, Esq. The personal property is sworn under £30,000, and the will is dated 1859. It bequeaths in the sum of £30,000, on immediate legacy of £500, together with the interest of £10,000 for the maintenance of his wife, and the remainder equally divided between his children, and bequeaths his landed property situated in various parts of Kent, Essex, and Suffolk, in separate portions to each of his sons, and on the decease of his wife the interest of £10,000 to them in separate portions the principal sum of £30,000. To the widow and children of his deceased son, Barrendale Berkeley, he leaves the sum of £10,000. There are legacies left to his executors, and to some of the servants of his household, which are all stated to be in the employ of the testator at his decease. His property, real and personal, devolves upon his sons, who take the same equally between them. This gentleman was a man of great ability and antiquities, and has left various choice specimens to be distributed amongst friends. He will leave behind him a name that will live long after the 20th of September.

The will of Thomas Westby, Esq., late of No. 9, York Gate, Regent's Park, was proved in London on the 25th of October, by three of the executors appointed in the testament, namely, Lieutenant-Colonel Frederick Westby, Miss Caroline Mary Westby, the daughter; and Thomas W. P. Beauchamp, Esq. The personalty in England was sworn under £40,000. The executors for Ireland are Edward Pentland Westby, Esq., the son; and Maurice Keane, Esq., of Beech Park, Clare, Ireland, the son-in-law. The will is dated April 24, 1862, a codicil in 1858, and another in 1859. To his wife, the Hon. Emily Westby, he bequeaths a life interest in the freehold property at Nos. 9 and 10, York-gate, Regent's-park, the furniture, and other effects he left to her absolutely; and to his children, Caroline Mary Westby, Thomas Westby (with exception, to be divided in certain proportions amongst them), and daughters—Emily, Christina, and Henrietta) an reversionary interest in the freehold property at the decease of his wife. There are specific legacies also to his sons and daughters, and legacies to his executors and personal friends, and also to Eliz. Ann Keane, the wife of Edward Percival, and to her children. The testator died on the 24th of August last, aged seventy-three.

LORD PALMERSTON IN YORKSHIRE.

HIS LORDSHIP AT LEEDS.

Lord and Lady Palmerston, accompanied by the Hon. Mr. Cowper, have been making a visit to Yorkshire and Lancashire. As stated in our last week, they arrived at Leeds on Wednesday se'nnight. Thousands awaited the Premier at the station, and, whilst the carriage was being got ready, cheered him and Lady Palmerston in right Yorkshire style. While the officials and servants were running to and fro, a way through the crowd to the carriage door, a demand was made for "a bit of a speech." The noble Lord laughed, and declined; but the people insisted on having a speech, contrary to etiquette. At length, however, observing the coachman seated with reins in hand, and the carriage-door open, the noble Lord stepped up to a triple row of seats behind the coachman's box, and, beckoned up to a triple row of seats behind the coachman's box, and, beckoned up to a triple row of seats behind the coachman's box, and, beckoned

The command of the whole devolved upon Lieutenant-Colonel Heathcote, Colonel Cumberbatch, and Major Hulme, of the Rifle Rifles. The corps were put through the usual manœuvres, and Lieutenant-Colonel Heathcote complimented the men upon their soldierly appearance, and the skill with which they had gone through the various evolutions.

The shooting-match of the 6th Surrey Rifles took place on Thursday week at Petworth Park, by the kind permission of Lord Leconfield. The match was contested by the officers of the corps, was won by Private Aylwin; the second prize, a Whitworth rifle, by Mr. Bell; the third prize was won by Sergeant Sherwin; the third prize, a Jarvis Enfield rifle, given by Major Bartleet, was won by Ensign Parsons. The match, which was open to the challenge cup, presented by Mr. W. T. Mitford, M.P., to the 6th Surrey, was won by Private Aylwin.

A contest came off yesterday week at Sneyd Park between a detachment of the 2nd Gloucestershire Rifle Volunteers and a detachment of the 1st Gloucestershire battalion. Two members of each company were selected to represent the regiment, and the contest was between the two picked men. The prizes to be competed for were a silver cup, value £10 10s., given by the officers of the battalion, for the highest average of points, and a bronze medal given by the Lieutenant-Colonel, for the highest number of points, making the greatest number of points. The Bristol corps won the cup, and a number of the Clifton corps (belonging to the latter) the medal.

On Saturday Mrs. Litter, the wife of Lieutenant-Colonel Litter, presented the prizes to the successful competitors in the annual competition of the 1st Kent. The regiment, which had assembled for full-dress parade, was drawn up in a square in front of Kennington Hall, the residence of Colonel Litter. Shuttleworth, Private Crowther, and Captain Parker, in the first watch; Private Wilkinson, Private Hargreaves, and Corporal Cunliffe, in the second; Corporal Cooke, Private Kane, Private Wilson, Private Calhoun, and Private George Cunliffe, in the third match. In the third match, the prize was won by Sergeant Goddard (who obtained a badge of distinction for scoring the highest number of points (99) in the first match).

On Wednesday week an interesting volunteer demonstration took place in Chatsworth Park, the property of the Duke of Devonshire, in the presence of which many members belonging to the various rifle corps in Derbyshire participated, and, engaging in the combat which took place, numbered about 1500 volunteers were on the ground. At two o'clock the reviewing officer, General Sir Love Parry Jones, K.C.B., took up his position in front of the corps on the ground, and as the line presented a most imposing appearance, the General expressed himself highly pleased with it. After the volunteer evolutions had been gone through by Lieutenant-Colonel Wilmot, the Duke of Devonshire's corps of Sedan, Surrey, and Kent had a gala day on Monday at Eyre in the practical pursuit of the 3rd Queen Parts. This is commenced with a match between twelve members of the Hastings corps and twelve members of the Eye corps—Lieutenant Cooke and Ensign Pellingham commanding respectively. The competition resulted in the Hastings men making 172 points as against 151 accomplished by the Eye. From the various corps about 120 members entered into competition for a silver cup as the first prize, and a handsome gold and a bronze medal as second and third. After a highly-spirited contest Sergeant Paschall, of the Hastings corps, was declared the winner of the cup. There were about 200 volunteers on the ground, and at least 4000 other persons.

The Army and Navy Gazette states that the proper muster-rolls of the volunteer force will be ready ought to have been delivered on the 1st of December last, are not yet complete, and the War Office are taking steps to obtain the returns. In this service, Lieutenant Wodsky, of the 1st Surrey Rifles, is under 120.00.

The first annual prize-shooting matches of the 2nd Lancashire (Blackburn) Rifles took place at Higher Audley on Friday and Saturday (last week). The shooting proportion, with the number for a prize, was as follows:—Ensign Calrose, to be won twice successively by the same member before it became his absolute property. There were twenty-five entries, and the successful competitor was John Pickering, of the Blackburn corps. For the Mayor's Cup, a silver tankard, there were twenty-four competitors, and it was won by Mr. Hall Volunteers prize was next for. There were fifty entries. On the conclusion of the match it was found that the highest number of points (99) was, Ensign Radcliffe (Blackburn) and Mr. Kemp (Manchester), 9 each; and Ensign Eccles (Blackburn), 8. The shooting was resumed, and the first to bring shot off, Ensign Radcliffe won the first prize, Wesley Richards' breech-loading rifle, and Mr. Kemp won the second, a Whitworth rifle. On Monday the shooting for Aldermen Boyne's silver cup, value £10ten guineas, was commenced. The distance was 600 yards, and the number of two hours, the cup being won by Ensign Eccles. On Monday night the prizes were presented to the successful competitors, and the cup to Mr. Eccles, in a numerous audience.

On Tuesday, at eleven o'clock, the Right Hon. Sir Hamilton Seymour, in the absence of a large number of the members of the Middlesex Rifles, on the presence of a large number of the members of the Middlesex Rifles, on the grounds in connection with the House, Piccadilly, distributed a series of prizes which had been given by the Lieutenant-Colonel and officers of the corps. The Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Somerset, Lord Elcho, Lord Ranelagh, and Mr. Byng, M.P., were among the company present. The prizes, which were of the value of £100, consisting of gold and silver, were displayed with much taste upon a sort of dais erected in the centre of the ground. The Duke of Cambridge, who was received with loud cheers, presented the prizes to the successful competitors. After the distribution was over the Duke of Cambridge, Lord Elcho, and Lord Ranelagh addressed the corps—the value of it being upwards of 100 guineas. (We intend giving an engraving of the first work of art next week.) The Duke of Cambridge inspected the corps at some length, and then presented the numerous prizes. After this had been done several of the officers of the corps, the Duke of Cambridge, and St. George's cups, was then presented by the Rev. Dr. Irons, on the part of that body, in the name of the subscribers, to Lieutenant-Colonel Lindsay, the founder of the movement, to which Colonel Lindsay, on the part of the corps, made a suitable response.

The numerous volunteer corps of Hampshire and the Isle of Wight met together on Monday, the 29th ult., for the purpose of a review in the city of Winchester. Lieut.-Colonel M'Donald, Rifle Depôt Battalion, was in command of the whole force, which was divided into two bodies, the 1st and 2nd brigade being under the command of Major Wombwell and Major Hall, the latter having been appointed to the command of the 2nd Brigade Major. The 1st division was under the command of Major Wombwell, and the 2nd division was under the command of Major Hall. After being Lord William Paulet, The Marchioness of Winchester, and the evening a grand ball took place, which was very numerously attended by the aristocracy. The number of volunteers present was 2000, and the spectators were at least 10,000.

The grand review of the Surrey and Kent battalion of Lancashire rifle volunteers commenced on Monday morning, on their own ground, near Penge Common, by the Duke of Cambridge, accompanied by Lord Clarence Paget and brothpart. The first contest was for the Hightown Stakes, valued £60, presented by the Hon. Colonel Stanley, M.P., and was won by Mr. Ellis, the prize of £20, and a third prize of £10 were offered by the committee. The prizes were won by Mr. Ellis, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Hall. The Derby Dipot Battalion; second prize, £7 10s.; third prize, £5. The second stake was for a purse of £25, given by the committee. The second stake was for a purse of £25, given by the committee. The second prize was £10, and a third prize of £10, both of which were given by the committee. The Mayor's Cup, value £50, presented by the Liverpool Volunteers, was the first prize. For the second and third prizes there were three ties—Mr. Ellis and Mr. Wilson, Mr. Hall and Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Ellis and Mr. Hall. The first round all three scored one. In the second round Mr. Dunlop and Mr. Wilson each scored two, and Mr. Ellis one, and in the second prize. In the third round, Mr. Stanley and Mr. Bean made one point each. In the fourth round Mr. Stanley scored one, and Mr. Bean two, against the third prize. The third contest was for a silver cup, value fifty guineas, presented by Messrs. Webb and Hunt. The second prize of fifty guineas was presented by Messrs. Webb and Hunt. Mr. C. O. Pole, of the 5th Lancashire Rifle Volunteers, and Mr. Wilson, of the Liverpool corps, scored eleven, were tied for the first and second prize. On a second trial at 200 yards, Mr. Wilson scored eight points, and Mr. Richards scored a centre, which counts two. Mr. Richards consequently won the prize. The fourth contest was for a silver cup, value £50, and was played during the whole of the day. At the "pool" targets there was a very large competition, and numerous prizes, amounting to £100 in value, were arranged for. On Tuesday there were only two prizes to be contested for, and the contest was for a silver cup, value £50, and was won by the challenge cup, value fifty guineas, presented by the Earl of Elcam etc. The prizes were distributed on Wednesday by Lord Elcho, and were presented from the volunteer companies of the county. The 1st company of the 4th Lancashire Rifle Volunteers, of which Mr. Ellis is the Captain, won the first prize of £50, presented by the Mayor of Liverpool (T. D. Anderson, Esq.), and distributed to the men of the corps. The Mayor's Cup, value £50, presented by the Liverpool sporting weekly paper, Bell's Life, was won by Mr. Ellis, of the 4th Lancashire Rifle Volunteers, and the second by Sergeant Hall

LITERATURE AND ART.

Mr. Thackeray tells us in one of his novels of a gentleman named "Crocky Doyle" with whom it was positively delightful to quarrel, owing to the elegant apologies which "Crocky Doyle" was in the habit of making, subsequently. We wonder whether grumbling critics ever experience any gratification at failing into error, in order, having thus done their duty, afterwards put a rectification of their blunders on record? We cannot speak for our brethren: but for ourself, we must confess that few things give us greater satisfaction than personally, we can say that we have sinned, either through omission or commission. We have not anything very serious to apologise for this week, and are not, as yet, in the position of receiving "Crocky Doyles," but it appears to us that a number or two since we had occasion to animadvert upon the following announcement by Mr. Dickens and Mr. Thackeray, which happened to be more than half erroneous.

We had begun to indulge in a lively anticipation of "monthlies" running in parallel lines—one by the author of "David Copperfield," the other by the author of "Vanity Fair"—when we suddenly perceived at the time-honoured tariff of one shilling, and in the traditional green and yellow covers, "I is of Vere," by the latter author, and authoritatively announced, but the Bonnia serial, "Great Expectations," is to appear in the columns of All the Year Round. Of course, the announcement of which, as yet, that nonsuis nubes, is to adorn the pages of the Cornhill Magazine; and the hazy rumour that the scene of the first monthly work was to be laid in Rome seems to be accounted for by the exquisitely written "Roundabout Journey" in the current number of the Cornhill, in which we are treated to a week's holiday in the Eternal City in the Low Countries. All ye who wish to know how to enjoy Antwerp, Rotterdam, and the Hague, and the intervening towns, will find ample enshrined, should read "The Roundabout Journey."

A very important literary event during this present November will be the publication of Mr. Hepworth Dixon's "Personal History of Lord Bacon." Some portion of its contents has appeared in the Athenæum, where considerable additions and alterations have been made. If there be one man most qualified to speak and write of Francis of Verulam it is the barrister of Gray's Inn, Recorder of Howard and Blake. Basil Montagu knew a great deal about Bacon, but he knew still more in a fog of Chancery practice and nonsense; and although his Verulamian studies were prodigious, Bacon the man was in his love engulfed in Bacon the philosopher. Mr. Hepworth Dixon has written, we believe, with unusual advantages of personal sources of information, and from the documents he has brought to light we expect a full and correct account of the career of Bacon. We have reason to believe that there will not be any "scandal about Queen Elizabeth" in Mr. Dixon's book, but that the Virgin Queen will come out gloriously as regards the illustrious man whom in boyhood she was wont to call her "young Lord Chancellor;" and, finally, let us hope that we shall be definitely convinced that Bacon was neither the greatest and wisest—and was not the meanest—of mankind.

We read in the Continental papers that Mr. Edward Lucas will have engaged upon a paraphrase of "God Save the Queen," which, in its altered and emasculated state, will be sung by the unmarried young ladies at the Boston Academy of Music on the occasion of the Prince of Wales's visit to the intellectual capital of the Union. This is not well, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Better to have no national anthem alone than to make it a piece of stump oratory. He who wrote "Evangeline" and "The Spirit of Poetry" should be above that department of cobbler's work which is known as "translating." There is a great deal opposite to the spirit of poetry and music in Mr. Arnold, of the English Opera House, who, when the Duke of York and his consort visited his establishment, determined to, after, but in a new vein to, the Duke of Wellington. Mr. Arnold was not much of a poet. He broke down at the second line of his stanza, and could think of nothing better for a climax than "Queen" (as yet to business) a reference to his own residence. So the new verse ran thus:—

> Preserve the Royal pair,
> May they all blessings share,
> Twenty-four. Golden-spoons.
> And save the King!

The manager lived at 24, Golden-square, as aforesaid.

From the English Opera House our pens are constrained to give place to Mr. Beazley's Lyceum Theatre—we turn to the new Grand Opera which the Parisians are erecting on the Boulevard des Italiens, which is to be a temple dedicated solely to the lyric muse even the marvellous Babylon Teeter at Moscow. The electric telegraph wires are laid on without delay between the Opera House and the Tuileries, and soloists and public offices so that strangers will be able to communicate their orders for house and supper immediately on the fall of the curtain. The Minister of State will be placed in relation with the manager on all questions of operatic policy; and even the actors and actresses will have dressing-rooms that will be kept informed by electricity of the rising of the curtain and the demand for their presence on the stage. Who would ever have imagined that the Tuileries and the Opera would ever have been supplanted by the electric telegraph?

Gentlemen connected with the highly-remunerative vocation of tinkers are sometimes accused of making two holes where they mend one in a saucepan or a kettle. We were amused the other day to observe in the "Chapter of Vere Bloy" taken soundly to task by the critic of the Times for converting Mr. Victor Hugo's "Don Sallustre" into a hybrid "Don Salewis." We are not sure that Mr. Victor Hugo's nomenclature is not his to see how the philological censor put his rebuke. "Decidedly," he writes, "if Victor Hugo should choose to call his hero 'Don Salewis' So say we all; but "decidedly" we object to "decidedly" as a sample of orthography.

Truth is stranger than fiction; and to repeat the saying is only to give utterance to an inescapable truism. But we could not help feeling that one of the ejaculations, in the last but one penny number of our contemporary, we loved, immediately following a powerful sentence by Mr. Wilkie Collins's hero, was a little out of analytical letter on the Road murder. Was there ever a more pregnant pantomorphism for the critic had to analyse than the ejaculations of Mr. Collins's characters. To him succeeded another critic whose duty it was to sift, compare, and weigh the features of that horrible mystery of the Yew Country which almost startled the world to speak the shrewdest among us.

"The Yew Tree" has had, we hear, a sale of three thousand copies, and will probably exhaust another edition. This, for a threevolume novel, is prodigious. It is evident that Mr. Mudie has not his face against "white women." By-the-way, what is the meaning of this virulent little onslaught against Mr. Mudie and his library about which the paterfamilias-critic of the Times is occasionally witty? What has Mr. Mudie done beyond making a capital business for himself, and, originally, the very best circulating library in the world? Surely he has a right to select his own books. Surely he is entitled to exclude rubbish from his shelves. Surely the commercial success of Mudie has pleased a sufficient number of tens of thousands to snap his fingers in the professional discontented.

Room for a few literary memos. As James Hannay is collecting, and about to republish, the articles he has contributed to the Quarterly Review, we hope to see among the contents the papers on Burns and Schoolside essays on "Horace" and "Blake." Mr. Tom Hood is preparing a collected edition of his brilliant work. Of Mr. Longman's Edwards's "History of the Opera" we have already spoken: it remains to be added that Mr. Blanchard Jerrold is busy on a "History of Industrial Exhibitions." We notice also from the pen of this versatile and prolific writer a new book—and a very charming book, too—under the Dickensian title of "Imperial," and a new collection from Household Words of quaint stories and miscellaneous papers.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.—At a Court at Windsor, the 29th day of October, 1862—present, the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty in Council—It was ordered that the Parliament which stands prorogued to Tuesday the 4th day of November next be further prorogued to Thursday the 3rd day of January next.

The Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Plantations have received, through the secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, a copy of a notice issued by the Board of Health at Lisbon, stating that the cholera has appeared in the inhabited fever hospital, which disease broke out in the 11th ult.

A curious relic has been discovered at Morecrait, near Romney, in estate belonging to Lord Palmerston, of a lady's sock ornament, of pure gold, and supposed to be of the time of the ancient Britons.

MUSIC.

At our own great Opera Houses matters remain in statu quo. "Robin Hood" continues to run its triumphant course at Her Majesty's Theatre, the public flocking to its performances, three times a week, with undiminished eagerness. The other nights of the week, when the Italian Opera is performed, are devoted to the revival of "old nights," and the "Traviata," "Lucrezia Borgia," and the "Huguenots," with the splendid talents of Tilliers, Lucy Escott, and, unable to contend in attraction with "Robin Hood," Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington. This may be mortifying to the great Italian stars, but it will be a consolation and gratification to their somewhat supercilious notion of their own supremacy. To this English public we are indebted for so many of the finest vocalists among our composers and performers talent enough to raise our own national opera to a height of fame equal to any other country.

At the Covent-garden English Opera things likewise remain in statu quo. There are excellent performances of "Lurline," "The Queen's Diamonds," and "Maritana." The first-named opera, the one thing useful, still looms in the distance. The announcement of Balfe's new opera, "The Sicilian Bride," has led to the expectation of observing a promise of the speedy production of Mr. Edward Loder's opera, "The Night-dancers"—a most charming work, which, in truth, may be regarded as a novelty for the originality it presents, and a good many years ago at the Princess' Theatre, its performance was by no means such as to make the public to appreciate the great merits of it.

Mdme. Clara Novello will positively take her last farewell of the public at St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening, the 21st of the month. There is to be a miscellaneous concert, in which Benedict's cantata "Undine," which, it will be remembered, was produced with so much success at the late Norwich Festival, when Mdme. Novello sang the principal soprano part. She will also sing a selection from Handel's "Messiah," Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," performed with her at Norwich, and the chorus will consist of the members of the Vocal Association; the whole being under the direction of Mr. Benedict. This will be the last opportunity we shall have of hearing the first of English and provincial townswomen, which are attended with the most delightful associations.

A new tenor, Signor Pancani, has made a successful début at the Paris Italian Opera in the character of Manrico in the "Trovatore." He is highly spoken of by the critics, but in other respects the event of note is mentioned as belonging, this season, to the company of this theatre, namely, the appearance of Mdme. Penco, the representative of Alboni, Gardoni, Badiali, and Graziani. Nor is there a word said about the production of any new opera. Nowadays, it would seem, the public both of Paris and London are content to wait for the production of the kind, and are content with the old, threadbare repertoire of the Italian stage.

Dronet, the celebrated flutetplayer of half a century ago, now, at a great age, holds the place of Chapel Master at Gotha. A contemporary mentions that Spohr is visiting in England as a visit to his son. M. Provost, we believe, is the brother of the famous postmaster of St. Mandrault who recognised and arrested Louis XVI. at Varennes when that unfortunate Monarch, with his family, endeavoured to escape from France in 1791.

A young singer, Mille. Gillies (Gillies, we suppose, a common Scotch name), has appeared at the Théâtre Lyrique with great success as "Le Postillon de Lonjumeau." This is the first time in the experience where she last year carried off the first prize, as her countrywomen (we presume), Miss Augusta Thomson, had done the preceding year.

THE THEATRES.

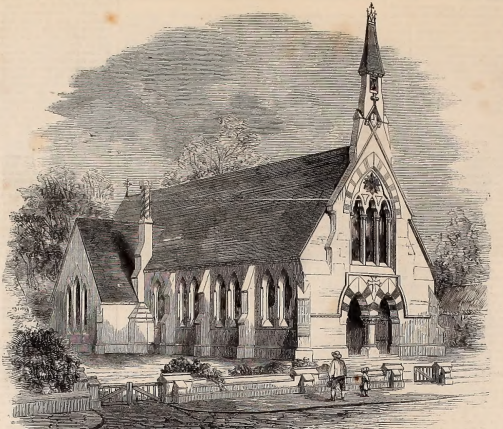
PRINCESS.—This theatre reopened on Saturday with a new piece, entitled "Married in Haste," which is preceded by an introduction to the more important business of the evening, which purports it most emphatically to be. It was founded by Mr. Falconer, assisted by Mr. Falconer, of Victor Hugo's play of "Ruy Blas," which has been placed on these boards for the purpose of introducing M. Fechter in a great character, as in England it is known to be. It is a piece of singular texture, wholly romantic and ideal, but remarkably effective. The scene is laid in Spain, and the plot is so complicated that not one of them could have happened, either on the theory of the play itself, or the actual conditions of life of that country, at the period which fairly excited in the truth of the action by the dramatic skill shown in combining these improbabilities that the interest of the audience is awakened and sustained from the beginning to the end. There is also a high political interest in some of the scenes. The exposure of Court corruption, the bold denunciation of the abuses of power, a social wrong, and exemplifies the manner in which the stage may be made a powerful instrument for the good government of a Continental States such plays serve the purpose that our Elizabethan dramas did in the days when newspapers had not been yet invented. Mr. Fechter, in the leading character, displayed to great advantage his powers. Ruy Blas is a man of the people, who, by his intelligence, his courage, and his virtues (Mr. Walter Lacy), is placed in a false position, and, being ultimately used as a catspaw, and betrayed by a person, avenges his wrongs upon the real employer. He dares to love the Queen of Spain, whom the malicious Intrigue would degrade because she had caused his degradation and exile; and then he is made to poison himself and his mistress at the moment of attracting her into deadly peril, from which the devoted woman can only be saved by the death of the chief agent of her fall. Fechter is a melodramatic actor of great energy; and, in his duel with the Duke of Salamanca (Mr. Addison), he speaks with a deal of fervour and emotion. He pronounces English with a German accent, but, in the more sentimental episodes, manifested powers of declamation and pathos which justly commanded applause from the audience. He has his pathos, however, he betrayed too deep a sense of his degradation in being a lackey, and, in the scene where, assuming a dress inconsistent with the noble sentiments of indignation against the corruption of the courtiers which he had previously expressed, he is, in fact, the author's fault, which, and the actor mitigated, might, after all, have escaped the censure of the audience. It is enough that M. Fechter was eminently successful. Mr. Walter Lacy is a fine actor, was in all respects excellent. So broad and so decided a characterisation has been seldom seen on the stage as that of Mr. Addison's Felix Mocquard (Mr. Reakby), and naturally excites the ire of Mrs. Maywood (Miss Heath), who proceeds to take revenge. She arranges for him an intrigue with Josephine (Mrs. C. Mathews), and then she compromises their marriage. In the second act poor Ripley is victimised. His wife is apparently false, and, supposing her to be so, he resolves to ask his rivals to all he wishes until rule seems to be impending on his matrimonial misfortune. Mr. Charles Mathews, in this character, has been engaging to bring him to a sense of a husband's true position. The play is generally interesting and amusing, and has a large fortune hidden, which she had prudently concealed. Thus the superiority of the ladies is secured. The scene is placed in America, but the origin of the piece is probably French. It was moderately successful.

ST. JAMES'S.—The commencement of Mr. A. Wigan's conduct of this theatre took place on Monday, and was signalised by the production of a new piece by Mr. Tom Taylor. The recent failure of this author's new play at the Lyceum provoked an extra degree of curiosity as to how he would succeed in his still new office, and no funny even a new mischance was anticipated. The title, "Up at the Hills," was conjectural—it means a hill station in India; and the design of the piece is to take advantage of one or more Indian sketchbooks, and group on the stage some of the representative characters of the mode of life intended to be portrayed as could be associated in an interesting plot, or rather series of drawing-room conversations. To a certain extent Mr. Taylor has succeeded, though the plan was not a very hopeful one, and the invention of the situations is not equal to that of the characters. The centre of the group is Mrs. Colonel M'Cann (Mrs. Wigan), whose husband, on the eve of superannuation, leaves the management of the regiment to his lady, who is a bustling, strong-minded woman, and quite equal to the task. To her is opposed Mrs. Everleigh (Miss Herbert), who, having been plunged early in life, revenges himself by cheating (inter alia) a young griffin, called Lieutenant Ripley (Mr. Rogers), whose mother makes him a present of his commission. Mrs. Everleigh (Miss Herbert). Now, Mrs. M'Cann has resolved on getting Greenacre's (Mr. Addison) land, and delivering the widow from the incessant advances of the metropolitan Major Wire. To enforce we have no very intense sympathy with this lady, who seems to us much better adapted to wear the uniform of her husband's better half. Mr. Taylor appears to care nothing for the morality of his piece, and makes the Major a full, rotund, jolly, and he demands our pity for his men and women on the score of their reality. He photographs them in the most valuable. We perceive, therefore, no purpose in his scenes beyond that of presenting an assemblage of lifelike characters—some good, all bad or indifferent—who compose a picture of Anglo-Indian society, without any moral to point its way. Mrs. M'Cann patronises the faulty but opulent woman, and also a former lover, Mr. Everleigh, and the latter contrives that they should wed, in spite of the malignant Major. This gentleman, throwing off the mask of friendship, has been endeavouring to persuade the supervisor of her letters, which he has secreted in a casket that he had stolen from her in days of their early intercourse, Mrs. M'Cann obtains possession of the casket by means of Mr. Ripley (Mr. Frank Matthews), who has been robbed by Mrs. Everleigh (Miss Kate Terry), whom the Major has betrayed; and, after some difficulty in procuring a key to open the casket, she succeeds in exposing the letters and burning them. There is here a quantity of small dramatic manipulation, but the interest of the piece is in the characters. The object is to sink the moral character of the Major to the lowest degradation for he actually becomes a burglar and breaks open the exterior in which the casket is placed. Mr. Wigan has a loud and pompous brain) over to Mrs. Townstall that he may read its contents. But Mrs. M'Cann has been informed by Mrs. Everleigh, and placed in the custody of the Major's accomplice in cheating poor Greenacre, and the Major is thus deprived of the casket by means of Mr. Ripley, who is, poor drunken tool of Stonehenge. When Townstall opens the casket, therefore, the contents only redound to the Major's own disgrace. Mrs. M'Cann retains the correspondence, and, as the piece ends, the Major is willing to compromise matters, and pairs off with Mrs. Townstall, who, instead of her sensory consists of the lieutenants in an Indian bungalow, and the accompaniments, including the fan and jungle-grass, which always have a local significance. The cast includes two young ladies who are consigned to Mrs. M'Cann in order that they may get husbands, and who get them accordingly—a Lieutenant Ripley and the junior subaltern of the regiment, who is represented by Mr. Emery. The class of drama, which is evidently not the highest, is here represented on its own principles of truth, and the skill in grouping and contrasting character. But it is incapable of exciting profound interest, and we have only to look for a more valuable representation of actual life and manners. It is conceived in the spirit of levity, and takes the form rather of noted satire than dramatic composition. The dialogue abounds with verve of a conversationary delivery, than histrionic power. It appeals to a class, not the general public, which can be relied upon for a good stirring drama, and gratifies the taste of those who love to censure existing manners, but possess little vigour of mind to originate and to give the virtuous models we wish to have the more romantic emotions excited. It addresses not the heart, but, exclusively, the head.

HAYMARKET.—On Saturday a new drama by Mr. Craven was produced, under the title of "The Festboy." The success of the piece is to be attributed to the performance of Mr. Buckstone, the Squerry Bargrass, father of Maria, a young lady educated for a vocalist, but who has become the wife by secret marriage of the son of a Baronet. Having an unsworn dislike to the match, the father had also that of the profession of Mr. Henry Bingley (Mr. Parselle) and, accordingly, poor Sparrit, when he finds that his son has married with vocalist, and that Mr. Bingley (Mr. J. Bland) arrives, and so frightens his son that he denies his marriage, and, in fact, disowns his wife. John (Mr. Rogers), in the great grief of Sparrit, affirm. A temporary separation ensues. Maria pursues her profession, and supports herself and her grandfather in comfort. Sparrit is reconciled with a young lady, Miss Burton, Miss Harston (Miss Burton), and finds that a marriage is on the tapis between Maria and Mr. Bingley. Fortunately, Sir John is reported to be dead; and, feeling herself in consequence released from her oath, she accepts the hand of Mr. Bingley. Mr. Buckstone appeared as an interview; and, as Mrs Wharton is not really attached to him, an understanding is readily arrived at. Matters, however, are not so easily settled as they appear to be, for Sir John (Mr. Addison) suddenly appears, threatening to disinherit Henry for his disobedience. This produces a change in the circumstances of the piece, and, supposing his father, long since dead, had once preserved his life; and thus a happy ending is secured. Mr. Rogers produces the usual pathos in his sorrows and joys, is thoroughly unique, thoroughly vulgar, and thoroughly pathetic.

JUBILEE OF THE MANCHESTER AND SALFORD AUXILIARY OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.—On Thursday evening, the jubilee meeting of this society took place in the Free-trade Hall, and a second meeting was held on Friday morning, at the same place, for the Sunday school friends. On Wednesday morning a public breakfast was held in the Assembly-rooms, Mosley-street. The Manchester and Salford auxiliary, the establishment in 1810, upwards of 180,000 copies of the Bible, in whole or part, in the English and in foreign languages, and the receipts have in every twenty-two of our dense population purchased a new book last year, and have distributed in the same period nearly 20,000 volumes. When it is stated (says the Manchester Guardian) that, in our favourable city, there were 3000 cases of cholera in 1832 without the Bible, it will be seen the society's work is not finished even at home.

QUEEN ISABELLA II. OF SPAIN.



PERHAPS no Sovereign ever ascended a throne the circumstances connected with whose accession were of a more singular kind than the Queen of whose portrait our readers with a Portrait in our present Impression. An infant when her father, Ferdinand VII., died, Isabella, as Regent for her daughter, immediately set herself to work, despite the contravention of the law of inheritance which the Bourbons introduced into Spain, to secure the rights of primogeniture. Her brother, her mother, Maria Christina of Naples, had the judgment to perceive that the only means to preserve, for Isabella, the crown was, in consequence, the adoption of new principles of government, and the courage to act upon her enlightened conviction. If the Estatuto Real was still to be withheld from Cuba and Peninsula, there was legitimate ground for appealing to the people on behalf of a Queen in swa falling mother; and the Cortes of 1834, Charles Carlos and Don Miguel Arias, would have been indefensible. Maria Christina, as Regent under her daughter, pursued the policy of conciliation which her husband had pursue, and, calling to her council and around her all those who had signalised themselves by their efforts to establish civil liberty in the Peninsula, proceeded to secure her daughter the succession of constitutional Queen of Spain. Thenceforward the war of succession, instead of being the struggle of principle which it had ceased to be at that time, became a war of principles, and on one side were arrayed Carlos and Cabrera, and on the other Isabella and the constitutional monarchy. The issue, often doubtful, was decided some years before the Queen attained her legal majority; and in the interval Isabella was subjected to many painful trials, which, however, whose mien and firmness had contributed so much to establish her rights and confirm her succession, was torn from her side at a time when a mother's solicitude and care were most required. Afterwards a violent attempt was made in the dead of night to snatch her from her Palace and the custody of Espartero, which failed, and led to the execution of one of the truest men of the time, Colonel Ibarra, shortly, the brave but unfortunate Ibarra. The subsequent downfall of Espartero opened the door for the return of the Queen Mother to Spain. It is, however, but justice to the memory of Espartero to say that he was not Maria Christina for the intellectual culture of her illustrious daughter ever not of regarded by him; and these instances were so well devised that the Queen of Spain is entitled to be considered one of the most accomplished Sovereigns in Europe. In person Isabella inherits much of the comeliness of her mother. She is above the middle height, well-proportioned, with rich auburn hair, and soft, expressive blue eyes, which impart a most winning expression to her countenance; and, added to an extremely courteous and affable manner, a fine, high spirit, and a munificent generosity, give her an extraordinary ascendency over all who come into her presence.

The marriage of Isabella II. was a topic of great import and of bitter contention at the time. One of its consequences, or rather a consequence of its adjunct, the marriage at the same time of her sister, the Infanta Luisa, to the Duke de Montpensier, the youngest son of Louis Philippe, was, probably, the overthrow of the citizen King, and the expulsion of the house of Orleans from France. Of this marriage there are issue two children living—one a daughter, who for some years had been styled Princess of the Asturias in default of a male heir to the crown; the other a son, who is now Prince of the Asturias.

In her government the Queen has shown how deeply she was imbued with constitutional principles in her youth, and how well she has imbibed those salutary lessons in the administration of affairs which she received from such enlightened and able statesmen as Mon, Isturiz, Pidal, Lopez, Cortina, Arguelles, O'Donnel, and Tovino, who have been her chief advisers during the greater part of her reign. The Queen is really a constitutional Monarch, ruling by and through her responsible Ministers; and the consequence is seen in the marvellously-improved condition of the Peninsula. In this reign physical and intellectual improvements have proceeded side by side; and, while every encouragement has been given to peace, literature, and the fine arts, the interests of agriculture, trade, and commerce have been sedulously attended to. The code of laws has been admirably reformed, the judicature has been beneficially remodelled, all injurious privileges have been swept away, corruption has been eradicated from the Executive Administration by the free election of a free Parliament, a host of mischievous old customs have been abolished, industry has been systematically encouraged, and peculation and malversation discountenanced; extensive waste tracts have been brought into cultivation; wild regions have been subjected to the influence of civilisation, by the construction of roads at the public expense; and the value of labour, land, and all the products of skill, capital, and industry, has been enormously increased by the facility of transport and exportation afforded by a network of railways which brings all parts of the Peninsula almost into contact with each other and with foreign States. In this reign, too, the Spanish navy has been greatly increased; and the army, disorganised by a tedious civil war, is now restored to its ancient celebrity by strict discipline, and has recently reaped laurels in the field which any army in Europe might proudly boast of. It is the glory of Isabella II. that she rivals her great progenitrix, Isabella the Catholic, in the resuscitation of her country from the "Slough of Despond," and that she has planted the germs of a great futurity for Spain, if she should not witness in her own day the complete revival of its ancient glories.

Against the life of a Sovereign with such claims upon the affection of her subjects, and who is withal so charitable, so amiable, humane, and gentle, it is strange that any wretch could be found ruthless enough to raise his hand; yet twice has the attempt been made to assassinate Queen Isabella, only on each occasion to evoke that courage and kindliness which are among the numerous good traits in her character. Her charities, dispensed without ostentation to distressed objects of compassion even among the enemies of her reign, absorb a very large portion of her privy purse, and these, and her faithful adherence to the principles on which her throne is based, have won for her sceptre and her person an amount of warm, genuine, loyalty and affection among her people in all parts of Spain, and among all classes of Spaniards, of which no idea could have been formed until her recent visit, accompanied by her consort and her son, through the provinces afforded the people an opportunity of manifesting their feelings towards their Sovereign. Isabella may now live and reign in peace as constitutional Queen of Spain—fearing no rival, dreading no pretender, and devoting her energies and her authority to the development of the great industrial resources of the Peninsula, the consolidation of her throne by good laws and just government, the moral and physical improvement of her people, and the recovery for her country of that national prestige and greatness which belonged to it ere excessive wealth and luxury had enervated the people, and tyranny and corruption had undermined the noble fabric which the first Isabella had reared with so much energy, skill, and perseverance.

HOLY TRINITY CHAPEL SCHOOL AT REACH, CAMBRIDGESHIRE.

SCHOOL CHURCH AT REACH, CAMBRIDGESHIRE.

This hamlet of Reach, about twelve miles north-east of Cambridge, is the remnant of a Saxon city which was of some importance before the Conquest. For centuries, however, it has been without any provision for education, or the means of instruction according to the doctrine and discipline of the Established Church, though a ruined gables with the remains of a tracery window show that it was not always so neglected. On the site of the church to which this timeworn old wall belonged has now risen the pretty little building which we engrave in our present number, the first stone of which was laid on the 7th of June by C. T. Allis, Esq., of Swaffham House, and which was opened for service on Thursday, the 18th ult. As the building is to serve as a church as well as a school, greater care has been bestowed on the details than would have been required in an ordinary country schoolhouse; yet all is rough and serviceable, and without architectural pretence, as may be judged from the cost, which, without forms, desks, and such fittings, but including pulpit, the stores, and the bell, is somewhat under £600. The plan of the building is a parallelogram, 50 feet by 20 feet, with the addition of three arches and an apsidal termination at the east end. There are also small transepts north and south, which contain the infants' gallery, vestry, desks, &c. The timbers of the roof are stained, the under side of the rafters being ceiled. The reading-desk is of wood, but the pulpit is of church, the best of which is to be procured in the neighbourhood. The walls, also, are of this material, with red and white bricks. Casterton stone has been used for the isolated columns, the capitals of which are carved, and in parts about the bell-turret, and elsewhere. Ornamental patterns of green and violet glass have been used for the windows generally, but the central window of the apse—a present—is stained glass by Lavers and Barraud. The whole effect of the building, exterior and interior, is very good, and reflects great credit on the architect, Mr. Charles Forster Hayward, of Adam-street, Adelphi, and on the builders, Messrs. William Bell and Sons, of Cambridge. To the Vicar of Swaffham Priory, however, the Rev. Thos. Preston, in whose parish Resch is situated, belongs the entire merit of having originated and successfully carried out the work. The opening morning service was read by this gentleman, assisted by the Rev. J. W. Cockshot, Vicar of Burwell (who gave the site for the building), and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Selwyn, Margaret Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge. In the evening the preacher was the Rev. H. E. Prescott, Rector of Tasburg, Norfolk, and Rural Dean. Great interest was taken in the proceedings by the neighbourhood generally.

SEARCHING NEAPOLITAN PRISONERS AT ST. ANGELO.

A PARTY of prisoners taken by Bixio's division in the engagement of the 1st ult. were recognised as belonging to the Neapolitan troops who some days previously had committed all kinds of atrocities at Capazzo, which place was sacked. Bixio gave orders to have them searched, and that all those who had plunder on them should be shot. From some were taken earrings with flesh still hanging to them; others had ornaments taken from the altar of the church; and several were swathed about the body, beneath their great-coats, with breadths of silk. The Engraving on page 418, from a sketch by our Special Artist in South Italy, represents the unwrathing of one of these wretches; and on the ground in front of him are some articles of ill-gotten booty taken from him and others.

THE PRINCE OF WALES IN CANADA.—THE ORANGEMEN'S ARCH AT TORONTO.

ORANGEMEN'S ARCH AT TORONTO.

WE give above an Engraving of the Arch erected by the Orangemen of Toronto on the occasion of the Prince of Wales's visit to that city, and about which so much controversy took place. The culturet of Orangeism in Upper Canada led, as our readers are aware, to several unpleasant results, and was the means of preventing the Prince of Wales landing at Kingston and Belleville, and seemed likely at one time to deter his Royal Highness from honouring Toronto with his presence. After a correspondence of some length between the Mayor of Toronto and the Duke of Newcastle, the Orangemen, however, gave way, and the Prince made a triumphal entry. But, in spite of the engagement entered into by the Orangemen, and under which solemn promise alone the Prince was induced to land, the Orange arch was decorated with offensive emblems and painting—bearing an Orange flag and a portrait of King William III. It was thought that the Prince, in consequence, would refuse to receive the Mayor and Council at the levée; but, after an apology from the Mayor, his Royal Highness gave permission for their presentation. Notwithstanding the stumbling-block thrown in the way of the Prince by injudicious over-zeal in the matter of the Orange arch, his Royal Highness met at Toronto with a reception, upon the whole, worthy of the place and of the loyal character for which the city, as well as the province at large, is deservedly celebrated.

ROMANCE AND REALITY; OR, LOVE IN A COTTAGE.

MR. BROUGHAM'S comedy of "Romance and Reality" continues to form a prominent feature in the performances of the Haymarket, and for rapidity of action presents a rare example of dramatic composition, and a result only to be obtained by a long and habitual acquaintance with the boards. We present a Scene from it, at rather an advanced stage of the business—namely, in Act V.—but which has been selected as allowing of picturesque effect. Rosabel Manly has realised her ideal of happiness—love in a cottage—and, thinking her husband to be only a farmer, and not recognising Jack Swift as her husband's friend, but regarding him only as a rustic labourer—has not yet penetrated the ruse that has been designed to cure her of her romantic follies, yet begins to suspect that all is not right, and that there is a cloud impending over her happiness. But even here she is not free from intrusion. The female emancipationist, Miss Barbara Manly, finds herself on the spot in pursuit of Swift, with whom she had supposed that she had eloped, but who had adroitly substituted for himself Mr. Lavender Kydd (Mr. W. Farren), and alarms the astonished bride by the violence of her denunciations and the virulence of her suspicions. The scene permits the grouping of the principal characters—Mr. Frank Meredith (Mr. Rowe), Jack Swift (Mr. John Brougham), Rosabel (Miss Florence Haydon), Barbara Manly (Mrs. Wilkins), and Blossom, the servant (Mrs. E. Fitzwilliam). The reader will readily recognise these public favourites, and easily understand the situation. The comedy is likely to be remembered for its extreme vivacity, and will probably form an accession to the general répertoire of the theatre to be frequently repeated.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The Houghton Meeting brought the legislature to going year to a very brilliant close. Out of 94 races and matches, during the six days, 22 were won by the favourites. Klarkoff was so regularly outlasted by Asteroid in the Glasgow Stakes that he pulled up. Such is to 40 to 1 for the Derby, for which John Scott's two-year-old division does not promise well. Dundee's legs are said to be none the better for a recurrent laboure; and one of the Middleham Derby favourites is trained a good deal in a Turkish bath, of which there are already three in connection with the turf-famed Moor. The clumsy favouritism in connection with the Jockey Club Cup is the only other point which gave one of the candidates for the Derby a chance which were available for the purpose, has had the effect of postponing Mr. Markwell's trial to the Prince Monolulu, &c., Mr. Mo Gregor's Ellington (a promising young judge) had, unlike Mr. Marshall, the good luck to be left to himself, and he performed in the contest the duties of that office in a way that interest caused by the contest that the starting-post was with many a much greater object of attraction during the week than the winning chair. The same remarkable feature of favouritism has made repeating tribes from certain parties to give their horses a good start are not to be gone into, as unavailable, many of them never having been thought of, although the absence of the accused parties from Newmarket was matter of observation with the authorities and the people. Revised Liverpool have mixed meetings next week, the former on Monday and Tuesday, and the latter on Wednesday and Thursday.

Monday will be a great day at Kirby Gate, and find every sack in the kingdom at work. The Bulmation club-hunting was brought to a very sad end, and, besides losing his mare, he was not to ground, was the return. Jem Hills is in the saddle again, after a somewhat severe bake; and Sharpe's accident, we are glad to say, has been sadly exaggerated. A subscription, headed by Rad Vane, has been opened at Messrs. Buckhouse and Co.'s, for the benefit of the unfortunate jockey. Tom Harrison, whose suicide we mentioned last week. The Sporting Magazine (which is entertained with a portrait of the late Mr. Osbaldeston) has changed hands and editor.—He had been unwell, and had somewhat suffered from giddy fits, which may have occasioned the fall. He said to say. Effort can be could hardly see his own horse when he was in a gallop. Hence the notion hounted him that he was urging him on when he was not. Mr. Rolph is better, and may longer. He slept quite soundly his last night, got up at six o'clock, and gave orders about business. He had for the previous night, and the vessel of the ship was to Chester-le-Street, to commence hunting in that part of the country. However, he did not seem to be well during the week, and the company were with the feeder, and sent him away on his grand, he went straight to the feeding-house and hung himself from a beam. The deceased, Mr. Rolph, leaves a widow and seven children.

The Wednesday Stakes at Kirby Gate, for all-ages, brought out a very loyalty in which it was held, and the 107 pounds and odds, with two or three exceptions, were also. The Duke of Rutland's pole good prices, varying from 4:10 to £20; but as these has not been a sale of the year 1858, the Duke's purchasers were demand and rather depressed the average. Nineteen of the colts averaged nearly 99gs. and two of them went as high as 50gs. and 44gs., while the average of the three, making a total of 3gs. We are glad to find that the sale ring is in future years to be removed from Bampton to Bridgewater, so that it can be easily reached from town in three or four hours with a day ticket.

THE WAR IN CHINA.

THE LANDING OF BRITISH TROOPS AT PEHTANG.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, C. WIRGMAN.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE WAR IN CHINA.

THE LANDING OF THE ALLIED FORCES.

TUESDAY, July 31, was the day fixed for the landing; but, owing to a high wind and rough sea in the morning, it was postponed. Wednesday, August 1, though ushered in with clouds and heavy rains, proved more favourable; the clouds gradually broke and cleared away, the sun shone out, and by ten o'clock the expedition was in readiness. The second brigade (Sutton's) of the first division was the one to which was assigned the honour of being the first to land. The men were transferred from their transports to gun and troop boats, there being twenty in the former and fifty in each of the latter. "When all was ready (says a correspondent) the signal to advance was made, and the gun-boats, taking the troop-boats in tow, went off in a long line, headed by the Admiral in the Coromandel, towards the mouth of the river. Our allies, packed in troop-boats and junks towed by steamers, formed a parallel line, headed also by their Admiral. From the anchorage nothing could be seen of the land; but gradually as we approached objects became visible. Nearer and nearer. Now the dim round lumps seen a little while ago on the horizon have grown into dark-looking bastions. Now the curtain which connects the bastions rises above the water. Near: still, and the outlines of the houses of the town, the embrasures of the forts, and the loopholes in the parapet, come into view. A little nearer, and we are crossing the bar; and now we can discern figures on the top of the ramparts, and Chinese flags flying on the bastions. The embrasures are still carefully closed. Many an eye is watching them—many an anxious inquiry made, 'Will the fellows fight?' The bar is crossed, and the Coromandel has anchored within 2000 yards of the southern forts; the gun-boats close up and anchor in line, facing the mud flat. On the causeway, at a distance of two miles or so, is a line of Tartar cavalry, but in what a mirage looking like trees, or camels, or anything the fancy chooses! the mirage form; they flit up and down, and to and fro; at one moment they appear to be lifted up from the ground and to skim through the air, the next they vanish altogether and reappear, perhaps, in some more contested form. Still the embrasures remain closed and the forts make no sign. The order was now given to land; the boats from the men-of-war towed the troop-boats towards the spit, and as soon as they took the ground the soldiers leisurely got over the sides into water knee-deep and most ankle-deep, and began to wade towards the land. At the same time the Tartar horsemen went to the right. It was now evident no opposition was intended, and the disembarkation continued in a quiet and orderly manner. The men, mostly out of their knee-deep bath, formed and tucking up their trousers, plodded slowly and laboriously through a mile of mud and sand, and formed up as they came on shore. The guns and tilts kept pace with us on the left, or rather outstripped us, as some of their troops were the first to reach the shore. It was over now the other side of their troops were the first to reach the shore. It was over now the other side of the spit, and the remaining events of the night may be briefly recorded. When all had landed the columns were formed and advanced over the spit, a tableland of hard utterly barren bits of baked mud, covered with small tumuli, which every one calls sahibs, and no one seems to know why; on either side of the spit were the rapid rivers, more than flounding, and then the causeway was reached, and the English brigade light-heartedly dashed over the causeway, followed by the Sikh brigade likewise dashing their exceedingly uncomfortable damp beds across the causeway, making their exceedingly uncomfortable damp beds within a few yards of the gate of the town. No French troops, however, had yet left, or, indeed, had arrived, and after a long halt their camp fires were blazing in all directions.

Colonel Artie, writing of the scene of confusion presented at this landing-place at Pehtang, says, "No drawing can convey any adequate notion of the scene. It was, however, a picturesque one. All sketch which we here engrave does not fairly his assertion. "My brain (says he, in continuation) was in a whirl and confused at the right hand, left hand, sounds and languages. The gallant Captain of the Feard must be distracted by this time, as he is there from morning till night. Horses landing, some with only a head-rope, others trying to gore you, coolies sy-aling, coolies bawling, commanders of gun-boats calling for the same thing, Chinese making various descriptions of noises, horses landing, baggage landing, artillery landing, troops landing, one dressed, red coats, white coats, blue jackets, grey dresses, blue dresses, red coats, white coats, blue jackets, grey dresses, blue dresses, bullocks, buffaloes, puggaries and straw hats; poles, muskets, bamboos, wheels, oars; black faces, pale faces, the opposite of which I cannot attempt to describe; Chinese cooks, loose pigs, bullocks, buffaloes, puggaries and straw hats; poles, muskets, bamboos, wheels, oars; black faces, pale faces, the opposite of which I cannot attempt to describe; Chinese cooks, loose pigs, dogs, bullocks, buffaloes, puggaries and straw hats; poles, muskets, bamboos, wheels, oars; black faces, pale faces, the opposite of which I cannot attempt to describe; Chinese cooks, loose pigs, dogs, boat-hooks, short-boats, rowing, pushing, pulling, punting, and trying to get on shore; the whole, the whole mixed in different languages at the top of their voices; Frenchmen, Sikhs, Punjaubees, English, Chinese, all mixed up together, some commanding with a hasty gesture, others preaching with, but give you a small idea of the landing-place at Pehtang."

PUNJAUB-STREET.

Punjaub-street, or La Grande Rue as the French call it (writes our Special Artist), is the centre road of the town of Pehtang, running straight down it, the wide bank and ditch on either side forming a convenient way leading to the Pehho Fort, and to the river's bank. The right side of the road is occupied by the English Brigade, the left by the French, and in the centre are the French troops. The whole day long this street is filled with troops of all nations: with the iron, head-English soldier, all in red, and more and more arriving; with the khaki dress and dark chocolate turban of the Sikh, contrasting well with the gayer and picturesque dress and head-gear of the Punjaubee, and with the white Spahis hide their heads and bite their moustaches from envy. Working parties from the British are laying tar to clear the ditch of its many hollows, in the shape of mats, hay, jars of liquor, and small furniture of every description that has been carelessly thrown out, and which, with the aid of the tar, he has flattened, but not removed. Camels, horses, which at times lets you in nearly to the waist, and the effluvium which I cannot attempt to describe. Here Chinese coolie corps, in gangs of fifty and more, push along, carrying heavy loads on bamboo poles, the poles resting on their necks, and steadily moving or sticking into your neck as a gentle hint to clear the road, or, if they are rolling barrels, beware of a batter on the heels. Every man has a loop of bamboo to his shoulder, dangling along as a canter, when all fly right and left; for artillery cannot stop for coolies, or, indeed, for any of the foot-passengers. Bullocks would really for once be useful with their perpetual "Move on!" "Keep moving!" And if, with all of it, a Chinese cart-driver does not come along in traversing this street under half an hour without being ridden over, trampled on, or knocked down, or sick from its effluvium, he is lucky. Many officers are riding about to see the uniforms of many regiments, the Staff, cavalry, and infantry, all wearing their way "to the sign of the Golden Eagle," which appears in the centre of the Engraving. The flag above shows it to be the head-quarters and mess of the 11th Regiment, which are always, whether at home or abroad, where all are welcome, and where thirsty to forty always assemble and dine together in a courtyard which is covered with matting. Many officers are riding about who would you guess that in two days we shall again be relying on the "soft, soft pillow" with four days' biscuit in our haversack. But such is a soldier's life.

THE ENTRANCE OF THE PEHTANG RIVER.

Pehtang is described as a "wilderness of mud and water, destitute of tree, plant, shrub, or grass, and stenches which would defy a Sanitary Reform Act or Lethoby to depict—a country of utter misery and desolation exceeding the Lucrative's picture of the dejected Marians at the nearest gaspings. The place is memorable as the spot upon which Lord Elgin, Pehtang River, which falls into the Gulf of the Pechéli to the north-west of the River Pehho, and to advance thence to Tientsin and Pekin. The whole coast from the mouth of the river south and south of the Pehho River had been carefully surveyed, and the Pehtang seemed the most favourable spot for landing. It had the great advantage, that the river is navigable for vessels of considerable tonnage; and, having once secured its mouth, there was no need of a port of debarkation for all the material of the army. The mouth of the river is covered, and the approach to it made difficult by a bar, in which at low water there is not more than a foot of water, and sometimes, during a westerly wind, even less; but at high water at spring tides the depth is increased to twelve feet, and as the highest tides in the year were known to be in the first week in August, this obstacle was not likely to prove a serious one. The entrance to the inland harbour is very narrow, and in the shape of two mud forts, nearly opposite each other, on the north and south banks of the river, while a sandy spit runs a long way into the Gulf, which could be accurately surveyed as was possible from the sea, and it was ascertained that the fire from the north side commanded the channel as far as the south thirteen; at least, there were embrasures for that number. No resistance, however, was offered, and, beyond a few deserted machines, which on an ordinary occasion would be fired by fiends, and one or two sham cannons, there was little to engage attention. Behind the northern fort is a low, sandy, bushy hill, from the top of which can be rated from the country on all the other sides by a low mud dat, which is covered at high water.

ASTRONOMICAL ITEMS.—The year 1861 will be the first of the eighth cycle of Sun. It opens with an annular eclipse, that is, one in which the apparent diameter of the Moon being less than the Sun, the body of the latter will be visible all round. The next eclipse of the Sun will not take place on July 1. On Dec. 31 following there will be a total eclipse of the Sun. The first of Dec. will be visible in the Atlantic and the Azores; and a transit of Mercury will take place on Nov. 12—a somewhat rare occurrence, though not so rare as the last of which occurred in 1756. It will occur across the Sun's disc, the last of which occurred in 1756. It will occur after the conjunction of Mercury and the Sun. Transits of Mercury: Nov. 5, 1661; Nov. 7, 1674; March 26, April 24, Sept. 8, Oct. 8, and Nov. 10, 1677.

A DISTINGUISHED "SPARK."—Dr. Port Jackson (says Dr. Bennett) was caught in 1858, a highly-interesting and enormous specimen of a shark, the length of which was twelve feet four inches. When first struck with a harpoon the huge fish immediately ran out a great length of line, but, becoming fatigued, and finding himself fast and wounded, he rushed back again and attacked the boat, leaving several of his teeth broken in the wood. After he was again at some distance; but, discovering the hopelessness of his case, a second time he renewed his attack on the boat, and was only disabled by repeated blows from the axe and oars. His voracity was exemplified by the curious miscellany found in his capacious stomach, of which this is the inventory: a leg of mutton, a pair of boots, a shoemaker's awl, a pair of knife-and-fork-bags of a bulldog, with a rope round his neck, a quantity of sawdust, a piece of shingle, and a shoe-horn and a scraper. No wonder that twelve gallons of grog were obtained from his liver!

Relics of the Past.

LETTERS OF THE ROYAL FAMILY OF ENGLAND IN THE STUART LINE.

CHARLES I.

The first occasion on which a Prince of Wales has sojourned apart from his parental home under the guardianship of my Lord of Newcastle was not furnished in the year of grace 1860. We have recently been looking over an interesting and suggestive volume of autograph letters, preserved in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris, to the unfortunate Charles I. and his family, in which we find that more than two centuries ago—that is, in 1636—when the young Prince, afterwards Charles II., was only eight years of age, his father granted letters patent to his "trusty and well-beloved cousin William, Earl of Newcastle," setting forth that he had "found it convenient for the better education of the Prince Charles Our son to remove him out of our own house, and place him in a house of his own, where he may better commodity to attend as well to his studies as to his recreations for his health." The document goes on to give Newcastle full authority not only over the house, and all persons in attendance about the Prince, but over "all justices of the peace, bailiffs, high-constables, constables, and all other our officers and ministers" in the neighbourhood of his residence, who are to aid and assist in what Newcastle may deem for the safety and welfare of the person of the Earl. Prince Charles continued three years; and the volume before us, among a variety of historical documents, contains a number of letters written by and to the Prince during this period. The first of those addressed to him is the following homely one from his mother, the Queen Henrietta Maria:—

"Charles, I am sure that I most begin my first letter with chiding you, because I know that you will not take it ill, I hope it was only for this day, and that to morrow you will doe it, for yf you will not I must come to you and make you take it, for as for your sister Mary, I have given her charge to send me word how she doth, and to tell me whether you will or not, therfore I hope you will not give me the paines to goe, and so I rest.—Your affectionate mother,

"HENRIETTE MARIE R."

What effect the threatened visitation had we have not told; but the lady's authority in medicine is strongly shown in two of her own letters, written probably about this period, to the Earl of Newcastle, who, it appears, was undergoing some course of physic:—

"My Lord,—I thank you for the play. I like it so well that I desire to see it again when I come to London. I pray make an end with your phisick that I may be your compey. . . . Your loving friend,

"My Lord,—I would not have you take too much Phisick, for it doth always make me worse, and I think it will do the like with you. I wife every day, and am ready to dance, but not with Newcastle. . . . Make haste to returne to him that loves you.

"CHARLES P."

We may be permitted to conjecture whether his Grace the present Duke of Newcastle has ever looked over this letter, which accompanies the foregoing, from his illustrious ancestor to his Royal grosege; and whether Lady Alberta Alfreda Elizabeth Henrietta Pelham-Clinton is as it contains for his guidance among his future Transatlantic subjects:—

"May it please your Highness.—Since it pleased your most gracious father, his sacred Majestie, to think me worthy to be your governor, I will justify his Majestie's choice by all the care I want in children. I will make up with fidellity and duty to his Majesty, and in diligence and service to you. Then, for your education, it is fit you should have some knowledge, but I confess I would rather have you study things than words, matter than language, for seldom a critick in any language, who hath time to study matter, but proves a fool; or, if he can be, but a living dictionary; besides, I would not have you too studious, for too much contemplation spoiles action, and vertue consists in that."

After recommending the study of history, and expatiating on its advantages, he counsels a moderate cultivation of the arts, and a moderate attention to devotion; giving his reasons for both. He then proceeds to say:—

"But, Sir, we are in your own disposition religious, and not very apte to your booke, so you need no great labour to persuade you from (6) the same, or long discourse to others to doe it to you.

"The things that I have discoursed to you most is to be courteous and civil to everybody. . . . And, believe it, nothing will gain you your love like making a leg (i.e. a bow), which pleases more than reward or preservation, so much doth it take all kind of people. Then to speak well of everybody, and, when you cannot doe that, at others reprehend them, and seeme to dislike it so much as do not look of 'tos as to remedy for a fewe days; and may something be a fewe of those that have been spoken against. For you may say something of every one to the best; the other, which is calling foule names, gaining to the title of orators, watchmen, and carmen, but for gentlemen; how much more, then, for a Prince whose dislike (i.e., disparagement) is death, and kills any subject. Besides, it is a thing that takes away all will bear of it; and though they dare do nothing because they want power, nor say nothing openly, yet their hearts (which they believe) is, Sir, they are traytors in their hearts to you, and of your own making, and so are all their friends. And the other way to speak well of them will be told you, and you wins them as much as the other looses them, and this way you will get their hearts, and then you have all they have, and more you cannot have, and the other way you have not all you have you cannot have your people! To loose sympathy and sett by your state, I do not advise you to that, but the contrary, to endeavour to make it appear more than ceremony? The cloth of estates, the distance people are to keepe with you, great officers, heralds, and trumpets, coaches, with rich furniture for horses, marshals men making room, disorders to be laboured by their staff of office, and cry 'Nowe the King comes!' By these meanes you will make your people to say, every the wisest, though he know it, and not accustomed to it, shall shake off his wisdom, and shake his feet at it, as the rest, and the mist is cast before us and smokes the commonwealth. Besides, authority doth what it list. I name not these things amongst the sometimes it shifts sides, therefore the King must know at what time to play the King, and when to quaille it, but never put it off; for in all strengths whatsoever, if you put off your strength, you cannot put upon you too much King, yet even then, sometimes, a hint is made in the play that he is overpowered by them, but at other times you may do more, and civil speeches to people, and short, doth much wha of them; and, certainly, Sir, nothing cannot un-Prince you, but much advantage you. To women you cannot be too civil, especially to great ones. . . . Certainly, Sir, you cannot lose by courtesy. I must not you should be too much strong you to contemp, for I mean you should keep yourself up Prince still, and in all your actions, but I do not think you can be too much a mistress as to think you are not of mankind, nor suffer others or yourself to flatter you so much.

"The incommodities to life and the sustaining of it, and the same things the meanest do, you must do the like or not live; those things, when your place pleased to take them, you must remember is that you are of the lump of man and mortal, and the more you repeate these thoughts the better Prince you will be both to serve God, and for distributive justice to your people, for, being a Prince, you ought rather to give alms than to God thanks for a dinner; large ground have of other people than to be proud. I mean not tage ground to have of other people than to be proud. I mean not by repeating your mortality to have a death's head set always before you, or to eat every morning your winding sheet for breakfast, to have you fall into a Divine melancholy, to be an anchoret, or a Carpathian, with a philosophical conscience, to go barefoot, or in a tubb, but to temper yourself so by this means as to be a brave, noble, and just Prince, and to make your name precious to all times and acts abroad and your unspotted justice at home, qualified by your well-temper'd mercy."

The volume whence the above are taken contains, as we have said, a variety of other letters highly interesting and important. There are not less than sixty in the handwriting of Charles I., very many from Henrietta Maria; several from the Duke of Buckingham ("Steenie"); and even one or two from Oliver Cromwell. It includes, moreover, a document of peculiar attraction and significance in relation to the heir apparent, whose boyish notes have just been quoted, and one which exhibits him in a very pleasing and amiable light. This is a sheet of ordinary writing-paper entirely blank, with the exception of the signature Charles P. and the Prince's seal at the bottom of one page, which, as the label attached to it tells us, was the carte blanche sent by the Prince to the Parliament to settle his father's affairs. We don't know how the contemplation of this mute testimony to Charles the Second's filial piety may affect others; but, we must confess, the carte blanche appears to us the most eloquent epistle in the collection, and we are not at all surprised to hear that, when her present Majesty visited the MS. department of the British Museum, this unimpressive-looking sheet of common letter-paper was what she first and chiefly desired to see.

THE RECENT TIR NATIONAL AT VINCENNES, NEAR PARIS—FROM A DRAWING BY J. A. BEAUCE—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE 1ST NATIONAL AT VINCENNES.

It is somewhat strange that in a military country like France the establishment of annual shooting meetings has not been more effected. Quite contrary to the general rule, our French neighbours seem to be almost the last in adopting such an institution; instead of taking their usual initiatives, they have only followed in the wake of Switzerland, Germany, Belgium, and England; and we feel inclined to believe that even the 1st National, now introduced for the first time under the present department, and intended to be extended to other parts of the country, is owing more to the personal popularity and influence of the Emperor than to any real rifle associations than to any other impulse to which it might be attributed.

The long ranges and the shooting in inches (to which we alluded cursorily in a recent Number of this Journal) has not been so successful as the promoters could have wished, but the change in practice opened down to its proposed termination there was scarcely a day of passably fine weather; and it frequently happened that such a day of passably fine weather; and it frequently happened that a small number of persons rendered it a dull affair for the time. Then, again, shooting is not so much a novelty for Frenchmen as it is with us, and, with all French principles being carried to an unusual end to handle a gun; and thus, all things considered, the meeting did not possess so much attraction as might have been expected, especially as it did not receive an Imperial visit till the last official day of its continuance. However, the Emperor visited the ground for the National finiuance. Then, again, shooting is not so much a novelty for Frenchmen as it is with us, and, with all French principles being carried to an unusual end to handle a gun; and thus, all things considered, the meeting did not possess so much attraction as might have been expected, especially as it did not receive an Imperial visit till the last official day of its continuance. However, the Emperor visited the ground for the National Prize, which was won by Sergeant Normand, of the 1st Regiment of Infantry of the Line, with his Majesty offered a splendid fusil de chasse, worth more than four hundred guineas, to the Sergeant who should make the highest score, in consequence of which the meeting was prolonged for three days.

The splendid shooting festival, which opened on the 7th of October, was brought to a close on the 21st ult., having lasted altogether fourteen days. The ground selected for the meeting was, on a restricted scale, of a large space of ground, of about forty acres in extent, in the form of a parallelogram, surrounded by a low grass railing in front, and on the other sides excluding the view of people on the outside, from which only the decorative entrance, ornamented with the Imperial arms, was visible. At one end, the 1st entrance to the salle des spectateurs was approached through a large temporary garden, tastefully laid out, and embraced many of the finest specimens of magnolias, rhododendrons, and orange-trees. The hundred acres of the construction consisted of three vast galleries, covered portion of the construction consisted of three vast galleries, covered portion of the construction consisted of three vast galleries, covered portion

PRESENTATION OF A SILVER BUGLE

BY MISS BURDETT COUTTS.

An interesting event in connection with the Volunteer Rifle Corps movement took place on Saturday week at Highgate—the presentation of a magnificent silver bugle (subscribed for by the ladies of Highgate) by Miss Angela Burdett Coutts to the Highgate Rifle Corps.

The event came off on the grounds adjacent to Holly Lodge, the residence of Miss Coutts. The beauty of the day attracted a vast concourse of spectators, in addition to the gentry of the district, and it is computed that there were at least from five to six thousand persons on the ground to witness the proceedings. A select circle of Miss Burdett Coutts's friends, the lady subscribers, and those of the officers of the various corps to be engaged in the ceremony, was entertained at a dejeuner, at one o'clock, in the mansion of Holly Lodge; whilst a spacious marquee, capable of accommodating several hundred persons, was erected in the outer ground, in which refreshments were prepared for the effectives of the several corps on the ground after the ceremony and the performance of their military duties were concluded. About two o'clock the second battalion, consisting of the Hampstead, Hornsey, and Highgate Volunteers, marched on to the Brookfield parade-ground, preceded by a detachment of 100 men of the 79th North Middlesex, under the command of Captain Rose, for the purpose of keeping the ground. Shortly before three o'clock the battalion under the command of Captain Wilkinson, the Highgate, under Captain Langdale, the Hornsey, under Captain Warner, and the Hampstead, under the command of Captain M'Innes, marched into the upper field; and immediately afterwards the guests at the mansion, preceded by the full band of the Coldstream Guards, in their state uniform, started for the presentation tent, on arriving at which they were received with general cheering. Miss Burdett Coutts was accompanied by W. H. Bodkin, Esq., Deputy-Lieutenant of Middlesex, the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor Elect, Archdeacon Sinclair, the Rev. Mr. Dalton (the Rector of Highgate), and a large concourse of ladies and gentlemen. In front of the presentation tent was erected a projecting platform, covered with scarlet cloth, at the end of which was a flagstaff, bearing a splendid union-jack and other decorations. The company having taken their seats, the battalion marched up in column, and, on arriving within a short distance of the presentation tent, deployed, and formed into line. The Hampstead and Hornsey companies then wheeled right and left, forming two sides of a square, the Highgate corps, in the centre, facing the tent. The Highgate cadets were drawn up to the right and left of the platform, inside the Hampstead and Hornsey companies. The ranks were then opened, and the salute was given, the band of the North Middlesex Rifles stationed in the rear playing "Rule Britannia."

Miss Burdett Coutts then came forward to the front of the platform, to present the bugle, amidst the enthusiastic cheering of the vast concourse of persons assembled, and addressed the volunteers, in a firm, clear tone of voice, in the following terms:—

Captain Wilkinson and Gentlemen,—The ladies of Highgate have honoured me by the request that I should be their spokeswoman on the present occasion. We feel that this local gathering is the faithful exponent of those sentiments of gratitude and respect which the far-sighted and sensitive patriotism of the volunteer movement calls forth amongst the whole body of your countrywomen. It has allayed those fears, excited by repeated warnings, of the unprepared state of the country in the event of a general European war, or whenever the exigencies of her Majesty's service require the presence of the Army in distant parts of her empire, or in the absence from our shores of that fleet of ours through which, under God, I believe no enemy will ever force his way. Those warnings, apparently unheeded, sank deep into the national heart, and we see to-day the result, as we may see it through the length and breadth of the land, in the proud array of a force, whose services are to be cordially, nay, willingly and freely, to stand side by side with the trained and disciplined troops of our own time (and deeply and gratefully do we acknowledge it), not to the sudden impulse merely of the most sudden the pressure of immediate danger, but to the quiet determination of men ready to make sacrifices in time, and to avert insult as well as disaster from all dear to them. We earnestly pray that Europe may be long spared the calamity of war. May the sweet sounds of this silver bugle, which I now have the honour to present to you as a token of our esteem and of the interest we feel in this corps, only mingle with the peaceful sounds and occupations of the neighbourhood, carrying a sense of security to every heart! But if, indeed, it must sound a harsher note, then we feel that the defenceless state of its donors would stimulate your courage to enforce peace and resistance; and I doubt not that these fields would soon echo to its blast of victory, for you would fight in a united people's most righteous cause—the defence of their Sovereign, their liberties, and their homes.

This address was received with great cheering. The handsome silver bugle was then presented to Captain Wilkinson, who replied in appropriate terms. The volunteers afterwards went through a series of evolutions, and the whole of the interesting proceedings passed off in a highly satisfactory manner.

CHINA.—WHAT NEXT?

A very colloquial phrase has recently been raised by a distinguished writer of fiction to the dignity of a philosophical inquiry. He has sought to show that, in human affairs, when a man has attained a particular thing which he has sought eagerly, dextrously, and persistently, the very important question arises, "What will he do with it?" The intelligence of the complete success of the allied forces against the Taku Forts raises precisely this question. We have gained a victory—how will it be made to fructify? We confess that, in considering the circumstances of the hostilities in which our troops and those of France have been engaged, our first feeling is not one of absolute elation. Far be it from us to insinuate in the slightest degree any depreciation of the manner in which the expedition has been carried out and the brief campaign conducted. It is long since England has had to congratulate herself on witnessing such perfection of organisation in her military affairs as has characterised every department of that admirable army which has been sent to China. In every respect it seems as if it was such an one as our great chieftain would have pronounced as fit to do anything and go anywhere. In passing, we would express our gratification at finding that Sir Hope Grant displayed one of the qualities of generalship which are essentially necessary in the difficult conduct of an allied army, each acting under its own commander, and depending for the springs of common action on the proverbial distraction of councils of war. The English leader having formed an opinion as to the proper point of attack had the moral courage to adhere to it, and by the force of will overcame opposition and had his way, the result proving his calculations to be correct. Every officer and man did his duty with zeal and skill; everything was in excellent working order, and victory was accompanied by all its requisites. Nevertheless, there is something incongruous, something bordering on the ludicrous, in the accounts which tell us of the execution done by Armstrong guns on an enemy who opposed to the choicest weapons of precision in the hands of picked soldiers of Europe the clumsiest ordnance, and such things as bows and arrows. To be sure, owing to the physical courage of the Tartar or Chinese soldiers who wielded such arms, a by no means insignificant amount of casualty occurred in the allied ranks. But what we mean to indicate is, that there was no real military proportion between the troops engaged on either side. It was as the mace of Richard Cœur-de-Lion to a bare bodkin.

But, whatever its character, this sort of contest is not exactly that which it appears we are to continue to have with the Chinese. It would be easy enough to go on pounding with Milward's and Barry's batteries, and making every forty-ninth section of each Armstrong shell account for a dismembered Chinaman. Fane's Horse and Probyn's Sikh cavaliers may disperse clouds of Tartar cavalry, and every individual British or French bayoneteer may spit as many Mongolians as Orlando did Moors. But Chinese craftiness has already seen the uselessness of a struggle in arms; and, if there be anything to be gathered from the accounts of the proceedings after capture of the defences which stood between the allied army and Tien-Tsin, the old plan is about to be tried by these Asiatics, who really only appear subtle and ingenious by the side of English diplomacy. There is little or no question that fighting on anything like an extended scale is over. We hear nothing of any intelligence having been received of further military obstacles, either in the shape of troops or fortified works, being interposed between the allied army and Pekin. If there are, no doubt they would be as promptly removed as has been the case with the Taku Forts. It would seem, however, that just because a military promenade, if it were nothing more, to the capital of the Celestial Empire is the most obvious course to be pursued, that it is just the very one that is not about to be adopted. It is perhaps ill to judge what may be the impressions of able and conscientious men on the spot; but, after all, the idea that players do not see so much of the game as lookers-on is proverbially a rational one. There may be difficulties in the way of those who are intrusted with the transaction of affairs which the people of England expect to lead to a settlement of the Chinese question. But the farce of diplomacy is never more farcical than in China, and British Plenipotentiaries seem to delight to place themselves in the situation of those lovers, who, despite of past experience of the coquetry of their mistresses, are always trusting and always being deceived. The system, which for want of a better word we will call Mandarinism, is one of fraud, deference and what without any variation in its features; and we hear of Commissioner Hung, and on his being superseded, of his successor Fung, patiently saying about satisfactory arrangements which are to be for ever unimpeachable, which are to be of a nature that, between men of mendacity and honour, are great a part of the brain of the Chinese official. And the worst of it is that, as far as we can form an opinion, our diplomatic negotiators—for we have heard little or nothing about Baron Gros, the French Plenipotentiary—are condescending to the same estimate of the army on such secondhand representations as he has received.

If it were not that very serious considerations were involved it would be positively droll to contemplate the revelations made in the intercepted despatches of the Chinese functionaries. They are all based on the assumption that the invaders of their country are in the most ludicrous fear of any continuation of hostilities; that the allied expedition is only a demonstration disabused of the presence in Pekin of an excellent nobleman of no very distinguished presence, escorted by a squadron of lengthy Dragoon Guards mounted on small Arab steeds which waddle beneath the unaccustomed weight of English cavalry giants! And really he the fact that such a step, and that only, will be taken at this the very critical moment, the result no doubt being a march of the whole army hereafter upon the capital, and that when delay and hesitation will have lost that portion of the season most favourable for operations.

A very grave responsibility rests on those who suffer themselves to be induced to negotiate, under any circumstances, but in the midst of our perfectly-equipped and organized force, quartered in the heart of Pekin. All other considerations are to be ruled in and have failed to produce such a treaty, and the ratification of such a treaty as could be wrung from the senses of the real ruler of China Proper by the actual representative presence of European power. Once again we have arrived at the confines of that Empire, and been made the dupes and tools of crafty subordinates, who have laughed at our material strength, and ridiculed our intellectual capacity as exhibited in the conduct of our negotiators. It is calculated that the Chinese War, as far as concerns the cost to the country, is one of ten millions—exactly the amount levied on the people of this country by means of the income tax. Is there to be nothing but a barren treaty, and another war a year or two hence, to be had in exchange for this sacrifice? It is impossible that the object to be attained, failure and ridiculous, whatever they are, are considered to be commensurate with this expenditure. Are we to lose our money and our expected or ideal benefits too? It is certain that the public, not too well informed with regard to, nor too accurately estimating the wealth of the country which our aggressive policy in China is to produce, will ere long begin, if they have not already begun, to demand some clear, palpable explanation as to what it is that our statesmen design in this matter. It will at first be that the Government of that demand is made at a moment when a Finance Minister is asking for additional taxation to meet the huge expenses of a war waged thousands of miles away, which has produced nothing but a treaty which is not worth the paper on which it has been written.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Sydney Peel, Esq., formerly of D'Urban, in the colony of Natal, South Africa, and late of Denbigh, in the county of Flint, who died on the 10th of September, 1857, and a codicil in the months of October following. He appointed the executorship of executors his brother, the Right Hon. Sir Lawrence Peel, and his brother-in-law, Mr. Sandbach. The testator had considerable possessions in South Africa, which he left to his executors for the purpose of realizing the same, and after providing for his personal property in this country, which was admin-istered to under £5000, and certain pecuniary legacies, he bequeathed the residue of his estate to Mr. Edmund Peel only. The testator has left a legacy to each of the executors, but at the same time he says they will have to undertake the trust, and the realization of the property, and his directions as to the disposal of the same, therefore he hopes they will accept the same. The property, and effects shall be invested, and the interest paid, leaving the principal to be equally divided into seven parts, and one of the same to be paid to each of the seven children above. The testator died at Denbigh on the 20th of August last.

The will of the late Matthew Uzielli, Esq., of Hanover Lodge, Regent's Park, was proved at Doctors' Commons on the 15th ult., by Francesco Uzielli and Matthew Uzielli, the sons, and Thomas Gibson and Theodosius Andrew Purnell Hutchinson, Esqs. His personal property is sworn under £140,000, and the testator, to which he left certain freehold property as well as an estate in Belgium. He has given an immediate legacy of £10,000 to his brother Clement; also pecuniary legacies to his wife, and a number of relatives, and to a number of his domestics to his sisters, as well as certain annuities to his sisters, to his widow and remainder of his property, and at her decease to be divided between his children Clement and sisters for the benefit of their children.

The will of Captain William Jones Prowse, R.N., late of Ebbon House, near Andover, Southampton, and Yeovil, Somerset, died on the 27th of August, 1859, was proved in London, on the 8th ult., by the executors nominated being the Rev. Thomas Jones Prowse, Thomas James Ireland, Esq., of Oswald Hall, Suffolk, the Hon. Augustus Anthony Frederick Fitz, and Robert Henry Sawyer, Esq., of Shaftesbury, London, the personalty was sworn under £40,000. He rector that his widow is in the enjoyment of property in her own right, and he gives her the option of retaining the occupation of his residence, Ebbon House, and leaves her for her own absolute use the furniture and household effects, jewellery, horses, and carriages; but the plate, books, pictures, and pictures he has bequeathed to his eldest son, whom he has devised all his real estates, and the residue of the personalty; and to his youngest son he bequeathed a sum of £6000, in addition to his share in the fortune under his mother's marriage settlement.

FRANCE.

The Emperor, on receiving the news of the death of the Dowager Empress of Russia, immediately telegraphed his condolence and those of the Empress to the Court of St. Petersburg. On Saturday last the Court of the Tuileries, without waiting for the official notification of her Majesty's decease, went into mourning for twenty-one days.

A review of the second division of the first corps d'armée, by Marshal Magnan, took place on Sunday, in Chaumont, and attracted a large crowd of spectators. In the division is the new 103rd Regiment, composed of soldiers formerly in the Duchy of Savoy: to this regiment the first appearance of which was greatly admired, the Marshal presented its colours.

It is stated that the orders given to the French Admiral, to sink the Sardinian squadron in the event of its attacking Gaeta, were not intended to intimidate Victor Emanuel, but to prevent the squadron on the part of the Emperor Napoleon, his simply to protect the family of the King of Naples. The Emperor Napoleon considers it to be his duty to pay for the King of Naples that that which has always been at the King's service—an honourable duty.

THE FOREIGN AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT AND THE TREATY.

The Moniteur publishes a circular of the Director-General of Customs relative to the application of the commercial treaty between England and France. After having enumerated and commented upon the different provisions of the treaty, he says that the tariff annexed to the treaty is the basis of the whole, and thus concludes:—"Intermixing these instructions, I must call the attention of the service to the spirit which has presided in the formation of the new tariff. The economical programme laid down by the Emperor in his letter to the Minister of State, and the treaty of commerce with Great Britain, are the solemn manifestations of the principles and tendencies which must hereafter develop themselves in the relations of France with other countries. It is the duty of the customs administration to discern these principles and those tendencies, and to apply them in the details of its daily business. Vigilant, firm, and humane, it must secure the interests of the revenue, it must show itself conciliating in its relations with the commerce, liberal in the interpretation of doubts, and solicitous of useful questions. I need not call the attention of the chief officers of the service to the spirit and manner in which questions, matters, and questions, and by which the public revenue ought to profit, and, in short, to all that is favourable to the development of commerce and industry."

It has been announced in the Moniteur that the time will be authorized by several months for the entry into bonded warehouses of imported iron and imported sugar are to come into operation.

ITALY.

The reign of the Bourbons in Naples is virtually over. Scornfully rejected by the Neapolitans and Sicilians in their recent votes, Francis II. has likewise sustained terrible reverses in the field, and has been driven out from one point after another, till he is now shut up in the fortress of Gaeta, battering throne ere it crumble into ruins, and its late owner, a fugitive, will seek shelter in the hospitable soil of Rome.

Capua capitulated on the 2nd. Military honours were granted to the garrison, which consisted of 6000 men, who marched out with their arms and colours.

Again, the Paris Patrie insists that the credit is due to the interference of the Piedmontese army, which prevented the garrison from execution of the Piedmontese army, which prevented the garrison from maintaining the unconditional capitulation with Gaeta, and obliged the Royal army to abandon the line of the Volturno—"The place," it says, "is maintained in the hands of the King of Naples, but Capua has been left to their own resources they could not have taken it. Even the works that were thrown up over against it would be attacked."

The latter in the course of a few days formed a second parallel, constructed on the right a place-d'armes and a breaching battery which had opened on the 1st on the south-east of the centre, and obliged the Neapolitan troops to capitulate after a very honourable defence.

After the capture of Capua, Victor Emanuel's troops quickly threw across the Garigliano. Here Victor Emanuel was operating in person, and he did he assault the Bourbon army in front, while his fleet attacked it in flank, and obtained a complete victory. The Royal forces fled from the field, leaving behind all their artillery, ammunition, provisions, and materiel, besides a large number of prisoners. General Sonnaz pursued the enemy, and afterwards occupied Mola di Gaeta, and subsequently Formia. The Royalists only remain the walls of Gaeta between the Bourbon forces and their victorious opponents.

A body of 15,000 Neapolitan troops, with 4000 horses and 32 guns, being pursued by the Sardinian troops, fled to the Papal States at Terracina. Cialdini, their progress was arrested by the Papal and French authorities, and they will be at once disarmed.

THE ABOLITION OF THE VOTE.

The Supreme Court of Justice has proclaimed the result of the plebiscite in the kingdom of Naples, which is as follows:—

Yes	...	1,302,064
No	...	10,312
Majority in favour of annexation	...	1,291,752

The officially-announced results of the voting in Sicily upon the question of annexation are as follows:—

Yes	...	432,054
Noes	...	667

ENTRY OF VICTOR EMANUEL INTO NAPLES.

King Victor Emanuel entered the city of Naples on Wednesday at half-past nine o'clock in the morning. An immense crowd of people assembled, acclaiming and shouting for joy. Flowers were falling. Universal joy was manifested.

INTERVIEW BETWEEN VICTOR EMANUEL AND GARIBALDI.

Garibaldi left Naples on Sunday last on the 26th ult., near Teano. The greeting on both sides was most cordial. Major Cattaneo, Commandant of Garibaldi's head quarters, gives the following account of the interview:—

Garibaldi had taken up his quarters at a small inn, about four miles and a half between Teano and Speranzano, on the 25th. He ordered his column to halt on the side of the road, and proceeded to see the King. On the 26th the morning General Turchi and Missori came to inform him the Sardinian army was approaching, and that the King was with the advanced guard. Garibaldi on horseback, followed by his staff, and three-quarters of an hour afterwards became in sight of the King and his staff, who were coming from Teano. The troops of the two armies advanced as follows:—The 2nd and 5th Regiments of the Cosso Brigade in the van, and the 3rd Regiment of the Medici Brigade in the rear. The columns presented arms to Garibaldi, and ceased to allow him to pass through. Garibaldi rode forward, and, approaching the King, saluted him most affectionately. After exchanging a few words, Garibaldi commanded to meet the King. Victor Emanuel was not far behind, and on his left was Fanti, before being the red shirts, the King took a telescope, and, recognizing Garibaldi and some of his staff, pointed out the personages towards him. Garibaldi, When they were within ten paces of each other, the officers of the King and Garibaldi saluted each other, and Garibaldi and Victor Emanuel took the hands of his staff, and, in a voice somewhat hoarse from emotion, said, "King of Italy!" Victor Emanuel replied, "Thank you!" They stood thus, hand in hand, for equally moved, replied. "Thank you!" They stood thus, hand in hand, for nearly a minute, Garibaldi saluting the staff of the King, and the King, still holding each other's hand, followed the troops for about a quarter of an hour. They then halted, and the King dismounted on a short distance behind them. Passing a group of officers, Garibaldi saluted them, among them Generals Fanti, Della Rocca, and Cialdini, forming cap of a staff officer, and General Fanti, the 26th, and 30th Regiments of the Line, then sixty guns, and four regiments of cavalry, all of which saluted the King. The total of 40,000 men, during which Victor Emanuel halted and ordered a portion of his army to die off to the right, and Garibaldi to the left, and the remainder to defile in front. Garibaldi then proceeded between him and the chivalrie. He then received Nicotera's brigade, which was marching to Naples. He was received with the same enthusiastic and unanimous shouts of 'Long Live the King of Italy!' Garibaldi then left them, and returned to his former position. The King continued at Teano. Garibaldi returned to Caserta to give orders.

We hear from Rome that General Lamoricière has been created a Roman noble. A decree orders a medal to be struck in his honour, and he is to figure henceforth in the Almanach de Gotha as a Prince. By Pio Nono's act he will stand on a par with all the Princes of the Holy Roman Empire. The voting on the question of annexation in Umbria and the Marches was proceeding, and the returns received give satisfactory results, viewed from the Sardinian side. Perfect order and calmness prevail everywhere. Large quantities of stores and war material have been sent from Rome to Gaeta for the use of the Royalists, and many foreigners for the Papal army have been stopped. Beds for hospitals for the wounded have been sent from Rome to Francis II.

AUSTRIA.

The Empress is about to visit Madeira. Her Majesty is in a delicate state of health, and she has been advised to winter in a more genial climate, and the above island has been chosen for the purpose. A British war-steamer has been placed at the disposal of the Empress, who purposes to leave for Madeira about the 17th inst.

The Austrian Government has issued a circular, in which it enlea-vours to impress on the German States the importance of the Constitutional reforms which it has just inaugurated, and dwells on the closer connection with Germany which must result from them.

Count Rechberg has issued a diplomatic circular explaining the objects and results of the Warsaw interview. It conveys the important announcement that Austria, Russia, and Prussia have decided to follow a common line of non-intervention in Italy. Count Rechberg, we are informed, declares that the Warsaw meeting has had the effect of peace of consolidating the friendly relations of the three Sovereigns who took part in it, and of concerting their policy with regard to the Italian question. A protocol, a copy of which we are not told the nature, was established between them; but Count Rechberg asserts that the three Powers agreed not to interfere in the affairs of Italy so long as no attempt which may provoke a war.

According to the Lithographic Correspondence of Vienna, the new Diet of Hungary is to meet at Pressburg.

Three Austrian ships have been constructed at Trieste. Eight are to have engines of 250-horse power and four 48-pounders: four are to have engines of 200-horse power, one Paixhan, and two 12-pounders. Some smaller gun-boats are also being built, and they will, when finished, be placed at the entrances to some of the ports on the coast of Dalmatia.

SWEDEN.

The Order of Citizens and the Order of Peasants of Sweden have adopted addresses to the Crown, praying for a reform in the national representation.

The close of the Session of the Swedish Chambers took place at Stockholm on the 20th ult., with the usual ceremonies. Among the measures on which the Chambers occupied themselves during the Session adopted during the Session was one for the perfect toleration of all religious creeds.

INDIA.

The Overland Mail brings us dates from Calcutta to the 22nd of September. The state of affairs there is being rapidly put right by strictures and complaints of almost all the recent Acts of the Governor-General himself. The Legislative Council is becoming a real deliberative body, the indigo commission, and above all the income tax, in making out the returns for which the whole community was engaged. Trade also is reported to be in a healthy stagnate. The Government has issued a notification informing the local European army that the amalgamation of the army will not affect their rights and privileges; that they will not be called on to serve out of India during the term of their engagements. The Bombay Gazette of the 15th inst. says:—"On the 13th inst. Major-General Woodburn died at Ahmedabad on the night of the 28th of September; and Dr. Bellasis, of Bombay, left on a visit of a quarantine. There have been no symptoms of disaffection manifested (as was stated last week) by the 6th European Regiment at Dinapore.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

INTELLIGENCE has been received of the reception of the Prince of Wales at Boston, where all went well, and of his departure for Newfoundland on the 20th inst. The following is the narrative:—

The Prince of Wales and suite left Albany on the morning of the 19th ult., arriving at the Boston station at 2 p.m., being the Worcester line of railway. At the depôt Governor Morgan, Senator Seward, and others of Lincolnshire Republicans have left Albany with Worcester, and other places along the route, large crowds of people were assembled, and in response to their calls he Highness occasionally showed himself. The Prince was received at the depôt by a guard of honour of the 1st Regiment of Cavalry, under the escort of the Boston Lancers and Light Dragoons, proceeded to the Revere House. The side-walks, windows, and roofs were filled with the noble ranks of Massachusetts people, whose welcome was hearty.

The demonstration on the 18th in honour of the Prince were elaborate and imposing. The public buildings were decorated, and the streets were filled with the long line of his daughters, who in upwards of seventy years of age. About 9000 military, including artillery, cavalry, and infantry, were under the command of the day by Prince and suite, Governor Banks, and a numerous Staff. After the review the Prince was presented to several of the city and principal streets, the Prince and suite, the Governor and others, occupying carriages. The display is represented to have been the most imposing ever seen in the city of Boston, and was witnessed by thousands. A collation followed at the State House given by Governor Banks, at which there was a select company of the principal citizens of the city holding. At about five o'clock the Prince and suite were escorted to the Municipal, where the Mayor and City Council were assembled. The reception consisted principally of singing, and seemed to afford the distinguished visitors much gratification. The festivities of the occasion wound up with a grand ball at the Academy of Music.

On the 20th the Royal party visited Cambridge, Bunker-hill, Mount Auburn Cemetery, and Harvard College, and in the evening the Prince was welcomed in Deane Hall by President Felton and the Faculty, while he was in the College, and was introduced by the presenting the library of the Scientific School and the Observatory, the party partook of a collation at Harvard Hall. The evening was passed through the in numbers who crowded the Prince heartily as he passed through the city. In the evening his Highness visited the Boston Public Library.

The Prince and his suite left Boston on the forenoon of the 20th, amid enthusiastic cheers from the citizens, and accompanied by Governor Banks and a numerous cavalcade of the Staff of England, where he was received by Governor of the State of Maine, the Mayor of Portland, a respectable body of citizens, and the entire population. The route through the streets of the city, and finally embarked on board the British war-steamer Styx, in succession of the Atlantic Ocean, the Governor and the bands played the national airs of Britain and America, the vast concourse of people cheering the Prince, and the Royal standard streamed away for "Merrie England."

The Paris Gazette officially announces the opening of the Corps Législatif for the 15th inst.

The marble bust of Alexander von Humboldt, by David d'Angers, has been purchased for the Louvre, at a cost of 7000f.

A riot has occurred between the military and the civilian population at Aldershot, in Hampshire Surrey, which has led to some personal being wounded—one dangerously.

A considerable commercial serious ratus has broken out between the two Chambers of Hesse Darmstadt relating to the civil rights of the Catholic Church. The Second Chamber refused the budget unless it be re-gotiated by law, and the First Chamber can read they can only be settled by a concordat.

THE HEIR TO THE THRONE OF ITALY.—Prince Humbert, a youth now in his seventeenth year—a bold and gallant-looking lad, and a favourite with the rifle, exhibiting skill and coolness on all manly exercises, endowed with a fair, open countenance, in which the noble blue blood mingles with the ruddy tint of health, and with a most expressive expression of the mother, Sardinia is blended with the delicate and graceful address—you plainly espousal distinguished by affable manners and a high-toned spirit, bearing when bowed with the multitudes to be present at the review of the 31st ult. Prince Humbert, mounted on his light-grey Arab. The event which his father and grandfather have achieved will have grown up into a full and glorious harvest by the time the fortunate youth succeeds to the throne. That throne to which no more of his race aspired in the secret of their hearts almost ever since the days of the First Humbert, will fall to the lot of this fourth Humbert by a series of prosperous vicissitudes, than which nothing more marvellous was ever woven by the shuttle of romance. The Prince of Piedmont has almost at hand, yet the final issue still trembles in the scales of Fate.—Letter from Paris.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegram was received through Mr. Renter's office yesterday (Friday) :—

NAPLES.—Turin, Thursday.—The Turin journals announce that the investing of Gaeta on the land side continues. The Opinione publishes a proclamation of King Victor Emmanuel to the Neapolitan and Sicilian peoples. His Majesty accepts the Sovereign authority of the Two Sicilies, transferred to him by universal suffrage. A despatch from Naples states that the departure of Prince Leopold from Gaeta is imminent, in consequence of the advice given to his Majesty by the commanders of the foreign fleets.

THE ITALIAN POLICY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

A most important despatch, enunciating the policy of the British Government respecting Italian affairs, has been addressed by Lord John Russell to Sir James Hudson, the British Minister at Turin. It is as follows :—

"Foreign Office, October 27.

"Sir,—It appears that the late proceedings of the Royal Navy have been strongly disapproved by a portion of the journalists of the Papal

"The Emperor of Austria, in his recent allocution to his Italian subjects, has spoken of the general Christian, rather than of the Roman Catholic, character of the Austrian Empire, and has expressed his confidence in the devotion of the Austrian army to the person of the Emperor, and to the interests of the Austrian Empire.

"The Emperor of Russia has declared that the Russian army is ready to march to the assistance of Austria, in case she should be attacked in consequence of the position which she has taken up in Italy.

"The King of Prussia has declared that the Prussian army is ready to march to the assistance of Austria, in case she should be attacked in consequence of the position which she has taken up in Italy.

"The King of Bavaria has declared that the Bavarian army is ready to march to the assistance of Austria, in case she should be attacked in consequence of the position which she has taken up in Italy.

"The King of Saxony has declared that the Saxon army is ready to march to the assistance of Austria, in case she should be attacked in consequence of the position which she has taken up in Italy.

"The King of Hanover has declared that the Hanoverian army is ready to march to the assistance of Austria, in case she should be attacked in consequence of the position which she has taken up in Italy.

"The Diet of Frankfort has declared that the German army is ready to march to the assistance of Austria, in case she should be attacked in consequence of the position which she has taken up in Italy.

"The Emperor of Austria, the Emperor of Russia, the King of Prussia, the King of Bavaria, the King of Saxony, the King of Hanover, and the Diet of Frankfort, have declared that they will consider any attack upon Austria, in consequence of the position which she has taken up in Italy, as an attack upon the whole of Germany.

"The Emperor of Austria has declared that he will not consent to any cession of territory in Italy, except to Sardinia

LITERATURE.

POEMS. By ELIZA COOK. Routledge.

THUS early in the season Mr. Routledge has commenced the issue of his usual series of magnificent gift-books. This is a volume got up in the very first style of richness and ornamentation as regards externals, and crowded with illustrations to poems selected by the author. The artists who have been chosen to deal with the subjects are familiar for their excellence, being John Gilbert, J. Wolf, Harrison Weir, J. D. Watson, &c.; while the execution of the engravings has been committed to the trusty hands of the Messrs. Dalziel. It is not necessary to say more to guarantee the completeness of the work, and we show our appreciation of its merits by transferring those of the illustrations to our columns, accompanied by extracts from the poems which sufficiently designate the subjects :—

THE GIPSY CHILD.

He grows like the young oak, healthy and broad,
With no home but the forest, no bed but the sward;
Half-naked, he wades in the limpid stream,
Or dances about in the scorching beam.
The dazzling glare of the banquet sheen
Hath never fallen on him, I ween;
But fragments are spread, and wood-fire piled;
And sweet is the meal of the gipsy child.

THE POOR MAN'S GRAVE.

There is not one of kindred clay
To watch the coffin as it lay:
No mental form, no human breast
Cares where the pauper's bones may rest.

But one deep mourner follows there,
Whose grief outlives the funeral prayer;
He does not sigh—he does not weep,
But will not leave the fresh-piled heap.
'Tis he who was the poor man's mate,
And made him more content with fate;
The meagrest dog that shares his crust,
Is all that stands beside his dust.

THE A WILD NIGHT AT SEA.

The clouds arose in giant shape,
And the wind with a piercing gust—
Dark as a murderer's mask of crape,
And sharp as a penlurd-thrust.

Thicker and wider the gloom stretch'd out,
With a flash of angry red;
Till the hissing lightning blazed about,
And the forest beat its head.

A maiden look'd from a lattice-pane
Toward where the ocean lay;
And her gaze was fix'd with earnest strain
On the breaker, leagues away.

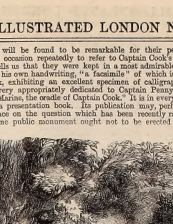
She knew that he who had won her soul
Was getting close to land;
And she chuckled at every thunder roll
With a hard, convulsive hand.

* * * *

An old crone pass'd the lattice-pane—
"God help us all!" quoth she;
"'Tis bad on the mountain, but worse on the main—
'Tis a wild night at sea!"

* * * *

Morning came with a tale too true,
Ay and so tale could be!
"A homeward bound" went down with her crew
"'Twas a wild night at sea!"



The maiden heard, yet never stirr'd,
Nor eye, nor lip, nor brow;
But more hard grown as the sepulchre-stone,
And it crew'd a skeleton now.

* * * *

The maiden still is in her home,
But not a word breathes she!
Save those that seal'd her gipsy doom—
"'Tis a wild night at sea!"

CAPTAIN COOK'S VOYAGES OF DISCOVERY. Edited by JOHN BARROW, A. and C. Black, Edinburgh.

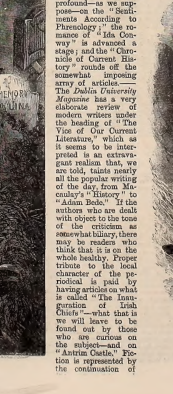
In a very compact form, and with much accessory illustration, we have here a semi-official account of the voyages of the great navigator, whose name is a household word in this country. The editor has been permitted to inspect the documents at the Admiralty relating to Cook's voyages as well as his correspondence, and to make say extracts therefrom which he thought desirable. He has been consequently enabled to present to the world many interesting letters not hitherto published, and which will be found to be remarkable for their perspicuity. Having had occasion repeatedly to refer to Captain Cook's log-books the editor tells us that they were kept in a most admirable manner. They are in his own handwriting, "a facsimile" of which is attached to the work, exhibiting an excellent specimen of calligraphy. The volume is very appropriately dedicated to Captain Peany, "of the Mercantile Marine, the cradle of Captain Cook." It is in every way calculated for a presentation book. Its publication may, perhaps, have some influence on the question which has been recently raised as to whether some public monument ought not to be erected to one of

"THE GIPSY CHILD."

England's worthies, such as Cook must always be esteemed. At present the only memorial to the navigator is a tablet in the Church of St. Andrew the Great, in Cambridge. His widow and two sons were buried there, the former surviving her husband fifty years, and dying in 1835 at the advanced age of ninety-four. The tablet with the inscription relating to Cook hinged within the rail of the communion-table, against the north wall. There is an appropriate design sculptured at the top of the tablet significant of naval discovery, and below there is a small shield, the device of a globe and a star, with the motto sil intentatum reliquit.

THE MAGAZINES.

In the midst of the competition which has lately pervaded that section of literature which is occupied by the magazines, it is satisfactory to find that Fraser holds its own. Those who remember the firework brilliancy of this serial—we will not say how many years ago, when its contributors were scholars who evoked satire and fun from the depths of classic lore, and whose fantasies were to the Bohemianism of literary writing in the present day as Hyperion to a Satyr—will be always glad to welcome this periodical at the beginning of each month, and to see that if imbued with something of the soberness of age it exhibits none of its positive infirmity. The two first articles, "The Philosophy of Marriage Studied under Sir Cresswell Cresswell," and the continuation of the paper on "France and Paris, Forty, Thirty, and Twenty Years Ago," would alone suffice to rescue the number from any accusation of dullness; but when to that is added the conclusion of the series of caustic criticisms on "Alison's History of Europe" by a hand which has not forgotten that cunning of the sarcasm of age it exhibits none of its positive infirmity. The two first articles, "The Philosophy of Marriage Studied under Sir Cresswell Cresswell," and the continuation of the paper on "France and Paris, Forty, Thirty, and Twenty Years Ago," would alone suffice to rescue the number from any accusation of dullness; but when to that is added the conclusion of the series of caustic criticisms on "Alison's History of Europe" by a hand which has not forgotten that cunning of the sarcasm of age which was then so essentially Frasarian, there is good matter enough, and to spare. Still there is more that is temporary, as regards the article entitled "Political Economy in the Clouds," in which what is called with some show of reason Mr. Ruskin's "flashy" style is by young contemporary is dealt with in a manner as characteristic as the onslaught on Alison is made. Mr. Monckton Milnes is getting quite magazine; and here he is doing what he can to extract value from those of Humboldt's letters which his injudicious friends have lately laid before the world. Besides this, there is a pleasant paper on Assheton Smith's memoirs; Mr. Peacock carries on his quaint talked "Gryll Grange;" Mr. Alexander Bain is profound—as we suppose—on the "Sentiments According to Phrenology;" the romance of "Ida Conway" is advanced a stage; and the "Chronicle of Current History" rounds off the somewhat imposing array of articles.—The Dublin University Magazine has a very elaborate review of modern writers under the heading of "The Vice of Our Current Literature," which as it seems to be interpreted is an extravagant realism that, we are told, taints nearly all the popular writing of the day, from Mr. Conolly's "History" to "Adam Bede." If the authors who are dealt with object to the tone of the criticism as somewhat biliary, there may be readers who think that it is on the whole healthy. Proper tribute to the local character of the periodical is paid by having articles on what is called "The Insurgeration of Irish Chiefs"—what that is we will leave to be found out by those who are curious on the subject—and on "Antrim Castle." Fiction is represented by the continuation of "Vonved the Dane," and the commencement of a tale of the civil wars entitled "A House Divided Against Itself;" Professor Verlour exhumes our old friend, not to say vile note, "The Old;" there is "The Seven Ages of Italy," appropriate now that we are about to have an eighth age of that country; "The Week-a-Day World of France," with its remarkable knowledge of the social current and undercurrent of French life, is still carried on; and there are some plain, unvarnished, but, as we can testify, very accurate "Sketches in the West Indies." Besides, there is a paper on "Foreign and Domestic Politics," and volume-notices of "Recent Publications." What can we say more?



Some scribe in a newspaper has had the audacity so say that the new number of the Cornhill is dull; qualifying his assertion, however, by adding the words "as compared with the previous issue." Well, perhaps it is; but may not the explanation be found in the article called "A Roundabout Journey." While the master-spirit was taking those notes of a week's holiday probably the labour of selection for the current number was committed to other hands. The papers severally entitled "Neighbours," "Work," and "Oratory," if they appeared in some other serials which we wot of, would have been probably pronounced very good indeed; and, even for the Cornhill, we will venture to say that they are well up to the mark. We confess to have shrunk from reading the paper on "Weather" for skiey reasons, which are sufficiently obvious; and, though specially interested just now in the subject of the French tariff, we did not venture on Mr. Roskin's definition of the term "ad valorem," but this we say without prejudice to the article. "Framley Parsonage" is fast working up to the crisis, and poetry is duly represented by Owen Meredith and Miss Procter. If there be any shortcomings, still this magazine continues to be a literary wonder, when the end which is asked for the pay is considered. From time to time there appears to be a disposition among literary men to falsify Keats's prophecy that "his name would be writ in water." Now, Mr. Masson is doing his best—and that is something—in that direction by his article on "The Life and Poetry of Keats," in Macmillan's Magazine. It is not to be said that the subject has lost all its interest; but still, things taken together, it is probable that, melancholy as was Keats's history, he has had at least posthumous justice. Nevertheless, the paper in this serial is written from a point of view that invests it with a character of its own. A very bold contributor, who declares himself to be a son-in-law, has ventured a "Defence of Mothers-in-Law," and he has done very well—for the subject. "Tom Brown" is anywhere but at "Oxford;" and, if we were compelled to say where he is, we should be inclined to use a racing phrase, and say "nowhere." Is it our fancy?—but this seems one of the longest stories we ever encountered. There are twelve papers in all in Macmillan this month; and if you do not get excited by any of them, as you expect to be by those in the Cornhill, you are sure to find something well worth considering in most of them. There seems to be something like idea in the plan of the editing. The Eclectic gets more reviewish and less magaziny in each succeeding number; and it is so sensibly and carefully written, and in such a peculiar tone, that, but for the difference of weight as it is held in the hand, you would generally think you were reading a quarterly rather than a monthly. We would—with a qualification—direct attention to a very popular paper headed "The Apostolic Principles of Finance," in this number.

The New Monthly and Bentley's Miscellany are quite up to the average. In the former an article on the "Bruses of the Hauran" perhaps stands the most prominent; while in the latter the "Ouiremaschie Correspondence" keeps its place. There is an amusing paper on the "French Almanacks for 1861;" and the somewhat curious idea of biographizing the successors of the Kings of France is continued, the subject this time being "Agnès Sorel." The English Woman's Journal is very strict in its mission as usual. There is a humorsome feature in the production in this number of a full account of the special meetings at Glasgow and Edinburgh with reference to the industrial employment of women. So far as we have learned the intended purpose of the magazine there are pleasant papers enough, and informatory besides. The subject of the vine and of grape-crops, which has become important of late, is well treated under the heading of "Fruits in their Season."

In the Art-Journal the large steel engravings are, so far as choice of subjects are concerned, not so striking to the uninitiated eye as usual; but the execution of them is, if possible, more finished than ever. So with all the wood engravings. We would particularly point to those illustrating a paper entitled "The Hudson, from the Wilderness to the Sea." What abundance of pleasant reading, and something more, there always is in this periodical. The list of its literary contents is as various as it is full.—Mr. Leve's serial tale—"One of Them"—has now reached its twelfth number, and the interest expands as the crisis evidently approaches. The intriguing characters are beginning to explain their designs and to review their past lives: while the injured parties are clearly on the point of receiving poetical justice.

"THE POOR MAN'S GRAVE."

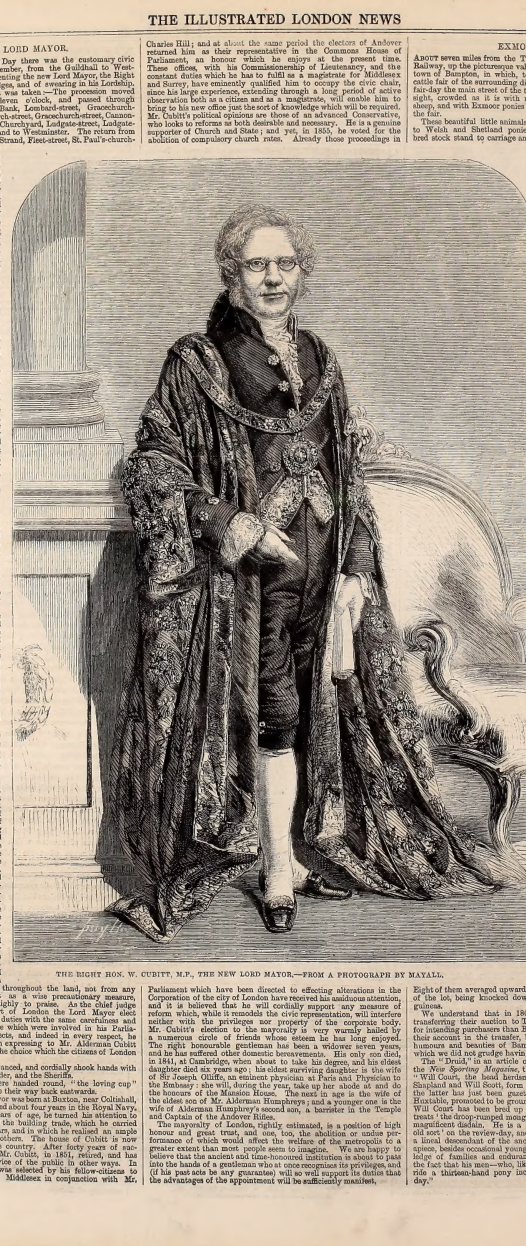
"THE A WILD NIGHT AT SEA."

THE NEW LORD MAYOR.

YESTERDAY being Lord Mayor's Day there was the customary civic procession, on the 9th of November, from the Guildhall to Westminster, for the purpose of presenting the new Lord Mayor, the Right Hon. William Cubitt, to the Judges, and of swearing in his Lordship. The following is the route that was taken:—The procession moved from Guildhall at half-past eleven o'clock, and passed through Gresham-street, Prince-street, Bank, Lombard-street, Gracechurch-street, Leadenhall-street, Fenchurch-street, Gracechurch-street, Cannon-street (east and west), St. Paul's Churchyard, Ludgate-street, Ludgate-hill, Fleet-street, and by the Strand to Westminster. The return from Westminster was by way of the Strand, Fleet-street, St. Paul's-church-yard, Cheapside, and King-street to Guildhall. The London Rifle Brigade formed a guard of honour in Guildhall-yard and King-street to receive the Lord Mayor on his return from Westminster. In the evening the usual inaugurating banquet was held in the Guildhall, attended by Ministers of State, Ambassadors, Judges, members of Parliament, and celebrities in the domains of science, art, and literature. To-day, the ceremonials and festivities which mark the coming in of the new city potentate being over, his reign for the year ensuing may be said to begin in sober earnest, and there is every reason to believe that the present Lord Mayor's term of office will be alike honourable to himself and a benefit to the great interests over which he presides.

A grand civic procession started westward yesterday week for the purpose of conducting the Lord Mayor elect to the private residence of the Lord Chancellor, at Knightsbridge, there to receive, through that high officer of State, her Majesty's approval of the choice which the citizens of London have made for the mayoralty of the next year. Amongst those who formed the procession were the Lord Mayor elect; the Right Hon. Russell Gurney, Recorder of London; Alderman and Sheriff Abbiss, Mr. Sheriff Lusk, Alderman Sir Henry Muggeridge (the next in succession for the mayoralty); Alderman Hale, Mr. Thomas Chambers, the Common Serjeant; Mr. Commissioner Kerr, Mr. Charles Pearson, the City Solicitor; Mr. Benjamin Scott, the City Chamberlain; Mr. Secondary Potter, the Town Clerk, and other officials. These gentlemen were received by the Lord Chancellor in the drawing-room of Strathedon House. His Lordship was attired in his full robes of office, and was attended by his secretary, and by the two gentlemen who act respectively as "purse" and "mace."

The Recorder introduced the Lord Mayor elect. He remarked that Mr. Alderman Cubitt, whom the citizens of London had selected to fill the office of Lord Mayor for the ensuing year, was a gentleman who was in all respects eminently qualified to fill that high and responsible office. For many years he had carried on a large business; all his dealings had been characterised by honour and integrity, and, he was happy to add, had been crowned with success. Alderman Cubitt was held in the highest possible esteem by his fellow-citizens, and he had the greatest confidence in presenting him to the Lord Chancellor for her Majesty's approval.



The Lord Chancellor, addressing the Lord Mayor elect, said that it was with the greatest satisfaction he had to state that her Majesty highly approved of the choice which the citizens of London had made in selecting him to fill the office of Lord Mayor—an office which was worthy of the ambition of the most distinguished men the city of London could produce. The Lord Mayor elect entered upon his office at a time of comparative peace, and would, therefore, no doubt direct his attention to the encouragement of those great social reforms which were so much needed. While, however, we were at peace, an important body had been organised in the city of London, as in other parts of the country, which his Lordship would, no doubt, encourage and support—he alluded to the Volunteer movement, which had been so warmly espoused throughout the land, not from any immediate fear of danger, but as a wise precautionary measure, which it was impossible too highly to praise. As the chief judge of the Central Criminal Court of London the Lord Mayor elect would no doubt discharge his duties with the same carefulness and zeal as he had discharged those which were involved in his Parliamentary avocations. In these respects, and indeed in every respect, he felt peculiarly gratified in again expressing to Mr. Alderman Cubitt her Majesty's high approval of the choice which the citizens of London had made.

The Lord Chancellor then advanced, and cordially shook hands with the Lord Mayor elect, the Recorder, and the Sheriffs.

After this wine and cakes were handed round, "the loving cup" passed, and the civic party made their way back eastwards.

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor was born at Buxton, near Coltishall, in Norfolk, and in early life served about four years in the Royal Navy. While being then fourteen years of age, he turned his attention to commercial matters, and entered the building trade, which he carried on until within the last four years, and in which he realised an ample fortune in connexion with his brothers. The house of Cubitt is now one of the most eminent in the country. After forty years of successful application to business Mr. Cubitt, in 1851, retired, and has devoted his attention to the service of the public in other ways. In 1847, while still in business, he was selected by his fellow-citizens to the shrievalty of London and Middlesex in conjunction with Mr. Charles Hill; and at about the same period the electors of Andover returned him as their representative in the Common House of Parliament, an honour which he enjoys at the present time. These offices, with his Commissionership of Lieutenancy, and the constant duties which he has to fulfil as a magistrate for Middlesex and Surrey, have eminently qualified him to occupy the civic chair, since his large experience, extending through a long period of active observation both as a citizen and as a magistrate, will enable him to bring to his new office just the sort of knowledge which will be required. Mr. Cubitt's political opinions are those of an advanced Conservative, who looks to reforms as being both desirable and necessary. He is a genuine supporter of Church and State; and yet, in 1855, he voted for the abolition of compulsory church rates. Already those proceedings in Parliament which have been directed to effecting alterations in the Corporation of the city of London have received his assiduous attention, and it is believed that he will cordially support any measure of reform which, while it remodels the civic representation, will interfere neither with the privileges nor property of the corporate body. Mr. Cubitt's election to the mayoralty is very warmly hailed by a numerous circle of friends whose esteem he has long enjoyed. The right honourable gentleman has been a widower seven years, and he has suffered other domestic bereavements. His only son died, in 1841, at Cambridge, when about to take his degree, and his eldest daughter died six years ago; his eldest surviving daughter is the wife of Sir Joseph Olliffe, an eminent physician at Paris and Physician to the Embassy: she will, during the year, take up her abode at and do the honours of the Mansion House. The next in age is the wife of the eldest son of Mr. Alderman Humphreys; and a younger one is the wife of Alderman Humphrey's second son, a barrister in the Temple and Captain of the Andover Rifles.

The mayoralty of London, rightly estimated, is a position of high honour and great trust, and one, too, the abolition or undue performance of which would affect the welfare of the metropolis to a greater extent than most people seem to imagine. We are happy to believe that the ancient and time-honoured institution is about to pass into the hands of a gentleman who at once recognises its privileges, and of his past acts he may guarantee will so well support its status that the advantages of the appointment will be sufficiently manifest.

EXMOOR PONIES.

ABOUT seven miles from the Tiverton station of the Great Western Railway, up the picturesque valley of the Exe, lies the small little town of Bampton, in which, towards the end of October, the chief cattle fair of the surrounding district is annually held. On Bampton fair-day the main street of the town exhibits an animated and striking sight, crowded as it is with rich red Devon cattle, with mountain sheep, and with Exmoor ponies of all ages and sizes, the popularity of the fair.

These beautiful little animals, bred wild on the hills around, stand to Welsh and Shetland ponies in the same affinity that thoroughbred stock stand to carriage and cart horses. They owe the extraordinary distinction of their race, evinced in their small lean heads, their long, thin manes, their sinewy, sloping shoulders, their strong loins, and their quick, dainty action, to the pains taken in breeding them, many years ago, by Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, and to the blood of an ancestor of theirs, of Arab or Barb descent, introduced by Sir Thomas, and still remembered with admiration by the pony-breeders of Exmoor as the famous Katterfelto. Their height ranges between eleven and thirteen hands; the largest, from their substance and action, being equal to carry twelve or thirteen stone as hackneys. Mealy brown, bluffy bay, chestnut, and grey are their predominant colours. Their price, of course, varies with the state of the provender market. Purchasers of ponies in October must calculate on keeping them idle through the winter, and on the cost and trouble of breaking them for the saddle or for harness. And seldom did Bampton Fair take place under more favourable auspices than on the 24th of last month, for the hay and out crops had suffered severely from the perpetual rains of the summer, and the root crops had mostly failed from the same cause.

An annual sale by auction takes place every year at Bampton of a herd of about fifty pure Exmoor ponies bred by Frederick Tyrrel, Esq., the present proprietor of Exmoor, and of about as many half-bred Exmoor colts, bred by Mr. Knight's agent, Mr. Robert Smith, formerly well known as a successful shorthorn and sheep breeder in Lincolnshire. The auction is held in a large yard on the left-hand side as you enter the town from Tiverton. Purchasers being duly arranged on benches around, the ponies and colts are admitted one by one from an adjoining paddock, into which they have been previously driven. It is, indeed, a pretty sight to see the wild little Exmoor, excited by the exertions which have been necessary to separate him from his comrades, toil headlong into the ring, and then stand detestified in the midst of the crowd, his ragged mane and tail almost trailing on the ground, and his deer-like eyes glancing brightly through the long, clotted tangles of his forelock.

From circumstances to which we have already adverted, Mr. Knight's ponies sold full 20 or 25 per cent lower this year than they had ever sold before: the larger ones fetching from twelve to twenty guineas each; the smaller ones—if possible more beautiful than the others—from "a pound a leg" up to ten guineas. They were all unbroken and unshod, and the buyers of single ponies must have had, in many instances, no small difficulty in prevailing on their new purchases to accompany them home.

As soon as the pure Exmoors were disposed of, Mr. Smith's half-bred lot were submitted to the hammer, and, as they were all broken and warranted sound, they found ready purchasers. They varied in height from 13 to 14½ hands, and in substance from the light, well-bred gallowsy, fit to carry a girl of fourteen or fifteen, to the stout colt, calculated to convey an alderman from place to place with safety and comfort. The wet summer had been sadly against their condition: to use the auctioneer's phrase, "none of them, I'm afraid, a dry back for months": nevertheless, they were such a clever and neat lot, that, roughly as they were, they sold well, averaging about £8 per head. Eight of them averaged upwards of forty guineas each, and the pick of the lot, being knocked down to the Earl of Portsmouth at fifty guineas.

We understand that in 1861 Messrs. Knight and Smith intend transferring their auction to Taunton, a much more accessible point for intending purchasers than Bampton: and, moreover, find their account in the transfer, but there their customers will miss the humours and beauties of Bampton Fair and the valley of the Exe, which we did not grudge having gone two hundred miles to see.

The "Druid," in an article on Exmoor in the October number of the New Sporting Magazine, thus speaks of the pony herdsmen:—"Will Court, the head herdsman, and his two subs, Bill Sanpland and Will Scott, form the whole pony department—and the latter has just been gazetted from the Scotch Hills, vice Jack Huxtable, promoted to be ground-keeper on Lackborough and Badgery. Will Court has been bred up among 'our ponies' from a boy, and treats 'the droop-rumped mongrels' on the adjacent hills with the most magnificent disdain. He is a perfect Fellini in his advocacy of 'the old sort' on the review-day, and unswerving in his fealty to Lillas as a lineal descendant of the anchor brand. The trio have two ponies apiece, besides occasional young ones in breaking; and Will's knowledge of families and endurance receives strong confirmation from the fact that his men—who, like himself, are no feather-weights—can ride a thirteen-hand pony incessantly through a ten-hour breaking-day."

While these lines are being written the Prince of Wales is expected, Possibly, his Royal Highness may arrive on his birthday. He brings with him the united and unanimous affection of the whole of the English, to his lovely mother and the citizens whom he visited, both the subjects of his mother and the citizens of the Republic to his having conducted himself throughout a long and exciting progress, marked by every variety of incident, in a manner becoming a Prince and a gentleman educated at the first Court in the world. Higher praise cannot be desired by or for him, and we withhold it were injustice, while to exceed It were sycophancy. Without indulging in utopian or sentimental dreams, and without believing that a little personal intercourse between a young Prince and a sovereign and the New World can of itself have any marked influence upon national counsels, we have no doubt that the pleasant memories of the visit of the Heir Apparent to the loyal colonists and the noble Republicans of the West will generate amity and that these feelings on both sides of the Atlantic, and that these will tend to diminish many of the acerbities out of which misunderstandings have not unfrequently arisen. Add that the Prince himself has had an advantage which has fallen to no other scion of a Royal House, and has had the opportunity of learning something of the character of the nations of the West, and it may be fairly said that, among the many wise things which Queen Victoria has done, not the least wise was the sending of her son to North America. The travels in a land not still important degree, the same educational process has been adopted with his gallant brother, and with valuable results. The nation, warmly approving the course taken by its Queen, as warmly congratulates her on the return of her eldest Prince, and will be ready with its sympathy when Bristol shall be restored to the happy circle at Windsor.

Another election has taken place, and again the Conservatives have obtained a victory. This time it is at Dartmouth, where Mr. Hardy has been seated by the infinitesimal majority of two. The death of the veteran Admiral Sir Thomas Ussher occasions a vacancy in one of the metropolitan constituencies, and it is rather to be wished than hoped that London electors (as they may fairly be called) will endeavour to make choice of a real celebrity rather than a local notoriety. While on this subject, a topics we cannot but do now Consul for the City has assumed office, and the usual interruption to business has unpleasantly reminded City men that the 9th of November is still a day for a now meaningless pageant. A Lord Mayor is no institution, and remember what Horne Tooke, Radical as he was, declared—viz., that the apprentice who did not think the Lord Mayor the greatest creature in the world would probably come to be hanged. So, rendering our homage to the new Chief Magistrate, let us wish for him a happy year of office. Possibly many may cannot help dwelling on the mournful lines of a poet of years that are gone, who finely exclaims at the close of a song in honour of My Lord—

> How can he have leisure for taking his pleasure
> In the world's broad way, who has to be a Mayor.

Again is an attempt to be made to solve the Road mystery. A very informal, and, as it appears to us, a very objectionable, kind of inquisition has been made by the coroner of the neighbourhood of Temple Mevis, and it has elicited nothing but nonsense and gossip. But an application is to be made to the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, who is the chief coroner of England, in order to have the first inquest taken out of his hands, and a new regular inquest be held. The convict in the Stepney case is ordered for execution, in spite of energetic employment by certain parties of means of agitation against the verdict—a system which seems to be most unfair to juries who investigate, under the solemn responsibilities attached to their duty, and which may also be regarded as a contempt of court, and in both points of view ought to be discouraged, except in the almost impossible instances of an unsatisfactory trial.

The death of the Empress Dowager of Russia is an event which, in ordinary circumstances, would be without interest for those who were led to believe, it may be with truth, that the beautiful and attached wife of the Emperor Nicholas I. was one of the few who most deeply deplored his entering into that terrible conflict which ended in military prestige of Russia, and in the sorrow of her own haughty heart.

Minor incidents of the week, unless we include the delivery of various orations by distinguished persons, do not furnish much matter for record. The Irish brigade has settled home, and into obscurity, and it is certain will be found very effective allies of anti-Papal missionaries as soon as the new clothes with which they have been bribed to silence shall have assumed the normal form of peasant costume in Ireland. Mr. Best, the celebrated organist of Liverpool, a gentleman whose position as an artist should have secured him from insult, has had a sort of "difficulty" with some of the Liverpool magistracy, in consequence of his very properly refusing to "play in" the song and the waltzer at a recent ball given at St. George's Hall, and it is to be hoped one opinion as to the vulgarity of idea that suggested such an occupation for such a person. A brutality, called a fight for the championship, has been permitted, and a half-accidental blow suddenly gave such "grinning honours" as the victory could afford to a fighter tenderly named "The Infant;" and we have only to add that an extremely foolish notion of a volunteer excursion to France, emanating, we presume, from some commercial mind, has been very properly ridiculed and repudiated by the press, and it will be similarly met by the sensible majority of our household guard.

THE TREATY AND THE TARIFF.
THEIR PROVISIONS AND PROBABLE RESULTS.
(From our Special Correspondent.)

II.—BIRMINGHAM AND ITS MANUFACTURES.

In the plainest language, and within the narrowest possible compass, it is our wish to place before our readers a view of the p resent state of British exports to France, and the advantages that are likely to be reaped by our native manufacturers from the change of duty which the Anglo-French treaty and the amended tariff consequent there on. While the enumeration of facts will form the chief part of our task, it should be understood that we start with the belief that the Anglo-French treaty will be advantageous to the trade of this country. But, in attempting to dispel the false notions spread by those who are jealous of the success of the treaty, and who in their blind zeal for the lobbing of its being concluded was not imparted to them, it is equally our duty to warn the public that the benefits which may be derived from our convention will not be realised in a moment, nor perhaps in a year, and that the experience increases the duty. It may be remembered that the promised "big loaf" at a low price did not make its appearance immediately after the repeal of the corn laws, and that there are not till many years after that Sir James Graham was enabled to declare to the House of Commons, and without fear of denial, that the people really a njoyed cheap bread, and that they "knew the reason why." In the case before us, we must have patience in the probation and its period of transition. It cannot enrich our coffers in an hour any more than Rome could be built in a day. It must be tried. It is not a panacea for all ills. It is not infallible. It must be altered. It is not a measure of finality. It is eminently a measure of progress. For good or for evil it merits a trial. It is not so necessary to discourage suspicion as to point to advantages that may range from a mere independent as to t is effects. Let us wait and see of what the treaty is capable, and what the enterprise of English merchants and manufacturers can do to develop its capacity. Let us wait and see how far the English goods imported into France were infinitesimal it would be still better tha an no reduction at all. If the duty were fifty per cent it would still be better than an entire prohibition.

The principal articles affected by the instalment of the tariff already published are those of a metallic nature. The schedule of duties is divided into three parts, applying to the articles specified as needed duties begins at one per cent, and goes upwards by gradations of five per cent. The first class is that which relates to machinery, to rails an d rods, to plates, to tools, and to general hardware and ironmo ngery in cast and in wrought iron. We have chosen these articles as the starting-point of our remarks, not only because it is popularly associated with the hardware trade, but because it is in itself the seat of many and important hardware manufactures; because it is the medium of exchange between the producing and for the working up of iron, and because the metal manufacturers and dealers in Birmingham have mostly their agencies and exper t stores in Paris. It will be seen that the duties upon iron ingots, pig copper, zinc, brass, lead tin, and their compounds, are not the only ite'ms mentioned in the tariff. New duties are imposed on such things as leather, skins, gold leaf, carriages, woollen cloths, and silks, but it is to those first, only, we have at present nothing to do. It will be sufficient at ! this stage of our researches to take the metal trade of Birmingham, and to see whether the manufacturers of that town are likely to be benefited by the new duties, or are likely to lose by that increased consumption of their goods in France which we are rationally led to expect from a modification of the French fiscal system.

The metal trade of the town of Birmingham is lost in the mazes of antiquity; but time out of mind it has been renowned for its fabrics in iron and steel, and for its manufactures of "toys." In the days when there were "manie smithes that use to make knives and all manner of cutting tooles, and many finders that make bodkins, pinnes, and such like trifles," the town's trades flourish at the present day. The many "smithes" have not lost its ability to make knives, but for "knives" made are matchets or cutlasses ; for "finders" are "bodkins" and "pinnes" the "manufacturers sadlers' ironmongery, and thousands of miles of "nail rods" are converted into nails and tacks. In short, every article manufactured in Birmingham is known for the Parliamentary army. After the Restoration the "toy trade" in buttons, broaches, and buckles made its appearance, and it is to this day famous. It is said, about the time of William III. In 1813 the Gumbarrel Proof House was established, and from that time the gunmaking trade of Birmingham has attained to full work could turn out a musket a minute.

The principal manufactures of Birmingham are now gold and silver electro-plating, and the wares so plated by the mercurial process ; split rings (9,000 ounces of silver are used in a week), 40,000 ounces of silver pass annually through the Assay Office; and many more thousand ounces are used in articles not subject to duty) ; chandeliers, candlesticks, candelabra, &c. ; tables, tripods, lamps, &c., in brass, bronze, and ormolu; cabinet furniture, bedsteads, fenders, fire-irons, fenders, and button-making; hooks and eyes; gas pillars, fittings, candelabra, &c.; rolled gold and silver wire (produced at the Crown Wire Mills, in the Newtown Bridge, 20,000,000 nails, varying from 3-10ths of an inch to 8 inches in length, are made weekly); screws, tacks, glass, &c. (1,000,000 of the latter article an uncommon one) ; screws, tacks, glass, and crystal, in every variety of size and form, from a wineglass to a crystal fountain; guns, revolvers, pistols, and swords (one establishment can turn out 5000 of the latter every week) ; papier-mache, japan work, and tin trays ; bedsteads, and every article in which the misapprehension must be removed. Birmingham has often been called the "toyshop of Europe ;" but the latter is behind the former in the matter of toys. Birmingham may have a factory for the production of dolls' eyes ; but it has nothing to do with Noah's ark. Birmingham manufactures many articles called "toys" Trade is divided into two branches, "the heavy" and the "light" or "fancy." Among the former are steam engines, and the "fancy" may be denoted in two such as sugar-nippers, hammers, pincers, shoemakers', carpenters', and others' implements. Birmingham is also famous for its "pens," and the "steel pen" is the latest of the latter every week) ; paper-mache, japan work, and tin trays ; bedsteads, and every article in which iron enters. The

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES SHOOTING ON THE PRAIRIES OF THE FAR WEST

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, in his progress through the United States, arrived on the 23rd of September at Dwight, a small village on the Prairies, and a place of considerable resort for English sportsmen. Here the Prince remained until the 27th, the Royal party going in pursuit of quails, in which they were very successful, on each day except Sunday. On this day, of course, nothing was done; and, after attending divine service in the little Presbyterian church, the party remained quiet and alone in their little country farmhouse in the midst of the Great Prairie. His Royal Highness was most fortunate in his visit, for, for the time of year, he had almost unprecedented sport; besides which he saw a prairie thunderstorm, a prairie fire of immense extent, and, above all, a prairie sunset. The latter took place in all its super-natural glory while the party were shooting quails the night before their departure.

Dwight is a village containing a population of about 600 persons, and stands a little oasis in a boundless expanse of prairie. Everything here was novel and attractive to the Royal party. The sport on the prairies was new, and at the same time abundant; the boundless expanse of grass-covered land being the same time abundant; the boundless expanse of grass-covered land being alone a sight worth travelling to see; and, above all, the party were secure from prying and intrusion, and enjoyed themselves as best suited their humour, free from observation of any kind.

Here is a description, by the Times correspondent, of the Prairie:—"Leave Dwight behind you, and walk out to the east till all sight and sound of the little village is lost in the distance, and then look around you. There is a huge, undulating ocean of long rich grass and flowers, which the warm soft wind keeps in a gentle ripple. There is not a sound but the shrill chirping of millions of crickets, not a shrub or bush to break the dead level of the distant horizon—nothing to vary the widespread sea of verdure but its own masses of bright wild flowers, over which gorgeous butterflies keep always skimming on noiseless wings. This is the prairie. About a mile or so ahead is a slight but very perceptible rise in the ground, and you push on for this to get a good look about you. There is, of course, no track, and your way lies through the prairie grass, now little more than breast high, but in the spring almost over your head; you stride through clumps of resin and compass weeds, through patches of blue, yellow, and purple flowers, through thyme and long rich grass. At last you gain the summit of the gentle rise, and can look around you for miles on miles in all directions, yet you are almost disappointed to find that you have gained nothing by your walk—that the same tremendous extent of meadow land, clothed with a rank luxuriance of grass and flowers, stretches away on every side till deep green fades into brown in the distance, and a line of blackish-blue on the ocean, far, far out, marks where the horizon meets the sky. The prairie on which I write this is known as the Grand Prairie, from the extraordinary fertility of its land—for its length is only sixty miles by thirty. But in a south-easterly direction from this spot one may journey for nearly 300 miles and never once quit their long, shallow ridges—never see anything but the eternal expanse of deep green grass, perfumed with the gum droppings of the resin wood. The southern prairies are broken here and there by watercourses, by clumps of cotton-wood, and groves of locust-trees. Occasionally, though at rare intervals, a little line of locust-trees, looking like rocks in the great ocean of grass—oceans in the vast prairie lands of Illinois—mark where pools of water may be found. These varieties, however, are but few; and after a journey in the green wilder-ness a tree almost startles you, as something out of place in the huge soft green meadow-sea, where the long coarse silky-looking grass bears nothing stronger than a resin weed among it, and where a breath of wind ripples its surface into breakers of verdure, which even in the calmest days gives such an aspect of life and animation to these silent and deserted lands."

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Prince of Leiningen, Commander of the Royal yacht, has received his promotion as Captain.

Major-General Barlow has been awarded £100 per annum for his valuable and meritorious services.

The command of the Colchester Camp has been transferred on Major-General Wood (who has received another appointment) to Colonel the Hon. A. Gordon.

A large body of workmen have commenced the new fortifications between Seaton Carew and the village in the Isle of Wight. The cost of these fortifications is estimated at £160,000.

The Victoria Cross is about to be issued to those men of the Light Dragoons, both effective and non-effective, whose services in the Crimea entitle them to receive it. The number the Lord Lieutenant is able to confer is twenty.

Last Saturday Mr. S. Whitbread, M.P., one of the Lords of the Admiralty, accompanied by Rear-Admiral Sir Baldwin W. Walker, K.C.B., Surveyor of the Navy, arrived at Chatham Dockyard, on an official visit to that establishment.

Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel Henry Wylie Norman, C.B., Bengal Staff Corps, has been appointed Secretary of the Army Sanitary Commission, vice Colonel Tulloch, who has been appointed Assistant Military Secretary to his Royal Highness the General Commanding-in-Chief.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, as General Commanding-in-Chief, has been pleased to direct that the following rules for the rank next above the Staff appointments, must pass the examination for the rank next above that which they hold.

The Queen has, at the War Department have just received and accepted tenders for the immediate erection of a temporary hospital, and situated at the intersection of Pall Mall, Cockspur-street, and Charing-cross, on the site of a block of buildings, next Gravesend. The contract also includes the erection of a block of kitchen, store-rooms, and other necessary offices.

A salute from the Park and Tower guns on Monday announced to the inhabitants of the metropolis the capture by the victorious allied naval and military forces over the Chinese on the Peiho. The Royal standard was hoisted on the Victoria Tower, and the Union Jack on the Admiralty and on the various Government establishments.

A few months ago Corporal Connolly, of the 26th Regiment (Cameronians), was on his death-bed, by a grave incline, during site exercise, at the Curragh Camp, Ireland. A subscription was immediately entered into among his comrades, and a monument, of Sherwarth-upon-Tees, where the deceased was interred, the tablet having been unanimously voted by his brother officers" in token of their regret and esteem.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

The prizes shot for by the Harrow Rifles, or 18th Middlesex, were distributed on Monday evening in the Vaughan Library.

The Queen's Own Kent Rifles has been dismissed from that corps for insubordination by sentence of a general court-martial.

Lieutenant Hall has been appointed Adjutant to the 19th Surrey, or Lambeth, Rifles.

The inspection of the 1st Cambridgeshire or Cambridge Town Rifles by the Lord Lieutenant, Colonel Hall of Hardwicke-house, took place on Saturday last, Tuesday.

The competition of the 30th Middlesex corps by Colonel Ibbetson, the Assistant Government Inspector appointed for the purpose, took place at Ealing on Wednesday last.

The members of the 13th Surrey corps, numbering nearly 700, assembled at Kennington on Wednesday evening, under Colonel W. Bovill, Esq., Q.C., M.P.

The 2nd Regiment of Lanarkshire Rifle Volunteers were inspected on Saturday last, by George-square, Glasgow, by Major-General Sir Thomas Wilkie, K.C.B., Inspecting Field Officer for the Western District, Colonel of the Regiment.

Last Saturday the 19th Middlesex was also inspected by Colonel Ibbetson, the Assistant Government Inspector, and volunteers consisted of the Marylebone, St. John's Wood, Hampstead, Islington, Kilburn, and the Working Men's College, Price's Shareholders', and Mr. Thomas Hughes, companies, under the immediate command of Major Thomas Hughes.

Last Saturday afternoon some interesting experiments were made at Shoeburyness with a shell-proof target constructed for us the two previous days using a shallow excavation for the purpose. The target was one of the 12-inch targets presented to the best shots among the Volunteers, and a match at Landguard Fort, Harwich, by Mr. Pretty.

The Lord Lieutenant of Renfrewshire, Sir John Wallah, M.P., reviewed the Renfrewshire Rifle Volunteers at Paisley on Saturday last. The number of men on the ground was about 1,200—at Prestopans yesterday week in the presence of a large body of spectators.

The Duke of Buccleuch has graciously consented to become Colonel of the Selkirkshire Volunteers.

On Monday last Tuesday a spirited competition took place on Monkwell Heath, near Norwich, between the crack shots of the Norwich battalion—the Norfolk Rifles—for a prize presented by Mr. Colman, M.P., and known as the Charles Morse, and the local Choral Society. The ties having been shot off, Private Pratt was declared the victor (Cowling Richard Corporal, 2nd; Private Fake the second (Wesley Richards rifle); Private Filby, the third (Wesley rifle); and Private Bird the fourth (Wesley Richards rifle) each 14).

The shooting for prizes by the Leicestershire Volunteers took place on Monday last, at the Belvoir Castle Rifle Butts, when a handsome silver cup, value £20, presented by the Duke of Rutland, three rounds at 200 yards, was won by Private Bird, of the 1st Volunteer Corps. The £10 silver cup, presented by the Duke of Rutland, for the best shot among the officers, was presented by the members for the borough, was also won by Private Bird, with a score of 24 points, Lieutenant Lowndes, 23.

by Captain Bankart.

The Earl of Leicester, Lord Lieutenant of the West Riding, was yesterday (Tuesday) entertained at a sumptuous banquet in the Leeds Town-hall, by the officers of the eight artillery and rifle corps under his Lordship's jurisdiction. This demonstration was tendered as a compliment to the noble Earl on the occasion of his first inspection of the corps over which he holds Earl in his official capacity. The chair was occupied by Lieut.-Colonel Gaunt, of the 1st West York Artillery Volunteers, the corps to which Lord Leicester is attached.

On Wednesday week the fifty-second of the 19th Surrey Rifles, under the command of Captain Watkins, met at the Streatham-butts for ball-practice. A number of prizes were shot for last week on the practising-ground in the valley round which the Brighton volunteers have formed their butts. The first was gained by Sergeant J. Tassemidge, the second by Private Wilson, the third by Private Lever, the fourth by Sergeant Hawkins,

LITERATURE AND ART.

Now, how can high art come out of Bray's traction-engine. What can Renaissance sculpture in its noblest and most picturesque forms have to do with a broad-wheeled waggon, or rather truck, dragged along Piccadilly by one of the most unsightly, panting, groaning, lumbering locomotives that ever afflicted human eyes. Thus much, it was duly our privilege to be regaled in our vehicular progress to the city—we will not say whether we were in a brougham, a Hansom, or modestly perched upon the knifeboard of an omnibus—by a monstrous chariot which we at once imagined to be the phantom of the late Duke of Wellington's funeral car. Then we thought of the approaching 5th of November, and hazarded an opinion that the largest Guy Fawkes we had ever beheld through the mists of fog was Mr. Wyatt's equestrian prodigy had come down—horse, cocked hat, and all—from the summit of Mr. Decimus Burton's arch and was taking a stroll, à la Commendatore, as far as the new Law Courts in Carey-street. Time, however, and closer inspection soon convinced us of our mistake. We found that we were following Baron Marochetti's magnificent statue of Richard Coeur de Lion, which, with the assistance of the steam dragon imprisoned in the boiler of a traction-engine, was slowly journeying from Belgravia to St. Stephen's. Richard of the Lion Heart, proudly in his easy seat, waving his good sword in all the dignity of gun-metal, is now definitively settled in Palace-yard. He does not match very well with the globular lamps at the Peers' entrance or the shabby appearance and uncleanness of the law courts; but he looks, nevertheless, very grand and very chivalrous. The gifted Marochetti has himself superintended the casting as well as the modelling of the statue, and the result is a massive, bold, and vigorous work, exaggerated in no one point, and perfect. We had begun to bewail the fact that this talented sculptor was a foreigner, till we remembered that Bailey, Gibson, and Lough were Englishmen.

Fired doubtless with emulation at the mediæval precedent just set up in Palace-yard, we see that the gentlemen on whom it devolves to prepare the decorations of the Lord Mayor's Show for the 9th this year revived the Man in Brass, with his knightly satellites in steel, copper, and gorgeous mediæval accoutrements. We are glad to see that the Man in Brass taken de jure—that is, in Sir Samuel Meyrick's work on ancient armour, and in the memory of at least the Tower of London—is not to be objected to, and his brother Paladins, from Barclay and Perkins's, if may be, clattering along the Poultry in all their panoply of pots and pans. The Man in Brass is a characteristic relic of the past, and we resuscitate him.

The Anglo-Indian community has sustained a severe loss in the death of Dr. Buist, for many years editor of the principal journal of Bombay, and, moreover, a profound practical and scientific authority in natural history. Throughout the Bombay Presidency, and, indeed, throughout India generally, Dr. Buist was known and respected. He was, nevertheless, at one time the object of the most virulent censure on the part of Sir Charles Napier—not the gallant old Admiral just deceased, but the hot-headed, pugnacious Sir Charles Napier, the soldier and warrior who wrote the shortest despatch (after veni, vidi, vici) on record. It ran as the communication of "Peccavi" to the Admiralty. (Scinde). And he had it, too; and, moreover, many a bone to pick with Dr. Buist. Sir William Napier, the historian of his brother, knew the latter chose occasion to call the doctor some highly uncomplimentary names. No hatreds are so bitter as those engendered by the squabbles of British officers with the press in India. Dr. Buist died.

At Birmingham, this present week, we strolled in to see the Exhibition of Works of Ancient and Modern Art, which the Birmingham painters come out very satisfactorily; and among them we are glad to give a kindly word to Messrs. H. and J. Foster (Messrs. H. B. Hardy), and Allen Everitt. The architectural studies of the last-named gentleman are capital. The exhibition, is not, however, entirely local, for some of the princes of the trade in London are also contributors. There is the elaborate "Christmas in the Olden Time," by Daniel Pope, which we described in favourable terms at the Academicion. A thoroughly art-loving place is Birmingham, and walked over sturdy corn-fed Saxons, coming from the palatial "Lessii to the comfortable Hen and Chickens Hotel, behind two mustachioed individuals of "Knights," but we suppressed our conversation we could not help hearing. What do you think they were talking about? Why, Rose Bonbonyer's Ball, the fancy dress ball of which they had been apparently just inspecting. "O'Icke t' shap-dash manner eh," quoth the host, "though the Ball's to be a fine affair." He stopped, and we entered the Hen and Chickens, and saw them no more. Who shall say that Art is not appreciated in the English provinces?

We were a very small boy indeed when the names of Alfred Crowquill, as a graphic and humorous delineator of the manners of our grandfathers, was already deservedly popular. Who does not remember the "Nose out of Joint," and the inimitable pen-and-ink sketches of Mr. Cruikshank, published, we are afraid to remember how many years ago, at the Royal Academy? The public, to their sorrow, have not seen much of Alfred Crowquill lately, but we are glad to find that he has produced a new book written and illustrated by himself, in his own whimsical style, called "The Queenso Simple," being the quaint and not unpainful adventures of a certain wise Rindeo and certain of his disciples. The book is one of a healthy feeling, but occasionally of too free-and-easy Oriental lore, necessitating even the addition of an index and a glossary; and, moreover, there is a vein of quaint philosophy running through it very pleasing to the person.

The reception of the famous monastic orator, the Père Lacordaire, is fixed for the 18th of January. Parisians are curious to see and to know what kind of eulogium he will bestow, according to custom, on his predecessor, and whether he will compliment the Emperor in his own personal address. For other literary intelligence from Paris, let us add that the disastrous advocate, Jacques Arago, author of numerous and definitely eloquent protest against the menaced Governmental interference with the privileges of free speech enjoyed by the French Bar. Then, again, M. Louis Veuillot is publishing a pro-papal book about Paris and its theatres, which everybody is abusing; and a certain lively individual called Scudo is writing a biography, he Sérpolte de Sexy—as he set up a shop for the sale of bonbons. A month in the Academy is a barrier vainly presented to the onslaughts of novelty of his order, the ex-director of the Constitutionnel contenting a guide-book, and a fashionable journalist selling sevestrel—what more could he wanting to cry the climax of the glory of the French capital.

FINE ARTS.

THE PRISON WINDOW. Painted by J. PHILLIP, A.R.A.; Engraved by T. OLDHAM BARLOW. M'Clean.

Mr. Phillip in his career affords a remarkable and gratifying example of the influence of change of scene upon an artist's style. In his earlier work he exhibited a hard conventionality of manner suggested by the scenery and characteristics of his native Highlands. Beginning to feel the want of more varied material, however, he soon after his visit went to Spain, and the change became as completely inwrought with the tone of southern life and the glowing hues of southern skies as he had previously been with the stern and severe aspects of the north. The result has been a succession of pictures of dramatic subjects and studies of character full of life and truthfulness, and entitling him to rank among the artists of Europe, combined with a treatment of colour more fresh and glowing than that which his brethren generally display. The engraving before us is one of which casts fail to exercise a useful influence over the rising artists of the day.

Among the most striking and touching subjects of Spanish life produced by Mr. Phillip is that of "The Prison Window," an admirable example of which is the present picture. The scene is laid in the outside of the Prison of Seville, where a dark-skinned, half-Moorish race of people congregate, and where conspiracies against the other offence against the laws, but who yet has a warm and tender heart for his darling child, and his fond, unhappy wife. The latter holds the unconscious infant towards the window, doomed to become an orphan—up to the grated window, where the father eagerly expresses it during the hour of visitation permitted to prisoners, to steal her own tears from her husband, whilst she silently presses his bravery hand with much of the fondness of her child. On the ground by her side is the basket in which she has brought a store of bread and fruit for the prisoner. In the background is an old woman endeavouring to persuade the sentinel to allow her, also, an interview with some loved relation consigned to that grim dungeon. A cross, with an inscription appended to it, is erected on the spot where the murder or assassination which has been perpetrated within the very gutless of the prison—generally, indeed, in very close proximity to it—is never now incarcerated. This touching episode has been treated with a vigorous and feeling hand by the painter, and his story has been admirably translated to the engraving.

BARKER'S PICTURE OF THE RELIEF OF LUCKNOW.

This interesting picture has been removed from its old quarters at the Egyptian Hall to the Panorama, Leicester-square, where it has daily attracts a numerous succession of visitors. Since we formerly saw it considerable improvements and some additions have been made to the picture, which is especially valuable as an historical record. The portrait of Lord Clyde has now been repainted from actual sittings of the gallant General, who have those of Sir J. Inglis, Brigadier Russell, and others; whilst portraits of Colonel Allison, Captain Aligood, and Captain Moorsom have been added.

MR. HENRY COOK, whose interesting water-colour drawings of scenes in the Italian War were exhibited in London, has recently been honoured with an interview with the Emperor of the French, by whom he was graciously received, and highly complimented on the drawings, some of which he had himself commissioned, was pleased to invite Mr. Cook to breakfast with him at St. Cloud.

MUSIC.

Still "nothing fresh" at either of the great opera houses. But Edward Loder's "Night Dancers" is to be revived at Covent Garden this evening; and Balfe's new opera (name as yet unannounced) is completed, and will be produced.

The weekly winter concerts at the Crystal Palace have commenced for the season. The first took place on Saturday last. There was a full audience, and the performance, on the whole, was very successful. The principal instrumental pieces were Beethoven's symphony in C minor, and Mendelssohn's overture to the music to Mr. W. G. Cusins; Macfarren's overture to "Robin Hood," and the overture to Auber's opera, "Le Domino Noir," conducted by the able direction of Herr Manns, showed its admirable qualities; and Mr. Cusins was warmly and deservedly applauded. The latter gentleman made a very favourable impression by his chaste and pleasing execution of Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor. Mr. Cusins is a clever leading star: and by his performance, with Mdme. Hayes, of the duet for two pianos, by Thalberg, on "Norma," he observed with satisfaction that the common fault of longueurs will be avoided. On Saturday the performance began at three o'clock and terminated at four. We hope that this rational course will be adhered to.

We learn from the Italian journals that Mdme. Borghi-Mamo, the favourite of the public at Her Majesty's Theatre last season, had had an enthusiastic reception at Bologna, where she appeared last week in "La Traviata." Mdme. Borghi-Mamo is, we believe, considered her as the last and finest type of the old Italian school. It is satisfactory to know that this most accomplished artist is re-engaged for London next season.

THE THEATRES.

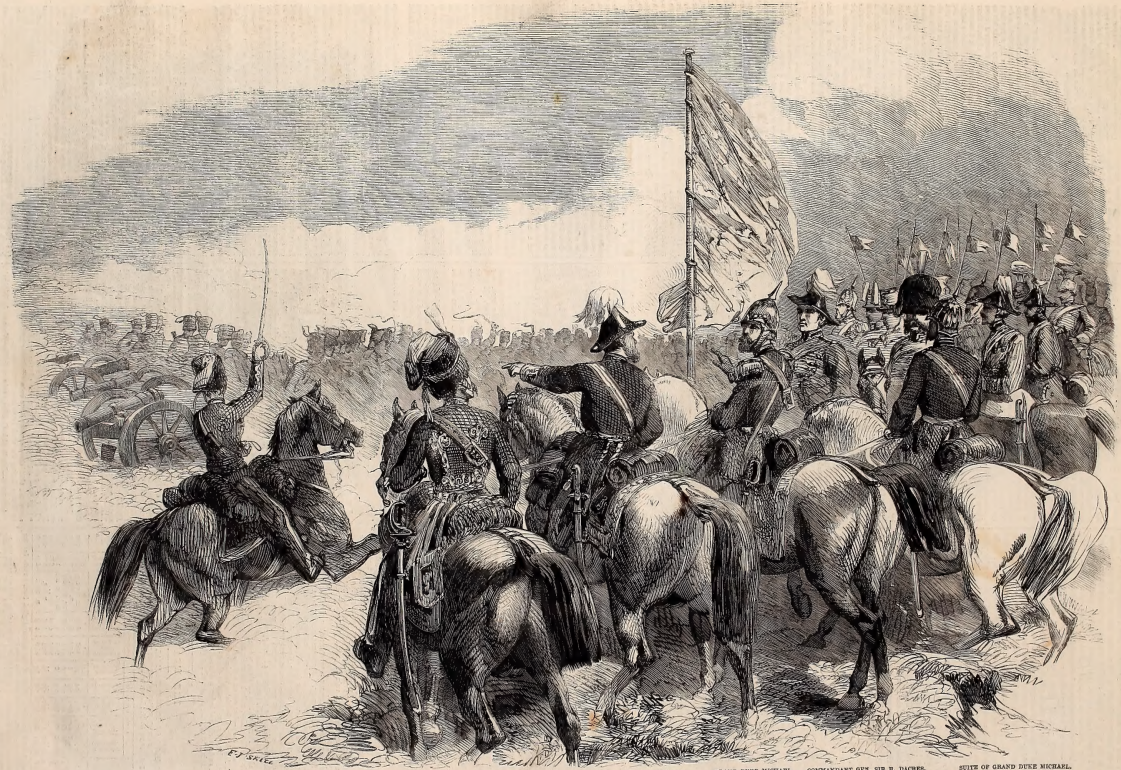
LYCEUM.—Mr. Stirling Coyne has contrived a pleasant little comedietta, entitled "Woodcocks and Sportsmen," in which Mr. Toole, which on Monday evening was placed with success on the stage. He personates Mr. Tom Tiddler, a gentleman of the old school. The heroine, Aherbine, Countess de Hainville (Miss M. Terman), adopts the plot to honour the speculations of her lover; and her servant, Fandette (Miss Lydia Foote), a pert, lively part, is made to support the principal role in the supernatural drama, which goes off in the freakest manner imaginable. The piece is published by Mr. Lacy, and is called attendant on the Counter. The assumption of the Comtesse gives occasion for much comic business, and the part is played in well conducted between the half-lunatic hero, Leon Darville (Mr. Henry Neville), and Miss Marston. The Comtesse herself speaks as the Heartless, and her maid as Zephyr, who claims the extensive privilege of kissing all the flowers of the garden. There is also an amusing footman, Mr. Toole, who is called Jeremy Diddler, and supported by Mr. J. Morris, which, though a slight part, is very distinctively sketched. The piece is put on the stage in a very creditable manner, and the music, by Mr. George Loder, is very catching. One song, especially, seems to flower with the "Last Rose of Summer." Previous to this delightful little piece, the melodrama of "The Wept of the Wish-ton-Wish" was performed, in which Miss Cleveland supported the character of Narcissa—a part with even more than her usual power. Mr. Addison played Conanchet with considerable skill, and evoked the tear of sympathy on many a fair cheek. Mr. Lyon, too, as Major Gough, was powerfully patriotic as Uncle Sam, and Mr. Addison, as Ensign Slender, was a never-failing fund of humour. The entertainments concluded with Mr. Planché's comic drama, of "Grist to the Mill," in which Miss Dolby was a great favourite, and met with effect. A new drama is underlined for Monday next. Mdme. Celeste is evidently the catching of her managerial energy, and will doubtless command the success she so much merits.

BIJOU THEATRE.—M. Talexy, improving on the encouragement bestowed on him by the British public at the St. James's, opened on Monday this little theatre, formerly the concert-room of the Haymarket Opera House. Among the pieces performed have been "Le Gendre de M. Poirier," "Le Mari de la Veuve," "Valérie," and "L'Histoire d'Un Sou." The name of the conductor is sufficient assurance that these dramas have been efficiently performed; and the audiences during the week have been encouraging.

SURREY.—Mr. Wilkie Collins's tale of "The Woman in White" has been dramatised by Mr. J. R. Ware, and placed on these boards with all the effect that good scenery, appropriate costumes, and excellent acting could ensure. The story of this "celebrated serial," as it is denominated on the bills, need not be repeated. The purpose of the drama is to develop the character of Count Fosco, who is very skilfully impersonated by Mr. Creswick. The part of Walter Hartright found also excellent embodiment in the acting of Mr. Farnham, which was exceedingly vigorous and effective. This gentleman afterwards appeared in the character of Count Fosco in the "Orlando," and was really great in the more powerful passages.

THE FARM.

The Royal Agricultural Society held their monthly council on Wednesday, and discussed a variety of topics. First and foremost, it was decided to extend the Leeds meeting to five days. On Monday and Tuesday the show will be for horses, for cattle, and for the implement yards combined; on Wednesday 2s. 6d., and on Thursday and Friday 1s. 6d. Those gentlemen, who are making the journey in the most spirited style, were very anxious to have a sixpenny day on Saturday; but the council felt that it would not be right, either to put exhibitors to the expense of keeping their cattle in the town all Monday or to tempt them to travel all Sunday. The special price-list is very liberal, amounting to £1,500 or thereabouts. It was proposed to give fat-stock premiums, but the society did not wish to introduce any fresh class of prizes. Flax and roots have all special premiums; and, besides giving prizes for model cottages, it is said that Leeds intends to build one as well in order to illustrate the plans approved of at the recent meeting of the Yorkshire Agricultural Society. The question as to what members are to be admitted free will be submitted to a select committee. The proposition was, of course, very popular, as there is such a danger of transfer. Hence, in all probability, it is the proposition which will be rejected, as it usually is hardly worth having. It has been settled to publish the Journal in August instead of July, as formerly; the management of the Steam and Implement Stewards will appear in it instead of being thrown over to the Implement Makers' Association, as the award-sheet is published in the July number; but, except as a mere invoice of prize-animal owners, it is utterly useless for reference, as the editor studiously omits the pedigrees of all the animals that do not win prizes. When this point is given with such care in the catalogue, on what possible grounds can it be left out of the Journal? We take it only a few pages of type and paper?



A very fine crop of malt-time is being fast brought to a close, and, judging from letters we have received from four counties very widely apart, it will be finished quite as soon as the harvest. A saddle Yorkshire Man tells us that he has got in the barley-crop earlier than usual this year, and those who took time quite by the forelock, or lingered till the middle of October, are those who have got the worst crops in anything like condition. In fact, without very extensive mixing with foreign, it appears to us that there will be a great deficiency in the malt barley is turning up a great deal better than was expected. The Uproar nine and wood ventilating tubes have done a great deal in conversion of the damp and heating grain both in the stack and in bulk; but we doubt whether in the latter case, especially in the case of loose corn, the plan of Mr. Scott, a recent west season, which kept the hand in a state of pasts for months, will be found to be the harmless evaporator it should, and it has been all they can do to make mould on some soils. The turnips have had a good autumn growth, and the roots and corn crops in malting soils are very fair; but still they will be far from a heavy crop, and you hear from every farmer that "it will not be a mangel year." The wheat-sowing is progressing, and the prospect of a small supply of winter food is producing a great fall in store stock, and takes the shine off the pretty eight shillings fat than the time last year. The housewives have also had their poultry troubles. Fowls have been very unfortunate in the cold season, and the hens have got so "coldcd through" by the damp weather during the moulting that the egg production for months past has been most limited. We have had a letter from a Lincolnshire lady-reader who declared that his 125 hens just managed to give a egg between them. The introduction of the Dorking and similar breeds, which rendered it impossible for them to get rid of vermin by rolling.

Mr. Rundell, the well-known Dorking breeder, died in the age of seventy-four. The event was fearfully sudden, and took place as he was hurrying in his carriage from the funeral of a relative to his home at Rundell's Farm, near Dorking, on the road to Guildford. He was for first won his fame as a breeder of Lincoln. He line judgment—combined with the success of his flock—induced the district round Farnley (of sheep-fair renown) to bring his Lincolns to a very great size—made the Lincoln Agricultural Society's show at Lincoln a fine one. Prizes were removed to his Stickney farm he discontinued the lettings and took his rams to Peterborough fair, where they generally made a fine show. Mr. Rundell was also shorthorn breeder he went more for size than fashion, and reared less for them in comparison with his long-woolsk. He was a liberal subscriber to agricultural societies, and was before the public by Professor Voelker. He recommends that they should be packed lightly and in small bulk, if possible, in a cool room, so that they are apt to rot in clay. The layers of leaves should be salted at six inch intervals, and the whole pile will be ready for use in a month, as an intermixture of chaff, and the whole pressed down tight with heavy stones. We are not aware whether Mr. Rundell has ever observed the effect of leaves on the soil, but we have ourselves known the fallen to carry out his idea of preserving them from rot.

The Newmarket Farmers' Ordinary Club wound up a long season of sporting with a spread at which Messrs Buckinghamshire waggons, and the very best of accountants which they have to carry. Among other bent on ale we hear that Lord of the Manor, Mr. Hall, Mr. Dudley by Branches Park for two months, and that a 56-guinea advance on the 2 gs. she should have been refused her Prince Talleyrand's dam Le Vallière, who now forms part of that herd. Mr. Booth's Queen of the Vale, by Mr. Booth's Duke of Oxford—Mr. Barnes has lost his capital white bull—and Young Leonidas, by Dr. M'Hale, from Rege; and the Royal Park Agricultural Society's show at Windsor, at which already they have twins from Riel Cherry, one of the Warwick prize cows; and Doubtful has two calves—a bull and a heifer, all of them rich roans and of their sire's massive stamp.

ANECDOTE OF THE LATE MR. HERBERT INGRAM, M.P.—The Cobourg correspondent of the Advertiser Gazette says:—"I heard, the other day, that Mr. Ingram, the lamented late proprietor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, was in the habit of giving £50 annually to the Cobourg Hospital, the object had a township which he proposed buying for his son—Sir Francis Head, I believe, was the township—but was deterred by the Hon. Mr. Cameron, 'What!' he exclaimed, 'a township for a boy! Why, he would be ruined before he was twenty-one! He could be banished me, for he is England is getting very scarce, and would be sure to be carried off by consumption!' Mr. Ingram was always the way in which mines or riches exist among us, of whose value we have no adequate idea. Had we not already discovered the Bessemer steel, tetton wool, white (or milky-tree) wood, ersby birch, and other kinds of timber, which, for all purposes, are now imported by millions, for farm articles of considerable consumption and export."

THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY OF CANADA.—A meeting of shareholders was held on Wednesday at the Cheshum Room, Liverpool, in order to hear a statement from Mr. H. G. Chapman, who had just returned from Canada, of certain changes which have occurred to the London Board against Mr. Blackwell, the general manager in Canada, and the policy of the company generally. A resolution was adopted:—That a committee of seven members be appointed to make a searching investigation into the present state of the company, to co-operate with the London and other committees, and to suggest and report means of reorganising the entire management of the company in Canada; and, pending their action and report, this meeting deprecates any premature legal proceedings on the part of any section of either shareholders or bondholders." The following gentlemen were appointed on the committee:—Messrs. R. Fraser, G. H. Corporandé, S. S. Arnold, Robert Dalgleish, jun., and T. R. Moss.

OFFICER IN COMMAND OF R. H. A. FIELD OFFICER, HORSE BRIGADE. DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE. GRAND DUKE MICHAEL. COMMANDANT GEN. SIR R. DACRES. SUITE OF GRAND DUKE MICHAEL.

SENOR SALAMANCA.

THE career of this capitalist, one of the most eminent of railway-contractors, strikingly exemplifies the fact that Commerce is becoming a vast commonwealth, knowing less and less distinction of country throughout the world. Not more than a quarter of a century back Salamanca was a student in the University of Granada, rather distinguished, he says himself, for bearing on his back the oldest and most worn of cassocks. As a somewhat later date he became a member of the Spanish press, in connection with the Aclamador Malaguena. From the press he was translated to the Cabinet of Queen Christina as Finance Minister, and the capacity which he brought to monetary affairs is thought by some to have imparted the first impulse to the astonishing resuscitation of Spain. In the present day, if there be any comprehensive enterprise in that country, its success is deemed certain so soon as Don José de Salamanca takes it under his patronage. Spain has been languishing for the iron network which forms the means of communication in other countries, and it is Salamanca who is developing it. Already he has called into existence many famous lines. One small railway, realising a profit of not less than £4000 a month, is said to be entirely his own. He has undertaken to establish the Santander, Lisbon, and Oporto line, which not only connects Portugal and Spain, but affords to the interior of the latter direct access to the other Iberian ports on the Atlantic. He has been mainly instrumental in the formation of the line from New York, now an outport of European trade, to the Missouri by the Grand Trunk, of which the Atlantic and Great Western is the middle and completing portion. While factions are contending for the possession of Naples, in the very midst of the latest discussions between the flying King and the victorious Liberals, the Administration of the day—it happened to be that of Francis II.—closed a contract by which Salamanca is to construct a railway in Naples; and there can be no reasonable doubt, whatever Government may be established in the country, that régime of the railway will survive. The extraordinary power displayed in these cosmopolitan operations could scarcely have retained the energy required if the man had not still been animated by the ardour of his youth. This trait was happily educed by an incident which happened lately. Once a week—every Thursday—Salamanca keeps an open table, at which he receives, amongst others, the politicians and writers of the moderate party. A dozen of the minor journalists of Spain, possibly with a spice of satire in the project, invited the great capitalist to a dinner on the most economic scale. Upon the table, in the place where a basket of flowers is usually placed, stood a pyramid of books, surrounded by the busts of Cervantes, Calderon, Lope de Vega, and Velasquez. In returning thanks when his health was drunk, Salamanca referred to his University experience, and his labours as a journalist in Malaga. "Then," he went on to say, "the love of gold took possession of my soul, and it was at Madrid that I found the object of my adoration; but not, alas! without the loss of all my juvenile illusions. Believe me, gentlemen, the man who can calmly all his wishes has no more enjoyment. Keep to the course you have entered on, I advise you. Rothschild's celebrity will expire on the day of his death. Immortality can be earned, not bought. Here are before us the effigies of men who have gloriously cultivated liberal arts; their busts I have met with in every part of Europe; but nowhere have I found a statue erected to the honour of a man who has devoted his life to making money."

DON JOSE DE SALAMANCA.

Notwithstanding the American rate of speed with which the contractors have called this railroad into existence, the work has been executed with a solidity not common in the lines of the United States; and this reminds us that it is hardly just to reproach the Transatlantic railroads with the slightness of their first construction. The practice in reality is due to the social condition of the country. Traversing enormous distances, in many cases calling forth the traffic which they are afterwards to serve, the American railways are seldom able at the beginning to draw towards them abundant capital. They are, strictly speaking, built provisionally. According to the custom in America, the formation of a line develops settlement and traffic; the traffic furnishes the

THE ATLANTIC AND GREAT WESTERN RAILROAD.

THE first train of the Atlantic and Great Western Railway has sped its course, and the stupendous undertaking which for ten years has occupied the attention and absorbed the capital of commercial and moneyed men has at length reached a stage of its completion that almost guarantees a rapid and indisputable success.

To appreciate the importance of the event which our Engraving illustrates—the arrival of the first train from New York at James-town, State of New York—the reader should be informed that the line just opened is remarkable for completing a junction without which two great railroads in the region which it traverses have hitherto been deprived of half their utility. It is remarkable, too, as supplying an immediate connected highway from the chief emporium of the United States to the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, and all the vast regions watered by those giant streams.

The line was contemplated more than thirty years ago, by the greatest of American engineers, De Witt Clinton. It is needed as the high road from east to west; it is required for the settlers who already occupy the whole breadth of territory which it serves; and it passes through what Clinton called "the most valuable region of the United States." No part of the globe presents such an extent of uniform fertility.

Already the New York and Erie Railway has supplied the first section of this magnificent high road; further on the Ohio and Mississipi Railway carried forward the line, but with a great intermediate break comprising a part of New York State, the whole of Pennsylvania, and much of Ohio. It has, of course, been long practicable to travel by rail from New York to the West, but the route was tediously circuitous or zigzag, and, the two lines just mentioned being constructed on a gauge of six feet, the necessity of unloading and reloading all the goods from trucks of one size to those of another, owing to the break of gauge, has been a serious obstacle to the development of traffic. By the formation of the Atlantic and Great Western, however, which runs from the flourishing town of Salamanca, on the New York and Erie, to Dayton in Ohio, the whole line from New York to the Missouri, twelve hundred miles in length, is at once completed with a uniform broad gauge.

means for what are by courtesy termed "repairs," but what are literally reconstructions; and it is not till many years after its first opening reconstruction; and it is not till many years after its first opening that the real building of the railway is completed. We should see in supposing that here is a new scheme in a plan which, as we have mentioned, is a consequence of peculiar circumstances in the States. The American railways are far more profitable than our own, and they are so not merely to shareholders, but to the servants and to the public. To the traveller they are cheaper, fares being one half, or more less, than the scale of English fares. They extract much less money from than the scale of English fares. They extract much less money from the shareholders' pockets, and in return they give much more. In the Unived States 9,000 miles of railway have cost only 216 millions sterling, while in England 9000 miles have cost 900 millions sterling. The average rate of expenditure per mile is consequently four times greater in England than in America. In England, and yet the working expenses are less, and the actual return far more. Taking all the railways of the two countries, the average dividend is, in England, 4½ per cent; in America, 7½ per cent. But if we take in England, 4½ per cent; in America, 7½ per cent. But if we take the best railways of America which may be compared more properly with fifty lines in our busiest districts, we find that the dividends stand in England at 4·30 per cent, in America, 8·05 per cent. In the particular instance now before us, however, which gives at one time a most magnificent highway for the produce of the west to Missouri, the advantages offered were so promising that the scheme attracted a considerable supply of English capital, and it was determined that influence of Mr. M'Henry, of Liverpool; and it was determined that the work should from the first be constructed upon the principle of thorough efficiency.

When Mr. T. W. Kennard conducted the first train upon the Atlantic and Great Western Railway he was received at a banquet with a public demonstration, and as the dinner given to celebrate the event all the magnates of the company were present, and Mr. Kennard, Mr. Brassey, Sir Morton Peto, and other gentlemen of the English Committee, by Senor Benedito; the Duke of Rianzares presided over the Spanish Committee, by Senor Benedito; Mr. James M'Henry by Senor Navarro; Mr. James M'Henry by Senor Navarro; Mr. James M'Henry by Senor Navarro

THE NEW INDIAN FINANCE MINISTER.

MR. SAMUEL LAING, M.P. for the Wick Burghs, and Secretary of the Treasury, who has just accepted the seat at the Indian Council in Calcutta rendered vacant by the death of Mr. Wilson, is a man of no ordinary ability, and of distinguished antecedents, academical, commercial, and political. He is the son of Mr. S. Laing, of Papdale, Orkney (the accomplished translator from the Icelandic of the Heimskringla, and the author of the works called "Notes of a Traveller in France, Norway, Denmark," &c.), and is about fifty years of age. He entered St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1829, and "came out" second wrangler in 1832. He was immediately elected Fellow of St. John's, and was for many years a private (mathematical) tutor of the highest class in Cambridge. He was called to the Bar by the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn in 1840, but does not appear at once to have practised his profession, being appointed private secretary to Mr. Henry Labouchere (now Lord Taunton) when President of the Board of Trade. On the formation of the railway department of the Board of Trade he was made the secretary. Thence dated his rise in commercial and ultimately in political life: his aptitude for business, and his thorough acquaintance with the details of railway management at home and abroad, Mr. Laing being favourably known under the successive administrations of Mr. Labouchere, the Earl of Ripon, Mr. Gladstone, and Lord Dalhousie. In 1844 he published an elaborate "Report on British and Foreign Railways," and in the same year gave valuable evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons, in which it is especially to be noted he recommended the running of parliamentary trains at a minimum rate of payment. Lord Dalhousie nominated Mr. Laing in 1845 a member of the railway commission. The commission was soon dissolved, and Mr. Laing returned to the bar, where he enjoyed considerable "parliamentary" practice. In 1848 he was made chairman and managing director of the Brighton Railway Company, and during his five years of office the passenger traffic on the line was nearly doubled. In 1852 he became chairman of the Crystal Palace Company. He has been engaged in the direction of the Grand Central and Grand Junction Railways in France of the Antwerp and Rotterdam and Simbart lines in Holland; and the Great Western Railway of Canada. Mr. Laing was first returned for the Wick district of Burghs, in July, 1852, as a Liberal and Free-trader, professing "cordial sympathy with the great principles of civil and religious liberty;" but not unwilling to support Lord Derby, "if he brought forward good measures." In 1855 he moved for papers relative to the famous "Austrian note," in which terms were proposed to Russia, but not accepted, on behalf of England; and warmly condemned the refusal of the English plenipotentiary to accept the Austrian advances, in opposition to his other five colleagues at the Vienna conference. This motion (which was supported by Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Cobden, and others), and his vote in favour of Mr. Cobden's resolution, in 1857, condemnatory of the Chinese War, cost Mr. Laing his seat. He was again returned for the Wick Burghs in 1859, and, on Lord Palmerston's accession to office, was appointed Secretary to the Treasury.

VOTING FOR ANNEXATION AT NAPLES.

PROCEEDING TO THE POLL.

THE streets of Naples were all excitement from an early hour on the 21st ult., the day appointed for the voting on the annexation question to commence. Some quarters of the town poured forth their population in processional array, bearing the national Italian flags and singing in chorus the Garibaldi hymns. On some of the banners a gigantic si (yes) was fastened; whilst many of the people carried a similar pleasant on their breasts. Half-naked children waving small tri-coloured flags, and dancing in time to the singing, accompanied most of the processions. Our Special Artist in Naples has forwarded to us a vivid picture of one of these jubilant processions, which we engrave below.

A letter in a contemporary gives the following animated account of the scene at Naples on the eventful morning of the 21st ult.:—"A day in Naples—and such a day has Naples never seen! Wearied in body, and yet more so by the strong emotions of my mind, I sit down, at the close of the 21st of October, 1860, to give you a narrative of events which have at times unmanned me. From slavery to liberty, from death to life—such is the change which I have seen come over the people of Southern Italy this day; and you will not consider it as exaggerated language in one who has lived, and suffered, and sympathised with this oppressed race so long, and whose pen had been steeped in gall for so many years, if I say that I can scarcely command myself to report what I have heard and seen, and so deeply felt. It was a beautiful morning when the early bells were rung—a storno, as it is called—and summoned the people to perform their first duties as free men; and, joining the multitude, I made the round of several quarters, that I might see with my very own eyes what was passing. Demonstrations, and deputations, and flags aye, of course, as plentiful as blackberries; we are accustomed to them, so that nothing detained us until we arrived in the large Palace-yard, which was nearly filled with National Guards arranged in a hollow square. Bands were playing, and companies filing off after having given their votes, and fresh voters were coming up by 'streets' to throw in their all-decisive 'Si.'

SCENES AT THE VOTING-BOOTHS.

Our last week's Number contained some particulars of the scenes witnessed at the polling-booths, and we now give, from another source, an account of the voting at the election-booth at Monte Calvario, an illustration of which is given on page 450. "Enough time has been spent at San Ferdinando, and so now we will visit Monte Calvario. Our road lies through the Toledo, where the flags have been doubled since yesterday, and variegated lamps are already suspended for the evening's illumination. Bands of people are coming down, men and women, Garibaldini and civilians, all mixed up in delightful confusion, with music and flags, clapping their hands and shouting 'Viva Garibaldi!' 'Viva Vittorio Emmanuele!' What a scene of life and animation it is! A few steps further and we get to the polling-place of Monte Calvario, where there is tenfold the animation which distinguished San Ferdinando. Half-a-dozen openings lead into a piazza, and each opening has its triumphal arch, and every hole its flag, and a brass band is playing that beautiful hymn to Garibaldi. The President and his Scrutineers receive me with marked courtesy, and give me a post of honour, from which I watch the interesting proceedings. Even the women want to vote, but they are kept back. There is an exception made in favour of

NEAPOLITANS PROCEEDING TO RECORD THEIR VOTES FOR ANNEXATION.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, FRANK VIZETELLY.

Marinezza in Santa Giovannara, an old patriot of the quarter, known throughout the city for her devotion to Liberal principles. She has a tricoloured sash or scarf over her shoulder and all round her waist, and very proud she looks, and determined and rejoiced, as if she would say, 'I will throw one stone more on the pile which shall bury the Bourbons for ever.' She throws in her '48,' and is hailed with clapping of hands, and leaves, as she came, in the midst of tricoloured banners. Twelve monks of the Terra Santa had already voted what I came, and eighty of the Pasquilieri voted later. Priests, rari nantes in the great crowd, now and then made their appearance. And now comes a martyr, whose sufferings for the cause of free Italy made his appearance a subject of public joy. Spaventa is his name; and he is going, as he deserves to be, with clapping of hands and 'Vivas,' and comes up liberated from his chains and neat jacket, and receives the privilege of a free man. Some old that they could scarcely totter passed before me, and men on crutches, and blind men, who groped their way with the toe, and their only faculty left. But there was one case so affecting that it moved me almost to unmanliness. It was a person in advanced life, very lame, who was dragging himself on with his hands, and then knelt down and kissed the ass with devotion, being choked at the time with the excess of feeling. 'What a history did that act of his tell!' It is high time, however, to leave Monte Calvario, or I shall be killed with kindness and with rejection from zeal and fewerkes. Yet even this quarter has been allowed to know as the most advanced and liberal quarter of Naples; it has sent out its legions in all times of disturbance to fight the Santa Lucisti and other combatants. Let us look of marriery, therefore. The most brutal police commissaries have always been there, as Morcillo; and the most ferocious of priests, as the Curé of St. Matteo; and rapine and plunder, and ferocity and hypocrisy have been laid in hand in every age in the quarter of Monte Calvario. No wonder, therefore, that the inhabitants are to-day half mad with joy.'

The result of the voting in the kingdom of Naples was officially declared on Saturday last, as follows:—Yes, 1,302,062; No, 10,312: majority in favour of annexation, 1,291,750.

MR. LUSK'S SHRIEVAL LODGE AND CHAIN.

THE badge consists of massive Elizabethan scrolls in standard gold. In the centre is a Saxon shield, on which are the arms of London and Middlesex impaled, beautifully emboldened in proper colours in enamel. On each side of this shield are, mounted in relief, the civic sword and mace. On the top are the arms of the Worshipful Company of Spectaclemakers, the guild to which Mr. Lusk belongs, and at the bottom are his own arms, with the motto, "Deo Duce," surmounted by his crest, an infidel ship in a circular solid gold medallion, all choice specimens of enamelling. The designer has appropriately introduced the leaves and acorns of the venerable oak, typical of England's greatness. The chain is formed of the "wheat-ear" link, equally illustrative of her industry; it is handsomely arranged in alternate links, and the whole length is 18 feet. The badge and chain were designed and executed by Mr. John Poole, chronometer-maker, of Fenchurch-street.

GAETA.

THE King of Naples has retired to Gaeta as his last stronghold, and this fortress may be said to be his prison as well as his refuge, for the Sardinian General Cialdini on Saturday last drove the troops of Menu about three miles from Gaeta. Victor Emmanuel crossed the Garigliano on Wednesday week, the enemy falling back before him upon Gaeta. Their line of march lay along that of the coast. Attacked in front with great vigour by the Piedmontese troops, and outflanked on their right, according to a telegram from Naples by the fleet, the Bourbon army dispersed, leaving in the hands of the victors tents, waggons, stores, and a very large number of prisoners. The victory was so complete that General Scuma was able to advance to the very walls of Gaeta on the 5th inst., and to take up a position at a range of three miles from the fortress.

The Sardinian Official Journal for the 15th of September last contained an Engraving of the Town and Castle of Gaeta, from a drawing by Samuel Read; and we now give, on the first page, a view in Gaeta from a sketch by the same gentleman. Abundant and many quotations from "Murray's Handbook" respecting the town and fortress :—"The town of Gaeta stands at the base of a rounded hill, crowned by the tomb of Munatius Plancus, now a fortress, and on a projecting headland, which stretches into the sea and forms the north side of the extensive bay anciently called the Sinus Cietanus, and still known as the Gulfo di Gaeta. The west side of the town is surrounded with Roman villas. Scipio Africanus and Lælius were in the habit of retiring there and amusing their leisure with picking up shells on the beach. The splendid promontory, to the S.E., which forms the immortal interest as the burial-place of the nurse of Æneas, we pipe baroque architecture in all parts of the town, especially in the church full of the Roman empire. Gaeta was one of the three Greek municipalities which became the refuge of the civilisation of Italy. Amalfi, Gaeta, and Naples subsequently advanced to independence on the ruins of the Eastern empire, too enfeebled to offer opposition to the change. Their chief intelligence was the trade of the sea, and their merchants and ships and settlements in the great ports of the Levant. The chief privileges of Gaeta, under the Romans and by Lombard and narrow isthmus, strengthened by walls, and backed by the deiles of the Campagna, naturally gave to this maritime settlement a political strength which has made it in our own times the key-fortress of the kingdom. It was consequently exposed to the invasions of the Lombards and the Saracens, and did not lose its liberty until the twelfth century, when it was absorbed, along with the other free cities of Southern Italy, in the Norman conquest. Its port was always more extensively beautiful, and its rich orange, lemon, and citron groves give it a peculiarly luxurious character. It is the chief city of a district, and the see of a bishopric. It has 14,000 inhabitants, including the garrison. The Cathedral, dedicated to St. Erasmus, contains the standard presented by Pius V. to Don John of Austria, the commander of the Christian army at the battle of Lepanto. The celebrated column with twelve sides, on the summit of which the names of the twelve winds in Greek and Latin, is one of the most curious monuments in the town. On the highest point of the promontory is the circular building which forms so conspicuous an object in the landscape. It is shown by the inscription to be the tomb of L. Munatius Plancus, and is now called the Torre d'Orlando. The other antiquities of Gaeta are the remains of the amphitheatre and theatre, the vestiges of a temple and the villas of Sesarius and Hadrian. The citadel of Gaeta has always been one of the strongest positions in the kingdom of Naples. The military defences of Gaeta have been immensely strengthened and extended of late years, and it is now one of the strongest places in Italy. Of late it has formed the favourite residence of the Sovereign. An extensive line of batteries along the shore encircle not only the old castle but the adjoining hill. A magnificent Gothic church, dedicated to St. Francesco, is now in progress; seen from a distance—the only way it can be by the traveller—it will form a splendid pile, with its fine front and detached small tower. The Royal residence is at the junction of the hill of Munatius Plancus and the fortress or castle; along the former roads have been constructed in commanding positions. The Roman tomb, formerly of difficult access, can be reached in a carriage."

FIELD-DAY AND REVIEW OF TROOPS AT WOOLWICH

THE whole of the troops in Woolwich garrison, comprising the Battalion of Royal Horse Artillery, the Foot Artillery, and Field-Train Batteries, and a squadron of the 16th Lancers quartered on the common, on the 24th ult., every preparation having been made to carry out the complete details of a field-day. The command of the Royal Horse Artillery was the General Commanding-in-Chief and his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael of Russia. A guard of honour, with the colours and a full band, attended the Commander-in-Chief, who was received on the field at ten o'clock his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael, attended by Count Lieven, Colonel Grey Lennard, and Major Wellesley, and his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, were received by a Royal salute of twenty-one guns and the usual presentation of arms. The Royal Horse Artillery and Batteries then took up a position in review order at the south end of the common, near the Royal Military Academy, the entire force being under the command of Major-General Sir Richard Dacres, K.C.B. The 16th Lancers being opposed to the same force. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, who wore an undress uniform, and his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke also undress, took up a position at the Royal standard, and the several batteries marched past at slow and quick time, the entire force being also minutely inspected front and rear, in the usual manner. THE WAR IN CHINA.

THE various correspondents have described with admirable clearness the brief campaign on the Tien-Tsin-Ho. A more brilliant series of exploits is not to be found in the history of our wars with the Chinese. There was really nothing, a thing of rare occurrence in these encounters. Hitherto the Chinese have shown greater aptitude for flight than fight. But here they stood and fought as well as any troops could be expected to fight against odds. It is true they have been greatly surprised; but, on the other hand, we had a superior artillery. Indeed, the two striking facts of the brief war are—first, the triumphant success of the Armstrong guns; and, secondly, the cruelty and treachery of the Tartars and the Chinese gunners.

THE ATTACK ON THE TAKU FORTS AND TANG-KOW INTRENCHED CAMPS.

The telegrams received last week gave but imperfect outlines of the contest. The despatches received on Tuesday from Admiral Hope's fleet might have been inferred from those brief messages, and the operations of the 21st, 22nd, and 23rd ultimo, which are fully described in the despatches, are now known, and not for half the distance the ground on both sides was almost unknown, and the enemy's position and resources were unsuspected. The Taku forts stand at a point where the river curves deeply to the south and comes up again almost to the north, so that the same river passes the forts on the north and, by the river below the loop and the sea, are the northern forts, really, as it turns out, the strongest. Between the forts and Pehtang, the Chinese had several intrenched camps, having their left at Sin-ho, five or six miles higher up the river than the forts, and extending to Pehtang. The enemy on the south had to be met with considerable ingenuity supported the northern works by batteries on the south intercepting the approaches. The difficulty did not therefore cease to turn the Tartar left, their weakest point; and therefore, on the 12th ultimo, Admiral Hope commenced the operations by taking the right, centre, and, after struggling through the abounding mud with great labour, emerged on the open ground on the south. The military difficulty and danger were now in the right, thus turning the Tartar left, and coming down upon them unexpectedly, and with the full force of the artillery and infantry. The attack was made, in short, in the manner described in the preliminary victory. The infantry were set ashore, and, after a skirmish with the enemy's outposts, they advanced in line. Prince Kung had collected a handful of Sikhs charged masses of the enemy's horse without the slightest effect. The Sikhs, in fact, were not to be trifled with. Regularly and well trained, with terrible effect, and it is admitted that under this disadvantage the Tartar troops did not fight ill were men. The poor fellows were mowed down, but they did not flinch, or even inclose to stand. The intrenchments were all carried, one after another, the very little loss on our side, and the chief resistance encountered at the road to Tien-Tsin, and access to the river above the main forts on both banks.

The Chinese were now all on the river side in large work. They had overcome the mouth of the loop in the river above described. Their intrenched camp here had a front of three miles. It was guarded by numerous guns, and the other bank of the river intended to fire on the flank of any force advancing from the direction of the forts, and to prevent the passage of the river by reinforcements. But first it was necessary to demolish the works on the south bank, and this was accomplished by the Armstrong artillery, and by a bombardment from the river under fire and spiked the guns. The whole force now opened between the enemy and the river, upon the proper side of the intrenchment; the British having the right, the French the left. The artillery of the allies again cleared the way, shooting the enemy from the guns in a very short time. Then the infantry came into play, and the 60th Rifles, finding a dam across the ditch, rushed over it, Lieutenant Lister being the first man in. Ten minutes afterwards the French, who had to construct a bridge across the ditch, also rushed into the fort, and established at their head. Again we had suffered but little loss.

THE STORMING AND CAPTURE OF THE TAKU FORTS.

Tang-Kow was now occupied; but the main business had yet to be done, and we have every reason to be pleased with the manner in which it was gone about. The Chinese were in the full extent of their power, but the last did not take, and hostilities were suspended. In the interval a serious reconnaissance was made by the French and English Generals. General Montauban was in favour of crossing the river at once, and attacking the western forts from the rear; but his force actually were transported to the other side. But Sir Hope Grant maintained that the great northern fort was the key of the position. It lies on the north bank just below the loop in the river, and it commands the opposite bank entirely, and also could take the forts on the south bank in reverse by means of guns from the north. Sir Hope Grant prevailed.

A work was drawn up, and surrounded by deep wet ditches strewn with stakes and crowfoot. On the 21st it was attacked by the allies—the English this time having the right; the French the left. As before, the fire of the artillery, especially the Armstrong, soon silenced the enemy's guns and blew up their magazines; but the infantry advanced to the ditch and the storming party, first fought it out valiantly so long as they could possibly stand. Then ensued a fierce conflict for the ditch. The ladders proving too long, they proved to be too heavy, and therefore to be useless. The men of the 44th, waiting for a bridge, fought on the edge of the ditch under fire right under the parapet. At the first bridge, which the sailors crossed on bamboo bridges, which the gallant cousins, standing on the other side, had prepared, were also thirty yards to open a musketry fire, the French infantry being on the right the English on the left.

The fire of our artillery being then partially compelled to slacken, the enemy emerged from their cover, and opened a heavy fire of musketry on our troops.

The French, under General Cialdini, immediately pushed on to the salient and the river, crossed the wet ditches in the most gallant manner, and established themselves on the berm, from whence they endeavoured to escalade the bastion; but, however, they were unable to effect, from the vigorous resistance of the Chinese.

"The fire of the Sappers to lay down the position before was unavailing; nothing but three inches was carrying it being knocked away in one moment, and one of the pontoons destroyed.

"At this period Sir H. Napier caused the two howitzers of Captain Govan's battery to be brought up to within fifty yards of the gate, in order more speedily to breach it, and a gun-carriage was also brought up to the front, the iron mats when our storming party (now joined by the head-quarters wing of 11th, under Colonel Knowly) had passed over them. The gate was broken and partly swum over, forced their way in a single file in the most gallant manner, Lieutenant Napier, 44th Regiment, and Lieutenant Burnaby, 99th Regiment, being the first to enter, when they, assisted in the regimental colours of the 11th, carried by Ensign Pulteney, and followed soon after on the breach (assisted by Private Lone, 67th Regiment), and subsequently on the parapet, which by the first to mount. At the same moment the guns also effected their entrance, and the garrison was driven back step by step, and hurled pell-mell through the embrasures as they successively retreated.

Here the same obstacles which had impeded our advance, namely the water retreat, in addition to two wet ditches and a row of pointed bamboo stakes there was swampy ground, and a third wet ditch and bank.

The enemy's parties were now driven from one to them from the cavalier, and this was rendered by the cannister fire of Captain Govan's guns, which poured in a destructive fire of the fort for this purpose.

The ground outside the fort was literally strewn with the enemy's dead and wounded, three of the Chinese were impaled on the stakes. A few fugitives reached the outer earth fort, which appeared to be over 200 feet square, and was answered by the Armstrong guns with good effect.

About an hour after the whole of the forts on both sides of the river hauled down their war banners, and hoisted flags of truce. General Montauban and Lord Elgin, after to ask their meaning, and summon them to surrender, but they only received an evasive and insolent reply, and were dotted to come on if the attack.

Accordingly two fresh regiments—the 3rd Buffs and the 5th Punjaub Infantry—marching them brought up, I advanced to the outer earth fork fort. Two 9-inch guns were placed in position against it; the other siege-guns could not be brought up. The fort had been abandoned, as no fight except on an arc encircling the left and front, the French guns on our right. Not a shot was fired by the enemy, and the allied troops marched unopposed over the ditches, and seized the walls, without meeting any opposition, the garrison of 2000 men having retired.

This fort was stronger than the first. The walls are all constructed of earth, and those of the Chinese were ingeniously armed with guns and wall-piece, having muskets with rests, and matchlocks, of which were all pieces, and having a rich collar round the muzzle. The two redoubtable wet ditches, between which the enemy's cavalry passed, were also strongly defended by the guns and the parapet above. Both these ditches were full of water, as shallow as the second, but wide, round the fort, as shallow encircling the whole, and each ditch 10 feet deep of water, which therefore no advance to be made only on further covered by piece of water, which therefore no advance to be made only on further covered by piece of water, which therefore no advance to be made only on further covered by piece

THE BRITISH BRIGADE MARCHING INTO THE LARGO ST. FRANCESCO DI PAOLA, NAPLES.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, FRANK VIZETELLY.

THE Brigade of British Garibaldians, on landing at Naples on the 15th ult., was marched to the above square, in front of the King's Palace. The reception of these volunteers was most enthusiastic. Bouquets were showered on them from all sides, and, being caught by the soldiers, were placed by them on the points of their bayonets, in the muzzles of their rifles, and round their caps. The scene in the Great Square, is thus described in a letter from Naples:—"It was a drizzling morning, and we were in despair lest the brilliant spectacle might be spoilt by the rain. As ten o'clock, however, approached the sun deigned to smile upon us a little, and then retired into his gloomy reserve, and so he continued yielding and sulking the whole day. There was brightness, however, just sufficient to put us in good humour; so, early in the morning, every one of us turned out. On driving through the town we found almost every one, like ourselves, making for the arsenal, before the gates of which were assembled vast crowds of expectants; but, hearing that the procession was to come out on the other side, just under the windows from which, not two months since, I saw the Bourbons looking out, we hurried back, and took up our place under the balcony from which Ferdinand II. periodically reviewed whole regiments of monks following in procession the image of their patron saint. What a mighty change. The ladders were planted against the gasaway, and the lilies had not only faded, but had been removed by the hands of the workmen at is. 8d. a day. Thus falls a dynasty of despots—of despots who will not learn from experience or march with the age, who regard themselves as the Vicegerents of God. First in order of the long array comes procession after procession of National Guards with flags; of the populace shouting 'Viva Inghilterra!' 'Viva gli Ingleu!' and we take off our hats; of crowds headed by young women with banners over their shoulders, and flowers and evergreens: and the Piazza is crowded with thousands of human beings, many of them doubtless only curious to see a spectale, many of them, however, entering deeply into the real sentiment of the scene, and regarding it as an expression of the public mind in favour of liberty: and the English—honoured name—were the great centre of interest. Here they are surging on, and music and clapping of hands announce that at last the real business of the day is beginning. The flags of the National Guard appear above the accent from the arsenal, and then the newly-created militia, really fine-looking military men, and they were greeted on all sides with 'Vivas' sung to the tunes of Garibaldi and Victor Emmanuel. There is a great display of white handkerchiefs, and the 'Vivas' and the clappings are redoubled as the English appear, and all pass under the Palace windows, flanked and thronged by thousands of spectators, who applaud them to the echo. They carry the tricoloured flag with 'Viva Victore Emanuello' inscribed upon it; every man has a bouquet on his bayonet and a dahlia on his breast, and young Styles has a garland round his hat. A finer set of fellows I never looked upon. Behind the English comes another battalion of the National Guard, bearing the glorious banner of Old England in the front. What Englishman in a foreign land does not look upon it with pride and affection? They all move on in front of the palace, and then circle round the Great Square, amid the shouts of tens of thousands of the people, and then form in columns, the National Guards parade with the English."

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

EARL MANVERS.

The Right Hon. Charles Herbert Pierrepont, second Earl Manvers, Viscount Newark, and Baron Pierrepont, of Holme Pierrepont, was the eldest surviving son of Charles, the first Earl, by his wife, Anne Evelyn, youngest daughter of John Mill, Esq., of Mill Hill, Middlesex. He was born on the 11th of March, 1778, and was early in life in the Royal Navy. He was M.P. for Nottinghamshire from 1802 to 1816, in which latter year he succeeded to the family honours on the decease of his father, the first Earl. He married, the 23rd of August, 1806, Mary Letitia, eldest daughter and sole heir of Anthony Hardolph Eyre, Esq., of Grove-hall, Notts, by whom (who survives him) he has had two sons—namely, Charles Evelyn, Viscount Newark, who married Emily, daughter of Lord Atherton, and died in 1850, having had by her (who died in 1851) an only son and heir William Herbert, Viscount Newark, the Earl's successor; and two daughters—viz., Mary Frances, married, in 1834, to Richard Cartwright Eaton, Esq., and Anne Caroline, married, in 1837, to Robert Eaton and Annesley Bathurst, married, the 23rd of August, 1838, to Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Pierrepont, who died on the 30th ult., and is succeeded by his only surviving son and heir William Herbert, Viscount Newark, now third Earl Manvers, who was born in 1808, and married, in 1835, Georgiana Jane Elizabeth Mundy, second daughter of the Duke de Colgny, and has two sons and a daughter. The next brother of the Earl Manvers just deceased was the late Lord Henry Howe Pierrepont, P.C. British Minister at the Court of Denmark. The latter, and only Manvers, married, the summer of 1838, Caroline Lascelles, cooking to the estates of the last Duke of Kingston, and was raised to a baron and viscountcy in 1796, and to an earldom in 1801.

ADMIRAL NAPIER.

Sir Charles Napier, of Merchiston-House, Hants, K.C.B., Admiral of the Blue, Count Cape St. Vincent, and Grandee of the first class in Portugal, Grand Cross of the Portuguese Order of the Tower and Sword, Grand Cross of the Order of Maria-Theresa of Austria, of the Red Eagle of Prussia, and of St. George of Russia, M.P. for Southwark, and one of the most eminent seamen of his time, was the eldest son of Charles Napier, Esq., of Merchiston-House, Hants, Lieutenant-General of Marines, by his wife, Harriet, second daughter of Gabriel Hamilton, Esq., of Westburn, in the county of Lanark, and was born in the year 1786. Admiral Napier, and the cousin of the illustrious subject of this memoir—Sir Charles James Napier, G.C.B., General Sir George Thomas Napier, K.C.B., and Lieutenant-General Sir William Francis Napier, K.C.B. He was made, on the 6th of March, 1786, at the house of his father, and, entering the Royal Navy in 1799 as a first-class volunteer on board the Martin sloop-of-war, he was employed in the North Sea. He was removed in the early part of the ensuing year to the Romney, 74, the flagship of Sir John Warren, and proceeded to accompanied an expedition to Ferrol, and afterwards to the Mediterranean. In 1805 he was appointed to the Conqueror, which was present at the memorable action off Trafalgar, and, in the following year, in 1806, at the bombardment of Gaeta, and the capture of Admiral Linois, and the Fiorite frigate. On the 17th of July, 1809, having been present at the reduction of the Danish islands of Zealand, Nyborg, and Anholt, Napier assisted in the boats of the Pique sloop, at the cutting out of a Spanish merchantman lying at Puerto Cabello under the protection of two batteries and the guns of a vessel to be retired. In August of the same year he commanded the Recruit brig, of eighteen guns, in which he fought a smart action off the Havannah, a French corvette of twenty-two guns, which, after he had had his mainmast shot away, and many of his rigging cut away, and his men killed, and himself severely wounded, he succeeded in putting to flight. In this contest, although his ship was beaten by a force reduced to less than one-half, until the enemy was out of sight. In February, 1810, he assisted at the reduction of Martinique, and in the following year, 1811, at the capture of Java, the master of the vessel in which, and to open the pilchard the colonists upon the remnants of Fort Cornelis, and the lines of Cornelis, and the entrenched camp of Marcelon, and of three sloops of the line, which lay in a position of great strength, and was promoted in his capture of the Hesperia. He was made a Post Captain on the 23rd of June, 1812. After performing various services in the Mediterranean in his ship, the Severne, was paid off in June, 1815, and on the 4th of that month he was nominated a K.C.B. Napier was, after a long time, called into action again in 1839, when he was employed on particular service on the coast of Portugal in the Isis, and British squadron and in his flagship operations on the Syrian coast he displayed indefatigable zeal. On the 3rd of November, 1840, he received all the honours due to his services in the Mediterranean, and he proved himself thoroughly effective. After the reduction of Acre he concluded an advantageous convention with Mehemet Ali. On the acknowledgment of his conduct he was created a Knight Commander of the Bath on the 4th of December, 1840. He was further included in the list of Parliament to the Commander-in-Chief and his subordinates. He was appointed Rear-Admiral of the Blue, and held for two years the command of the Channel Fleet. After a prolonged interval Sir C. Napier received the command of the Baltic Fleet at the outbreak of the Russian War. Sir Charles Napier was promoted to the Blue in 1858. Sir Charles has been a great politician in his time. In 1851 and in 1852 he was returned to Parliament for Marylebone; and in November, 1853, he was returned for Southwark, which he represented in the House of Commons. Sir Charles Napier married, the daughter of George Cunningham Esq., and widow of Lieut.-Colonel Edward Elers, R.N., who died at Bombay in December, 1807, but had no only child, Elers Napier, married, on the 31st of October, 1838, to the Rev. Henry Jodrell, Rector of Gisleham, Suffolk, brother of the present Sir Richard Paul Jodrell, Bart. Sir Charles Napier, by the general public regret, died on the 8th inst., at his seat, Merchiston House, near Portsmouth.

GARIBALDI'S BED-ROOM AT PALERMO.—The Official Journal of Sicily publishes the following decree, after mentioning the various laws to perpetual renown, orders:—Art. 1. The bed-room occupied by General Garibaldi at the Royal Palace, the partition hallway from the Royal Palace to Porte Nuove, shall be perpetually preserved in its present state, and with the furniture now contained in it. Art. 2. The present decree shall be engraved on a marble tablet, and placed at the entrance of the said chamber, &c.—Given at Palermo, the 4th day of August, in the fourteenth year of the reign.

MILITARY MASS IN THE FRENCH CAMP IN SYRIA.—About nine o'clock on Sunday morning military music was heard, and a solemn and imposing spectacle it was, carrying the mind back to the days of Godfrey and Coeur de Lion. The place built at the very top of the ridge of Lebanon, a mountain, on a rising ground which overlooks the plain. It was composed of empty hospital tents, covered with white linen, and the altar was formed of two bars by the officers. In front, at each angle, was a mountain gun. The officiating priest was the Abbé Gay, the vicar of the Archbishop of Paris, the General had applied for to act as Chaplain to the forces. His assistants were a deacon and a subdeacon (who had to be, as the ecclesiastical rules do not go into the altar cloth), a soldier of the Foot Chasseurs, and my draughtsman, who held the book. Behind the altar was a large tent appropriated to the use of the priest, much to the satisfaction of his sense of self-importance. A magnificent crucifix was suspended over the altar. At the proper moment the guns out and sailed to the white baggy breeches and jacket, while his hands and face I dare say he had never been vested since he was ordained, except during the storm at Juan-Fernandez. The General, with his Staff, were on horseback immediately in front of the altar, and the troops were drawn up in a square. All continued to be still and solemn, when the officiating priest, accompanied by the reminder of their pieces, and the detachment of Foot Chasseurs presented arms. The General then dismounted, and the bell left off and the band struck up a battalion of the 8th Regiment of the Line and of the battalion of the 1st Regiment of Zouaves. The right-hand attendant was composed of the 1st battalion of Foot Chasseurs and of the battalion of the 13th Regiment of the Line. The troops then formed behind and at the sides of the altar. The Zouaves, with their standard, bearing the crescent and star, occupying the most conspicuous position in front of the officiating priest. The band struck up the drums and bugles on the left, with the eagle and the cavalry trumpets, including those of the Spahis, immediately in front. The band struck up, the rising on the skirt of the column, and looked on with more curiosity than reverence. Half-a-dozen Arabs, on the outskirts of the camp, who had been engaged to serve as guides to the column, vice Christians dismissed the service, crept up and squatted on their hams close to the drums. The band's resources in sacred music were evidently very limited, and they were compelled to cite on the accompaniment of the mass with strains which sounded vastly like dance music. At intervals the drums and bugles, alternating with the trumpets, rattle in, and gave the ceremony a warlike, fierce, and menacing character, which was again changed and softened when a really respectable band struck up the Hymn of Thanksgiving and praise to the God of Infinite mercies and loving kindness. At the elevation of the Host arms were presented with a rattling noise, and salutes were fired from the four corners of the camp. During the ceremony a soldier of the Line fell down from the effects of the sun, and had to be carried off. The mass was soon over, and the troops marched and broke back before the General and Staff at the double, and returned to quarters.—Correspondent of the Times.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CHALLENGE TO MR. HORWITZ.—Mr. Fenton, the renowned blindfold champion, who is at present in New York, whereby Mr. Paul Morphy is performing, has addressed the following challenge to the American champion:—"New York, October 3, 1860.—Dear Sir,—In the name of professional chess, I challenge you to a match of chess by telegraph, to be played between Boston and New York, or any other two cities you may select, for the sum of 1,000 dollars, a match of six games to constitute a game, each player to conduct three times the attack and three times the defence; and if twenty minutes elapse for the Knight's move, the defence to be played alternately by each player throughout the match. I am aware that the proposition is novel, but I am confident that you will not refuse it on that account. I have not named a time limit for the moves, as in my opinion that should be left to the players, as moves in a doubtful advantage, while it invariably and necessarily results in a loss of so much time, every advantage in the game is lost, and rarely giving interesting to the great majority of amateurs. If your high and justly-acquired reputation as a player is not a mere bubble, you will not refuse this challenge. I have met an opponent in the United States who, in the course of two years, has not had an advantage which, without marring the beauties of our noble game, may still prove victorious. I am, dear sir, yours truly, Thomas Fenton." We are sorry to see this opinion, which make the character wearing the match pretty even, or right your opinion, which make the character wearing the match pretty even, or right your opinion, which make the character wearing the match pretty even, or right your

THE FUNERAL OF ENSIGN TUCKER, OF THE BRITISH LEGION, BEFORE CAPUA.

THE British brigade was ordered to the advanced posts before Capua two days after its arrival at the camp, and, while proceeding to take up its position, it was called upon to check the advance of a party of Royalist troops, which it succeeded in doing in first-rate style. Though the affair was but a skirmish it cost the life of an officer, Ensign Tucker, and of Private Mitchell; and eight more were wounded. Ensign Tucker's body was brought in and buried by his companions the same night, in the garden of Colonel Peard's head-quarters, within a hundred yards of the enemy. "The scene," says a correspondent of the Daily News, "was one to be remembered even by those who have before followed the track of death from the field of battle. His body was carried in by his comrades. It was a fitful night—now clear as day, now cloudy and obscure. The torches glared on the scarlet uniforms and then paled before the clear autumn moon. Round the grave stood the companions of his short career. The Adjutant read the impressive service for the burial of the dead. The Lord's Prayer burst in irresistible chorus from that band of men, any of whom might die to-morrow. It was the echo of the religion of the heart. Ashes to ashes—all is over! They have decked his grave with roses, and a stone will tell where lies the first English volunteer who has fallen in the campaign." Mr. Tucker was interpreter to the regiment and a correspondent of this journal. He was highly esteemed by every officer and man in the brigade. His death was sudden. He was killed by a shot through the temple, and died without a struggle.

THE FUNERAL OF ENSIGN TUCKER OF THE BRITISH LEGION, AT THE ADVANCED POSTS BEFORE CAPUA.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, FRANK VIZETELLY.

All accounts agree in stating that the British brigade fought with great bravery on the 19th ult. Colonel Peard (Garibaldi's English-man), who commands the British volunteers, addressed to the Dictator a letter on the subject of their first engagement, in which he awards them high praise. He also issued on the 20th ult. the following divisional order :—

The Colonel-Brigadier begs to express to the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the brigade of British Volunteers, the high sense he has of their noble conduct under fire on the 19th. In the two last campaigns in which he has had the honour to serve in Italy, he has never seen a more severe fire of musketry, nor men who have stood unflinching with greater steadiness than did the young soldiers of the brigade. Proud as he was to be appointed to the command of a brigade of his countrymen, he feels now that he has a right to exult in the young soldiers of Old England under his command, not only advancing under a heavy fire, but retiring in obedience to orders with the precision of old campaigners. The Colonel-Brigadier has had orders with the precision of old campaigners. The Colonel-Brigadier has had orders with the precision of old campaigners. The Colonel-Brigadier has had

No. 1060.—VOL. XXXVII.] SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1860. [WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

ITALIA UNA.

THE grandest political event of our times approaches completion. A new nation is born to Europe, and, what is better, to freedom. Italy—that same Italy with whose ancient history the early associations of the educated world are inseparably interwoven, and over whose hapless degradation every generous bosom has heaved with sighs of pity—Italy, which one of the shrewdest diplomatists of the present century contemptuously described as nothing more than "a geographical expression," has started into life a full-grown kingdom. Venetia is but a question of a few months, more or less. Rome stands ready, as soon as French intervention ceases to be possible, to resume her old position as the metropolis of the southern peninsula. The current of national feeling flows as palpably through both of them as through the already unbound limbs of the body politic. In right, in choice, in heart, in hope, in all but actual emancipation from external restraint, they are part of "Italy, one and indivisible;" within a little they will be united to her in fact. After what has been accomplished within the last eighteen months no one can rationally doubt what the end is to be. It may be described in four words—"Italy for the Italians."

How comes it that we Englishmen take such a thrilling interest in the progress of this political drama, and look with such intense earnestness for its happy dénouement? Something, no doubt, is due to early training. Latin literature, comprising poetry, history, oratory, and philosophy, sowed some of the first seeds of manly thought in our minds, nursed into vigour ou sentiments of patriotism, heroism, and national glory, and we long to pay back to Italy, in the shape of cordial sympathy, some instalment of the debt we owe to the glorious literature of old. Still more, perhaps, is to be attributed to the fact that Italy just now is reviving our faith in the grander elements of human nature. It is long since history presented to our admiring gaze such a splendid illustration of high humanity, such a group as Victor Emmanuel, Garibaldi, and Cavour, encircled by such an enthusiastic, self-restraining, public-spirited people. All of them have their flaws, showing that they are moulded from the same clay as ourselves; but, taken together, the patriot King, the noble-hearted warrior, the far-seeing statesman, and the re-generated nation—we cannot look upon them, cannot study them, without becoming conscious of a deeper respect for manhood, and of brighter hope in the destinies of our race. In this age of materialism one is grateful to witness, in Italy especially, such a glorious efflorescence of soul.

Italy united, independent, and free—it is the last attribute that sanctifies the rest; for political freedom is the breath of national life. Who can tell what new developments of greatness have been rendered torpid in this people by the leaden pressure of despotism? Who can foresee the immense variety of grand and beautiful forms in which intellect, heretofore deprived of all opportunity and motive, will now start to life unlimited scope, both in art and in thought? Italy's own vales and plains and woods, after a severe winter? Who can anticipate the future possibilities of a people having such reminiscences as those of Italy when filled with a new sense of bounding life, and suddenly and finally freed from the curse that perdam the forbad its development? Wherever Italians have had a great object, a high motive, and a fair chance, they have displayed capabilities as elevated and as powerful as any in Europe Now that they have a country and free institutions, those capabilities—long repressed, and now for the first time called—may be expected to furnish a noble contribution to the benefit of mankind. We shall all reap the advantage of Italy's resurrection, as well indirectly as directly. Europe will be better, the world will be better, for the existence of a new and great state of it from intellectual and moral waste. It will be like the restoration of a paralysed organ or limb. We shall all be sensible of a greater breadth and fulness of life.

Free political institutions in Italy will give stability to political freedom where it already exists, and will accelerate the chances of acquiring it where it does not. Belgium, Switzerland, Holland, Sweden, and Norway will feel their liberties more secure than they were, before Italy became a kingdom and free, against the overbearing influence of despotisms; and Prussia, Austria, Poland, and Germany will take fresh heart and hope from the marvellous success of their Peninsular sister. The first lesson that leaveneth the lump is powerfully at work in the very centre of Europe. This time it is Italy that holds up the torch and lights the way to Liberation; and it will be the work of a measured her step, so calm and self-assured her carriage, so orderly and admirable her advance, that even Governments cannot but treat revolution, when it comes in such a shape, with profound respect, and pass the word to each other to let it march on unhindered.

When the present excitement has somewhat subsided, and Italy begins to turn her political liberty to account, free trade will elicit her best energies and enterprise. It is doing so even now. Already the cities of Lombardy, the Romagna, Tuscany, and the Romagna are, as it were, drawing out the plans, and marking off the bases of a large domestic and international traffic. Industry, feeling itself unshackled, lifts its head, and looks eagerly around for new employments. Custom-houses, local prohibitions, networks of frontiers, hosts of clashing tariffs, and all the impediments which petty despotism has thrown in the way of honest interchange of commodities, have been so far swept away as to leave abundant room for remunerative enterprise. And in the midst of this activity congregated on the Rialto, so now the genius of the Italians is apt for mercantile pursuits. Freedom, security, motive was all they needed. This they will have under constitutional government and national unity; and it is difficult to conceive how more rapidly, widely, or successfully Italy will take her proportionate share in the industrial and commercial activities of Europe. We know very well that these changes cannot be perfected in a day, marvellous as has been course of events during the last few months. But we also know that political freedom is the parent of every other freedom. Hence we stand ready to grasp by the hand, and to welcome to all the countless blessings of constitutional rule, a people whose ancient greatness and whose great fight of difficulties drawn towards them our most earnest sympathies. England has already extended to them invaluable moral support; the unanimous voice of England has shielded them from the interposition of foreign despots; and, now that they are on the eve of redeeming their long-lost nationality, enhanced in worth by free political institutions, all that is good on earth is more ready and pleased than England to send up to heaven the gladsome shout "Live and prosper, Italia viva!"

PRINCE ALFRED AT SIERRA LEONE.—The Euryalus, with Prince Alfred on board, reached Sierra Leone on the 11th ult., and at four p.m. the same day the Royal Highness landed amidst the firing of salutes. The landing was set on the landing-wharf by the Governor of the colony, the members of the Council, the clergy of all denominations, the officers of the garrison, &c., the troops forming a guard of honour. The whole way from the wharf to the Government House was lined with the militia of the town and suburbs, who, to the number of 1000, dressed in white surplices, sang the National Anthem as the Prince passed on the way. The streets through which the Royal Highness was conveyed was a small paper phrases, driven by the Governor. On arriving at the Government House the Prince was introduced to the Council, when the Hon. Chief Justice Oliver read an address, to which the Prince returned a suitable reply. Twenty-three liveried Africans of the colony and their descendants presented an address thanking the Prince, and, through him, the Queen, for the deep interest taken by England in the suppression of the slave trade. A box containing £100 of native gold was next offered to the Prince, but the Royal Highness declined accepting more than one ring as a souvenir of his visit to Sierra Leone. During his stay at the Government House as few as twenty-four Kings and Princes were presented to his Royal Highness. After a cold collation, the Prince embarked on board the Euryalus, and left Sierra Leone the same night.

The King of Siam has declared war against the Emperor of ANNAM, who is now at war with France and Spain.

FRANCE.

The Empress went to the Church of Recil, near St. Germain, yesterday week, to be present at a mass performed for the repose of the soul of her late sister, the Duchess d'Alhe. The Presse of Wednesday announces that the Prince of Wales is journeying for Scotland in strict incognito, and that her Majesty will pass some weeks at the seat of the Duchess of Hamilton. Her Grace, it may be as well to state, is a Princess of Baden, and a cousin of the Emperor of Russia.

Plans for an Imperial villa at Nice, on the spot now occupied by the Casaretta, have been laid before the Emperor and received his approbation. It is said to be their Majesties' intention to spend some time every year in their neighbourhood property.

The French Minister of War has ordered all soldiers forming part of the dépôts, regiments, and battalions stationed in Rome to go out marksmen, and the Loyola Rifle-ing daily crowded with detachments en route. General de Goyon has asked for an additional regiment of cavalry.

The Minister of Marine is reported to have finally given orders for the formation of the kingdom of Siam. The new squadron will, it is said, be ready to put to sea by next spring.

General Lamoricière has arrived in Paris. A sort of demonstration was got up for him at the railway station, and the Legitimist newspapers inform us that half the Faubourg St. Germain went to inscribe their names at the hotel of the Count de Castellbajac, and not Ancona." The Ami de la Religion of Sunday publishes the General's report, divided into three chapters, under extreme obligation to the Pope.

A serious accident has occurred on the Southern Railway, between Toulouse and Bordeaux. An excursion train dashed on into a third-class train at the Villedaigne station, and killed two passengers, while several others were injured.

There have been floods in the department of the Herault, owing to very heavy rains. All the country between Narbonne and Cette was under water.

ITALY.

THE TWO SICILIES.

Garibaldi having conquered a kingdom makes a present of it to Victor Emmanuel, and withdraws to his little island of Caprera. On the accession of Victor Emmanuel, Garibaldi, accompanied by the Ministry, formally presented to the King the result of the plebiscite. His Majesty received them in the Throne Room. The Minister Signor Conforti addressed the King in the following terms:—"The Governors people, assembled in their electoral comitia, have proclaimed you King by an immense majority. Italians are now united from the Alps to the sea, and the other provinces which your Majesty governs with so much wisdom, glorifying your name, will be the faithful belt of gold to the Italian." The King replied in a few expressive words. The deed of annexation was then drawn up, the Dictatorship ceased, and the Ministry resigned. The enthusiasm was indescribable.

The ex-Dictator, in his farewell proclamation, tells his companions in arms to be ready to march again, as it is hoped that a fresh conflict will break out in Italy in March, 1861. Garibaldi says that one million of men will march with him.

Garibaldi took leave of his Majesty yesterday week, overwhelmed with the most touching demonstrations of sympathy from the King, his staff officers, and the army in general.

King Victor Emmanuel has published the following proclamation :—

TO THE POPULATIONS OF THE SOUTHERN PROVINCES.

Universal suffrage gives me the sovereign power over these noble provinces. I accept this solemn decree of the nation, and I will govern in accordance to it. I reign, but from the conscientious of being an Italian. My duties increase with those of all Italy. Your votes, which I accept with a serious sense of my extreme obligation have become necessary. All parties must bow with devotedness before the majority of Italy, which has spoken. Here we have established a Government guaranteeing a life of freedom to the people, and strict honesty of purpose as the rule of my conduct. I rely upon the efficacious and patriotic concurrence of all honest men. Wherever the law imposes a curb on power and secures liberty, the Government is strong and respected. Such is the principle for virtue. We must prove to Europe that, if the irresistible force of events has given us powerful provinces, we know how to govern them. Let us all unite to restore among the united nation the empire of those immutable principles which constitute the reason in the world, and every malevolent hope in the opposition is annihilate. VICTOR EMMANUEL.

The Turin Diritto says that the Ministry has received a telegram from the Government of the Two Sicilies. Farini for Naples, and Montezemolo for Palermo, are to be the Lieutenant-Governors. Governor-General of their respective kingdoms. Till the convocation of the great Italian Parliament in January they will exercise full dictatorial powers. Gualterio, Peruzzi, De Sanctis, Giuseppe Massari, and Count Cordova goes out as Minister for the Finances in Sicily; La Farina as Minister Minister of Public Instruction. Signor Scarabelli, Chief Police Father Lanza is appointed Minister of Public Instruction.

Last Saturday the Neapolitan Legion embarked with the volunteers and distributed relief. General La Marmora has been intrusted with the military organisation. It is said that 20,000 of the National Guards are to be disbanded.

We learn from Naples on Tuesday that a Lieutenancy Council has been instituted, and that it will follow—Liberal Administration; Pisanelli, Justice; Scialoja, Finance; Poerio, Public Instruction; Bertolini, Foreign Affairs; Torre, Agriculture and Commerce. Signor Delahais has been appointed Prefect of Police. Admiral Persano has been intrusted with the management of the affairs of the Marine. The Neapolitan fleet is now at Gaeta, preparatory to sail for Naples. A General Council has been established for the organisation of the Southern provinces.

Whilst Victor Emmanuel, by the force of arms and by the free choice of the people, has added to his crown the fair land of Naples (the ex-King) thereof, Francis II., still holds out at Gaeta. By the latest accounts the unfortunate but obstinate republican all advice to give up the contest; and relying upon General Bosco, whom he appointed on Tuesday, and an army of 10,000 men which he yet has, means to protract the struggle. Francis II. is moreover said that a Russian diplomatist has arrived at Gaeta on a mission. A Portuguese and two Spanish frigates lie off Gaeta.

The ex-Royal Family of Naples now at Gaeta consists of the King, Francis II., born at Naples, in 1836, and ascended the throne May 22, 1859; the Queen, born October 4, 1841, daughter of the Archduke Joseph of Bavaria, and sister of the Empress of Austria of five children—the Count of Trani, born August 3, 1838; the Count of Caserta, March 28, 1841; Count de Girgenti, January 12, 1846; Count de Bari, March 26, 1852; and Count de Lecce, March 22, 1855; born May 28, 1857; also of four sisters of his Majesty—the Princess Mary, born 1843, the Princess Rosa Clementina, April 14, 1844; Princess Maria Pia, August 8, 1849; and the Princess Maria Annunziata, born January 21, 1855. The Queen Dowager is also with the King at Gaeta.

THE PAPAL STATES.

The Downger Queen Christina of Spain has arrived in Rome, and has taken up her residence provisionally at the Spanish Embassy, her own palace being undergoing extensive alterations.

The official result of the voting in the late Papal territories gives an overwhelming majority in favour of annexation to Sardinia, it being as follows—In the Marches, of 135,355 voters on the list, there were 135,178 votes; that is, 99 noes, 269 annulled; whilst in Umbria, out of 97,625 voters, 97,040 voted yes, 380 no, and 205 were annulled. The publication of these results was celebrated at Ancona and Perugia by public rejoicings.

AUSTRIA.

The Government, pursuing its lately-adopted liberal course, has issued a statute according a provincial representation to the Tyrol. An Imperial resolution also relieves the press by removing all warnings and fines for offences of the press, and by limiting confiscation to the publication of which the offence has been committed. Baron Bach has been definitively appointed Field Marshal and Minister of War. A Vienna telegram says that the Government, in order to prevent any political demonstrations, has resolved to forbid masquerades and balls at Venice during the Carnival.

PRUSSIA.

"The Prince Regent," says a Berlin letter, "has approved and signed the new regulations of the Landwehr, which will come into operation on the 1st of January next."

The Berlin Royal Academy of Arts elected the Princess Frederick William an honorary member as a full meeting a short time since. Her Royal Highness has accepted the election, and communicated her decision to the Academy in the following letter :—

I have received with thanks and sincere joy the intimation from the Royal Academy of Arts in Berlin that they have elected me an honorary member of their body. In this choice I see the acknowledgment of the value of my earnest efforts for art, which I have cherished from my youth. In order to prove this sentiment, I willingly accept, after having obtained the approbation of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, the election which has fallen upon me, since it brings me into closer connection with a corporation which possesses an important an influence over the cultivation and development of art in our fatherland.—VICTORIA, Princess Frederick William of Prussia, Princess Royal of Great Britain and Ireland. Berlin, Oct. 29, 1860.

OPENING OF THE BELGIUM CHAMBERS.

The Session of the Belgium Chambers was opened at Brussels on the 13th inst. Contrary to expectation, there was no Royal speech. The Minister of the Interior read a letter from the King, in which his Majesty expressed his regret that he could not attend, owing to a severe cold.

UNITED STATES.

Lord Lyons had returned to Washington. He states that the Prince of Wales was highly delighted with his trip to the United States, nothing having occurred during his entire journey to mar for one moment its pleasure.

The 29th of November had been appointed a general thanksgiving day for the United States Government and Congress.

It is expected that the census just taken of the United States will show a population of 31,500,000, including 4,000,000 slaves.

The American journals publish the letter in which the Secretary of War at Washington finally expresses the opinion of the Cabinet respecting General Scott's conduct concerning the affair of Captain Jean. After a full consideration of General Harney's explanations, Mr. Secretary Floyd observes that "he expresses his disapproval of General Harney's order to Captain Pickel, "in violation of the order of General Scott and of the agreement between the two Governments respecting the island of San Juan, which was duly communicated by disastrous consequences." But, in consideration of General Harney's good intentions, and long public services, Mr. Floyd "is not disposed to be severe in his condemnation."

The Washington American Government regarding the Lizzy Thomson, Georgiana, Tartora, and Santonia claims, have been rejected by the Commissioners appointed.

Difficulties have arisen at Panama between the United States and the British naval force, owing to the arrest of an American officer and a citizen who refused to respond to the challenge of the British guard stationed in the streets.

INDIA.

Lord Canning has made arrangements for leaving Calcutta on the 15th of December, and sailing up the Gogra to Pyrahad, to decide as to its navigation, and subsequently to proceed to Lucknow to the new Talookdar magistrate system. Returning to Benares, the Governor-General will proceed to establish his camp at Allahabad in December. Thence he will make flying visits to the chiefs of Central India and to Scindia. Lord Canning is expected to reach Bombay, where the usual term of office of five years will have expired. The belief is general that he will be succeeded by Lord Elgin, though it is understood that Lord Elgin is not very anxious to quit Canada, where he is working smoothly, he may remain another hot season in India.

Sir Hugh Rose has been appointed to the operations on the East Indian Railway to Rajmahal with Lord Canning and Mr. Grant, on the 15th, will sail up the Ganges to Dinapore from the first of his cold-weather camps of instruction at Cawnpore.

Since the 15th the Government manifesto two volunteer rifle corps have been formed in Calcutta. Two corps had previously existed in Lahore have been amalgamated into a corps, and clubs are being organised in Allahabad, Agra, Delhi.

AUSTRALIA.

We have received papers from Melbourne to Sept. 27. Everything was quiet in the political world. The Ministerial crisis, the dead-lock between the Council and Assembly, and the Chinese question had ceased, and all been surmounted. The Parliamentary Session had been opened on the 25th of July. The Speech of September 4 had been took place in the usual form. The Royal assent was given to the Land Bill and to a few minor bills. A bill to abolish pensions to retiring Ministers of the Crown, and the Legislative Council, has been reserved for her Majesty's decision. A serious political riot occurred on the 22nd of July, at the close of the Parliamentary day, which, evidently conceived by previous concert, assembled round the House, and began hooting and pelting the members as they left, and when the House temporarily adjourned the police had considerable difficulty in protecting the Ministers. By this time the assembled the hooting increased, and a fierce contest ensued between the police and the mob, stones being thrown on the one side, and staves being freely used on the other. Many persons were wounded in clearing the streets, but in the affray eight of them were much injured by other than regular members of the force, and generally were insulted or maltreated by the mob during the evening. Legislation on the Chinese question had been postponed for the prevention of any fresh attempt to renew the riot and overawe the Parliament; and a bill was passed for the purpose of providing for the further suppression of Chinese immigration. The discovery of gold—of a light-blue colour, have recently been brought to light. Every day fresh finds occur, and Australia will be found to be full of precious stones as well as in gold. A new gold field of some promise has been discovered at Mount Ida, in Victoria, and by one of the exploring parties sent out by Government. The exploration party have crossed the Murray, and are now pushing rapidly on for Cooper's Creek, where a depot will be established, and whence, if the country continues favourable, a start across the desert will be made.

The following intelligence from South Australia to the 25th of September. The South Australian Register of that date has the following:—"Rain has fallen in most districts, but not in sufficient quantity to benefit the weather is again becoming dry. The crops are generally looking well. Haymaking is in progress. Parliament is still sitting. A bill for regulating the formation of auxiliary rifle companies has been passed by both Houses. The Assembly has passed an address to the Governor, praying that the bill for tithes, and that for, &c., in proportion. Major Warburton has started upon an expedition to explore the country between Streaky Bay and the boundary of Western Australia.

NEW ZEALAND.

The Tasmanian Government has voted a sum of £2000 for renewing the experiment to introduce salmon ova and to provide proper breeding establishments for the encouragement of the rivers of the Land. The management of the experiment is to be left to the Australian Association in London.

NEW ZEALAND.

The war in New Zealand is now very slowly. Accounts from New Zealand state that a body of 14,000 soldiers, militia and volunteers, had marched and destroyed all the villages and fields on their way, it seem, however, to have been evae sated by their defenders. A skirmish ensued with a party of natives who had had an ambush in the forest, and General Pratt sent 200 men to pursue the Maories into the bush, and subsequently returned to the town. One or two English soldiers are said to have been left on the field; and the natives complain that the abandonment of the dead will cause the natives to claim a victory. Provisions are very cheap. The numbers of the rebels do not seem to be increasing, and there are as yet no tokens of a general insurrection of the Maori population.

The revolution in Bolivia has been suspended. Several officers were took part in the affair.

A telegram from Lisbon reports the loss of her Majesty's troop-ship Perseverance, which calamity took place off Cape Verde. All the troops and crew were saved.

The Peruvian frigate San Lorenzo was destroyed at Callao while being dirked. The stanchions of the dock gave way, and the Lorenzo immediately filled and sank. It was believed that one hundred and fifty persons perished.

On the recommendation of the French Minister of Public Works the railway companies are considering the practicability of giving second and third class passengers the comfort of lavatories, which have hitherto only been the privilege of first-class carriages. The French are the first to adopt the new railway system, and will shortly add to a train of 60 on the line from Paris to Monsieron.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams were received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday) :—

THE TWO SICILIES.—Naples, Thursday.—The 61st Regiment of the 10th instant, the Bourbon troops in the Abruzzi and Piedmontese have occupied fresh positions round the town. The garrison of Gaeta numbers less than 10,000 men.

THE WEST INDIA MAIL.—Southampton, Thursday.—The Royal mail steamship La Plata, Captain Weller, with the above mail for Jamaica, &c., left Southampton yesterday (Thursday) with specie, chiefly gold, and 500 packages of cargo. Her Majesty's ship Buccaneer had arrived at Jamaica with two slave brigs, captured off the coast of Cuba. A considerable quantity of troops had arrived at Portland, besides large quantities of provisions.

The colonelcy of the 10th Light Dragoons has become vacant through the death of Major-General Henry Lygon, C.B. The gallant officer expired on Sunday night, at his residence in Upper Brook street, Grosvenor square, after a lingering illness, which had confined him to bed on Saturday last.

The funeral of Admiral Sir Charles Napier took place on Monday at Catherington, near Merchistoun Hall, Hants. Beyond the fact of his decease there is little to be said of the deceased Admiral, who never held any command during the greater part of his professional career, the whole proceedings were of a very private and unostentatious character.

An obelisk erected in the Lancaster Cemetery, to perpetuate the memory of the soldiers belonging to that town who fell during the siege of Delhi, was unveiled on Saturday last. The names of the dead in the shape in Lancaster were closed during the proceedings; and a procession took place from the Assembly-rooms to the cemetery, in which the members of the naval and military services were represented. Both the members for the borough were present at the ceremony.

A LITERARY ARTISAN.—Knell, one of the artisans employed in the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, has produced an exceedingly commendable work, under the title of "Chips from the Block," which is a collection of poems, chiefly descriptive of the scenes of his daily life. Colonel Tulloh having forwarded a copy of the work to the Palace, her Majesty has been graciously pleased to signify her approval of his praiseworthy occupation of his time." Sir Benjamin Hawes has also presented Knell with a number of his own "Parliamentary Pictures."

A SAILORS' MONUMENT TO SIR CHARLES NAPIER.—The Admiral's Column, which is to be erected under the walls of Scarborough Castle, which is to extend throughout the Navy, for the purpose of creating a testimonial to the memory of Admiral Sir Charles Napier. The idea originated on board the Excellent and the Cambridge, the gunnery-ships at Portsmouth, and has since been warmly taken up by the other vessels in port, and has since been warmly taken up by the other vessels in port, under the sanction of the Commander-in-Chief.

COST OF THE ARMSTRONG GUNS.—It having been stated in the Mechanic's Magazine that every Armstrong gun hitherto manufactured had cost the country £1,000, Sir William Armstrong, in a letter to the Times, corrects this astounding estimate, and asserts that his 12-pounder cost £150, and the 40-pounder £300, and that the cost of each of the old 12-pounder brass guns, the cost of which is £178." Sir William Armstrong has also published a pamphlet containing full working descriptions of his cannon have been surmounted, and that no impediment whatever has been found in their manufacture.

PRESENTATION BY HER MAJESTY OF VICTORIA CROSSES.—Yesterday week, being the anniversary of the Queen's birthday, the undermentioned Victoria Crosses to the following individuals :—Mr. William Fraser McDonell, Bengal Civil Service, commanding at Shahgunge, Oude, during the mutinies in the 38th of July, 1857; Major Charles Crawford Fraser, His Hussars (now 11th Hussars), Lieutenant and Adjutant Henry Moriarty on the 16th August, 1851; Captain (now Major) George Alexander Renaud, Bengal Horse Artillery, for having with his troop of cavalry rescued to the top of the wall of the magazine at Delhi on the 16th of September, 1857; Lieutenant (now Captain) Aylmer Gustavus Hayter, 60th Rifles, now of the 86th Regiment, for having on various occasions displayed great bravery on the 30th of March, 1858, at Kotah; Lieutenant John Miller, Bengal Artillery, for having on the 14th of September, 1857, displayed in extreme danger on the 5th of February, 1857; Surgeon Joseph Jee, C.B., Bengal Army, for having volunteered to attend the wounded officers on the entry of the late Major-General Havelock's relieving force into Lucknow, in September, 1857; Lieutenant (now Captain) Thomas Henry Wynne, 86th Regt., for conspicuous bravery on the 14th and 15th of September, 1857, at Delhi; Lieutenant (now Captain) Alexander Rose, 42nd Highlanders, for having on a gallant conduct before Delhi on the 23rd of June, 1857; Colour-Sergeant George Pearson, 75th Regiment, for having on the same occasion, through on the 16th of November, 1857, in rescuing a wounded officer of the same corps, who had fallen into a ditch, from the enemy's fire; Private John Sullivan, late 42nd Regiment, for gallant conduct on the 2nd of January, 1858, at Sultanpore, in rescuing Private Thomas Reynolds, of the same corps; Private James Thompson, 1st battalion 60th Rifles, for gallant conduct in the trenches before Delhi, on the 14th of September, 1857; Private John Sullivan, late 42nd Regiment, for distinguished gallantry in leading a successful charge against a party of the enemy's troops on one of the enemy's trenches before Delhi, on the 19th of September, 1857.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

The 2nd Artillery Corps has been recently engaged in shot and shell practice on the Tilbury Fort Range, on the Thames.

The new battery erected for the use of the Faversham Artillery Corps, at a cost of £400, was opened for practice on Wednesday last, in a field by the place. Lord Sondes has contributed £100 to the fund.

The 2nd Kent Rifle Volunteers, consisting of Cambridgeshire, reviewed the 6th Cambridgeshire or Ely Rifle Volunteers on Wednesday last, in a large field at Ely, by permission.

The 3rd Sussex Artillery was inspected on Monday by Captain Darby, who had a high opinion of the efficiency of the corps, and of the skill of the gunners.

The number of volunteers at the review in Chatsworth Park on the 24th ult. was about 1200; and there were, says a correspondent, 40,000 persons present on the occasion.

Last Saturday the men forming the 3rd Bucks Corps underwent their annual inspection by Captain Hamilton, R.N., assisted by Sergeant-Major Hemmingscience.

At the inspection of the 47th Lancashire Rifle Volunteers, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Gamble, and the distribution of prizes won in the late shooting matches, which took place at Preston, upwards of 300 on Saturday last at the cricket-field in St. Helen's.

Mr. John Fenton has been appointed to command the members of the 19th Mid. Devon Regiment of Yeomanry Cavalry, now in course of formation. The men will be mounted principally on their own horses, and will be clothed in a uniform of dark green, with black facings, and a silver lace.

Mr. Sidney Herbert declines to sanction the proposed Easter review of the Volunteers in Hyde Park, on the ground that the Easter holidays are the only recreation of the Volunteers can be easily spared from their business or avocations, or artisans, or even of Parr, or any other separate class.

The 3rd Somerset Rifles held a grand shooting-match on Tuesday at Orchard Portman. On the return of the party to Taunton, Mrs. Sanford, wife of the Captain of the corps, presented the prizes to the successful competitors, in the presence of a large concourse of spectators, on the parade.

The West Middlesex Corps was inspected in Hyde Park by Colonel M'Murdo last Saturday, and the movements of the battalion were performed. Lord Rockland was highly complimented on the bearing and efficiency of the corps under his command.

The members for King's Lynn—Lord Stanley and Mr. J. H. Gurney—having offered three cups for competitions among the volunteers of the town, a contest took place in the course of last week. The value of the first cup was £30; the second, £10; and the third, £5; and the successful competitors were Private Agger, Private Lee, and Private Bird.

The 3rd Middlesex or Hampstead Rifles held a shooting-match last Saturday morning at their range at Child's Hill, Hampstead. The first prize, a Whitworth rifle, given by Joseph Hoare, Esq., was won by Private Downs. A silver challenge medal, to become the property of any man holding it for two years successively, was won by Mr. Alexander Fell.

The prizes won at the late Liverpool rifle-meeting were distributed on Monday evening at the St. George's Hall, Liverpool, after the distribution of which was a ball. The winner of the third prize, given by members of the Liverpool Rifle Club, was Mr. W. Williamson, Captain of the (kidgrove) 13th Staffordshire Rifles.

Yesterday week a shooting-match took place between the Civil Service and Scottish Volunteer Rifles come off on Wimbledon-common. The prizes given by Lieutenant Mayne of the Civil Service company, consisted of a silver cup and a tankard to the unsuccessful competitors. Professor Masson won the first prize—a cup, and Lord Elcho the second prize; Lieutenant Mayne gained the second prize, after a very exciting tie with Mr. Cormack—a plain silver cup; Mr. Cormack, the third prize—a silver cup, of the same elegant shape. The tankard for the unsuccessful competitors was awarded to Mr. Lieutenant Mayne.

The South Middlesex Corps have been presented with the perpetual use of a magnificent piece of ground for rifle practice, at Wimbledon-common, to a clear range of 2000 yards; and a lease has been taken of the Caterham Hotel on behalf of the corps, which will be used as a residence for the officers and men of the corps. The funds of the corps are free from any embarrassment, the present subscription list amounting to £1000 in addition to the grant.

On Wednesday evening the ceremony of presenting the prizes awarded to the two battalions of the Marquess of Huntly's Aberdeenshire Rifle Volunteer Militia Rifle Corps, took place at Carlton Ride, Waterloo-place. Mrs. John Hadden, late Captain of the Aberdeen company, presented the prize consisting of a handsome challenge cup, value thirty guineas, which had been offered for competition by the officers. The Colonel's Challenge Shield, value £20, was received, as the second prize, from the hands of the same lady, a gold chasm of the same value as the first prize.

Lieut. Gardner's prize, a silver cup, was won by Private Hutchins; fourth prize, a field-glass, Lieut. Bell; fifth prize, a

LITERATURE.

The Wife and Beaux of Society. By Grace and Philip Wharton. James Hogg and Sons.

The authors of "The Queens of Society" have, on the whole, a right to claim a success for that work. The title was taking, the idea novel, and the mode in which it was carried out, though open to some objections, was not sufficiently faulty to militate against the general merits of the book. Encouraged by the reception of their previous work, they have adventured on another and a somewhat perilous task. It is true, in a certain sense, that the biography of a number of remarkable women who have figured prominently in society, either for their beauty, their talents, their virtues, or their want of virtue, may have pioneered the way for the wits and beaux with whom, during the holiday-time of their reign, the ladies were much associated. We agree that such women, whether all wits or not, must have been the cause of wit in others; that their influence over daughter, wife, or friend, and their power to make or mar a man of fashion supreme. So far a chronicle of the sayings and doings of the wits is an integral "pendant" to that of "The Queens of Society." In the selection of the subjects for biographical notice in the present work good judgment has been exhibited. Still more attention has been paid to chronological order in the placing of the narratives, although some anomalies still exist in this respect, as, for instance, the memoir of Bolingbroke—who was essentially of the last, and almost of the two last, centuries (he was born in 1691)—is the concluding one of the two volumes, and follows immediately after that of the Rev. Sydney Smith. The series commences with George Villiers, second Duke of Buckingham, and includes among others De Grammont, St. Evremont, Rochester, Beau Fielding, Congreve, Beau Nash, the Duke of Wharton, Lord Hervey, Chesterfield, Scarron, Rochefoucault, St. Simon, Horace Walpole, George Selwyn, Sheridan, Brummell, Theodore Hook, &c. It is not to be presumed that any extraordinary pretensions to novelty are made in the contents of these volumes. They do not assert any claim to original information, or to any specimens of biophical or anecdotical. The work is simply a compilation, and its merits turn on the mode in which it is executed. As regards the mere elements of facts, they are so put together that the narrative author wants smoothness, but the salient points are, on the whole, brought out with sufficient appropriation. To the style we must venture to take considerable exception. We do not pretend to be able to discriminate between the contributions of the lady and the gentleman to the work; but we sincerely hope that some of the phraseology is the property of the author of the rougher sex. It is surely, too, a sin against good taste to have selected such a theme for illustration as that which is appended to the memoir of Sydney Smith. If it be a fact—which we can hardly think—that such a tableau was ever exhibited in the dining-room of a clergyman, it would have been only charitable not to have reproduced it in an engraving. For very obvious reasons it is probable that "The Wife and Beaux" will not be so acceptable to the reading public as "The Queens of Society;" but, with such qualifications as we have indicated, we can recommend it as both amusing and instructive, as biography always must be to a certain extent.

Chronicles of the Crutch. By Blanchard Jerrold. Tinsley.

Under this very quaint title Mr. Blanchard Jerrold asks the suffrages of the public for a pleasant little volume, which consists mainly of tales or essays contributed to Household Words, to which some additions have been made of matter which has not hitherto been printed. The plan of weaving together a series of unconnected narratives by the creation of a set of imaginary storytellers has been very prevalent of late, arising naturally out of the custom of reproducing fugitive contributions to periodicals, in a collected form. There is an innate awkwardness, not to say clumsiness, in this sort of thing, which it is not very easy to overcome, but we venture to think that Mr. Jerrold has managed his connecting matter very skilfully. The quaint, sleepy, gossip, whatever it is, that goes to make up a very various collection of papers, are put into the mouth of certain "Brethren of the Crutch," that is, a society of retired men of the world who are members of an institution which may be the Charterhouse, or the Hospital of St. Cross, or the Lettered College at Warwick, or any of those genteel almshouses in which honest but unfortunate men who have failed in battling with themselves in life find a refuge. The different characters here given, brought together, afford necessarily mere sketches, shadowy in themselves, and speaking meanly through their contributions to the evening's compilation, are still quite distinct and possess each his own individuality. The stories, to use a generic term for the papers which are supposed to be read by "Brethren," are numerous, and bear about them considerable originality of idea and a pungency of style which, if sometimes peculiar, is very agreeable. As a good many of the papers relate to France and French matters, Mr. Jerrold has ingeniously introduced a brother with a Gallicised name, and whose country has given him much knowledge of the Continent. This Mr. Lebord certainly carries off the palm as a narrator, whether as regards the number or merit of his contributions. The insight which is given into the life of the French soldier, both when he is on active service and in the barrack, is considerable. That the secession of narratives is so rapid, and the subjects so various that to give any idea of them it would be necessary to enter on a long catalogue. We may especial mention of "The Story of Passaguerre," "Heroes Gaming," which is a description of the entry of the French Army of Italy into Paris last year; and "The Conversation made at Sea by a Landlubber," the subject being sea-sickness and its remedies—a specimen of which description and comic powers of the writer, we must conclude our brief notice of the book by saying that the work which it contains is every way worthy of the effort made to rescue it from the dull oblivion attendant on bookish authorship.

La Cava; or, Recollections of the Neapolitans. Saunders and Otley.

The author of this work—a lady—states that very few persons who are resident in the kingdom of Naples think Cava worth a visit; those who are in search of a "villeggiatura" usually preferring Castellamare or Sorrento. It may probably be worth remarking that Cava now conveys passengers from Naples through Torre del Annunziata, by Pompeii, Salerno, Angri, and Nocera, and that the latter to Cava, a town with dark, narrow streets, rendered more gloomy by arcades on each side, which give it a great air of antiquity, though in truth it dates no further back than the eleventh or twelfth century—some writers descending to the site of the town in a plain traversed by the Via Nocerina, others as a forest. It was afterwards included among the possessions of the distinguished family of the Scannesanti; and in 1294 was named and declared a bishopric by Pope Boniface IX., though it was not completed before the sixteenth century. A historian of Cava states that the present district to which it belongs was formerly called Marcina, including Vietri, the capital, Citara, and Nocera. This name endured until the middle of the fifth century, when it became a prey to war and devastation in the year 455. The second epoch lasted till the eleventh century, when it was divided into the three districts of Metellano, Vietri, and Molendino. The third epoch extends from the eleventh century until the present day, when it is subdivided into four quarters, bearing the names of Metellino, St. Adjutore, Corpo di Cava, and Pascione, the whole being known as the Città della Cava. The town is picturesquely situated; the mountains form a solemn amphitheatre around, sprinkled with pretty villages, and in the midst, in a tiny spot in the centre; to the south the hills open and disclose the houses and domes of Vietri, with a blue streak of water, beyond, dancing and glittering in the sunbeams—the glorious Gulf of Salerno. The town, which is entered by a bridge of seven arches, has one long principal street, very narrow in some parts, but containing tolerable shops and good houses. The churches are numerous, the monasteries and convents alone amounting to eight. The ecclesiastical records are described by the author in a pretty much those of all Italian towns. We have gone somewhat into detail with regard to the place because we believe it is very little known to the visitors or temporary residents in Naples. The volume before us is well calculated to do away with this ignorance of a pleasant retreat from the heat, dust, and odours of Naples, for those who are content to forego fashion and society, to attire themselves in plain cottons, instead of costlier garments, and who do really appreciate the beauties of green lanes, shady woods, wild mountain paths, and beautiful views over hill and dale and boundless sea. There is a merit in the book apart from descriptions of scenery which are just numerous enough to be interesting, and no more. The gist of it is to be found in the easy but essentially graphic sketches of Italian life and manners, both in the provincial town and the rural districts proper. A priest and a peasant-girl, a beggar and a shopkeeper, are sketched with equal point and palpable fidelity. The pictures of the inner life and personal habits of the people which are scattered thickly through the volume do up so naturally as to remind one of a narrative which does not pretend to be more than a series of jottings of daily occurrences which were interesting from their peculiar nationality to an English observer, that every page reads like well-poised and graceful conversation. Then there are legends and tales connected with different localities which were visited by the author and her friends, which, if nothing very remarkable or striking in themselves (they all bear the regular features of ordinary Italian romance), yet have a certain appropriateness, and at least come down when we will not call the monotony but the perpetual flow of the narrative of things which, though common in relation to the place to which they belong, are comparatively novel, and so interesting to those who are not to the manner born. On this whole, this is a very pleasant book, and, if it does not rise beyond its exact purpose and objects, it is quite equal to and never descends from the level of its pretensions.

Recollections of the Drubs of the Lebanon. With Notes on Druse Religion. By the Rev. Isaac Nelson Cabnavon. Murray.

No doubt that recent events in the Lebanon are likely to suggest, and certainly justify, the publication of any knowledge of the Druse people which themselves in that country have acquired. Lord Carnarvon, therefore, contributes in the volume before us the result of his personal recollections of the people and the country, and the general impression which they severally made on his mind during a short visit to the Lebanon. In the observations which he has made on the Druse religion he makes no pretensions to a description of that strange creed. They are only notes; and in them he has sought to suggest, and to indicate rather than to explain, to him to deserving inquiry rather than to undertake the investigation himself. Bearing this acknowledged characteristic of the work in mind, it will probably be admitted that in the brief space to which he has confined himself the author has done a good deal towards the object which he had in view.

Pictorial Sunday Readings. Edited by the Rev. William Owen. Sangster and Co.

We have before us two parts of a set of Sunday Readings, comprising a complete series of Scripture subjects, lucidly, fully, and yet concisely treated, with special adaptation to the tastes and requirements of families, and forming a comprehensive, instructive, and valuable repertory of biblical knowledge. The work is adorned by numerous well-chosen illustrations beautifully engraved in colours. The appearance of each part is rich and elegant, every care having been bestowed on the ornamentation and general getting up of the work.

The Sanitary Condition and Discipline of Indian Gaols. By Joseph Ewart, M.D., &c. Smith, Elder, and Co.

Dr. Ewart's book treats of a subject upon which we cannot be expected to venture an opinion. He certainly makes out a case for the consideration of those in authority, and fully points out the defective condition of our Indian prisons, both sanitary and hygienic, and offer suggestions for their amendment. The existing system must certainly prove very defective, for, whilst it confers an initiatory or recommendatory power upon the medical officer, it rests all real executive or directorial power in a civil officer. The actual condition of the gaols fully shows that, in practice, this plan is fatal to successful sanitary discipline, and that some change is imperatively necessary. In chief results, hitherto, have been to cause, as usual when red-tapism rules, the compilation of interminable reports, mountains of correspondence, and an invisible minimum of executive action—always too late. The medical officer, when necessary, or suffered to relapse into a state of passive, inactive indifference when the public interfere merely as prisoners, is the sole of a decimating epidemic or endemic fever or destructive dysentery, may have become diminished, or completely disappeared. We commend Dr. Ewart's book to the notice of the Indian Executive at home.

Flowers, Grapes, and Shrubs. A Popular Book on Botany. By Mary Fitch. Blackwood.

A charming little guide to one of the pleasantest of amusements, and to the study of the flowers of the field. The work is one that may be used by any lady without any previous training in botanical knowledge. Its descriptions are clear, and its general information ample; and, in the beginner, a glossary of botanical terms is added. It has the additional advantage of being cheap, small, elegant in form, and illustrated; designed, as our numerous lady readers will see, with a view of encouraging a love for the useful with the beautiful in the floral kingdom.

Post-Office London Suburban Directory.—Under this title Messrs. Kelly have issued a Directory, which, in form a volume, the plan and arrangement of which, as regards streets, trades, and other valuable features, are the same as those of the well-known and excellent Post-Office London Directory. To this work the Suburban Directory is, in fact, a supplementary one. It commences where the London Directory ceases, and is confined to the boundary of the Metropolitan Postal District; so that the two works form a complete guide to the whole area of the metropolis and a surrounding circle with a twelve-mile radius. A conveyance directory and a large map of the district, in addition, render this work complete.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Boosey's Musical Cabinet. A Collection of Vocal and Pianoforte Music. Boosey and Sons.

Even in the infancy days of musical publication "Boosey's Musical Cabinet" is a marvel of cheapness, the intrinsic value of its matter and the remarkable beauty of its form being taken into account. It is published in shilling books, of which twelve have appeared, at consisting of vocal and six of pianoforte music. The vocal series contains songs with English words (all printed under the music) and pianoforte accompaniments, selected from the best works of Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Meyerbeer, Verdi, Balfe, Hatton, &c. The English translations are by Mr. George Linley, Mr. Desmond Ryan, and Mr. John Oxenford. The series comprises much valuable copyright music, the property of the publishers, and to be had in no other works. The songs of each composer are in one book. The pianoforte series contains dance music and light pianoforte music by popular composers. The dance music is published in a complete form, adapted for dancing; the trios and second parts of the polkas and waltzes being always printed. Each book consists of from forty to fifty pages of music, in large quarto, beautifully printed on the finest paper, in a handsome illustrated cover, suitable for the drawing-room table. To give a further idea of the singular cheapness of this publication we may mention that one of these shilling books contains twenty of the finest songs of Mendelssohn's mother, fourteen songs by Verdi; another, twelve songs by Balfe; another, fifty favourite waltzes; another, fifty polkas and galops—in short, that a single book is an equally ample shilling'sworth of valuable matter. If it proves to add that the contents of the twelve books which have already appeared are also republished in three volumes (the first entitled "The Ball-room Music-book," and containing the dance music; the second entitled "The Twenty-pound Music-book," and containing the pianoforte pieces, nocturnes, fantasias, &c.; and the third entitled "The Ballad-Singer's Book," and containing the vocal music. The work is to be continued, and we promise to be a valuable library of vocal and pianoforte music; and the publishers are well entitled to say that "it surpasses in cheapness anything that has ever appeared."

Christmas. A Cantata. Written by John Oxenford; composed by G. A. Macfarren. Cramer and Co.

This cantata, though published in pianoforte score, has not yet been publicly performed; but it will be well to say that it was produced in the course of the ensuing season. It is a beautiful work, worthy of the distinguished composer of "Robin Hood," to which it has a great affinity in several respects. The poem, as well as that of "Robin Hood," is from the pen of Mr. John Oxenford. The subject, too, is old English, and treated in a genial style, both by the poet and the musician. The cantata, though not intended for the stage, is essentially dramatic, and the music has that peculiar English character which imparts such a charm and has given so much popularity to the operas of Balfe and Wallace, and to the ballads of the old English opera. The subject is a picture of the rustic festivities of Christmas in the olden time, when all country people are assembled to spend their Christmas together and pass the evening with the song, the chorus, the cup, the dance, the game, and other pastimes of that jocund season. Mr. Oxenford's poetry has afforded ample scope for the genius of the composer. The music is full of the English melody, rich in choral effects, and glowing from beginning to end with fire and animation.

The poem being, as yet, new to the public, we are tempted to quote the conclusion as a specimen :—

Welcome all! welcome all!
The feast is spread in the vaulted hall.

Here of dishes stands the chief—
Baron bold of England beef;
There the noble peacock's wore—
Bears the lemon in his jaw.
Geese and capons, turkey, chine,
Scatter odours most divine.
Stately now the pudding comes,
World of citrons and of plums,
Brought from the Spanish Main and
As the gem of all the feast.

Welcome all! welcome all!
The feast is spread in the vaulted hall.

The gen'rous wassail-bowl
With kindness warms the soul.
We quaff it to friends, we quaff it to foes,
At Christmas no heart animosity knows.

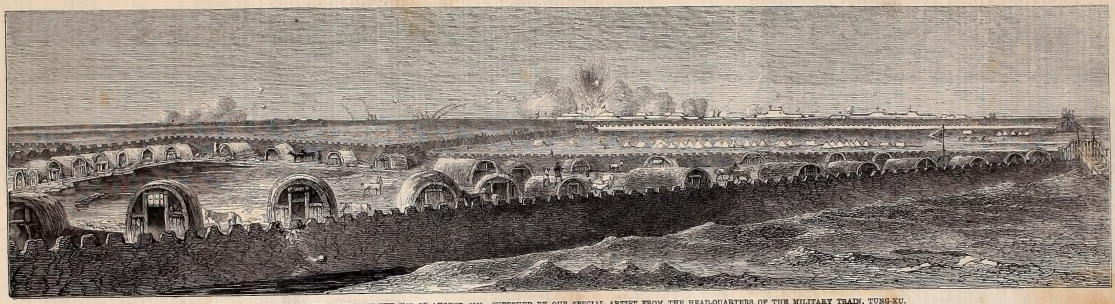
Nay, be captions, gentle maid,
As you pass that hanging bough,
With the berries within it laid—
For there's one bee made a vow

That these lips he will invade,
And he'll keep it I'm afraid.



Ne'er perish the law of the mistletoe,
Which gives birth to the sentiments so glow.

OPENING CHORUS.

Varied pastime the evening cloys,
Dancers form in busy rows;
Blockwell's fiddle is out of tune,
Hope to find the right one out,
And when they find it they'll play at the shout!
Round go the clicking flame of blue
Dashes still as on autumn eves;
Damsels rich the bold invite,
While from the fire the timid shrink with fright.

Welcome all! welcome all!
'Tis merry now in the vaulted hall.

The mistletoe is over head,
The holly flaunts its berries red,
The wassail-bowl goes gaily round,
Our mirth awakes the echoes round;
All are merry-bright, all sing and play!—
Thus ends our Christmas Day.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1860.

APART from the satisfaction which must be generally felt at the conduct pursued by our negotiators in China, information of which has just reached this country, there is something eminently suggestive in the fact of the march of a European army upon Pekin. It is an actual approach to the solution of a question which has been pending for nearly a quarter of a century, and which has ever and anon arisen in some shape or another. The incidents of modern progress have in a manner forced on the inquiry whether a very large section of the human race, occupying a vast extent of territory, is to continue to exist isolated from the rest of the world, fenced in by a social and governmental system which, while it does not deny the outlet of a portion of a teeming population towards such parts of the globe as affect opportunities for the industry of Chinese emigrants, steadfastly resists the entrance of foreigners to a free communication with the empire of China Proper. As matters have hitherto stood, the relations of that country with Europe were such that they only presented irritations and jealousies on both sides; and it was high time that that mutual intercourse was settled on such a basis as would either place China in the ordinary attitude in which the other nations of the world are placed towards each other, or withdraw her to her pernicious and retire seclusions. It is not in the nature of human affairs that this latter alternative can be adopted. Wherever the standard of European civilisation has been planted it takes root, and the consequences and results of the intercourse which the present age is inconsistent with retrogression; and, in regard to China, the only question has long been as to the time or the mode in which she was to be brought within the vanity of nations.

As it seems to us, England, having gone so far as she has done in the twenty years, has adopted the best but the complete of that which has assumed the dignity of a mission. From the moment that we first seriously entered into hostile collision with the Chinese empire, and brought the force of active and effective operations against the forts and cities, mysterious and exclusive barbarism—using the word as we understand it—it was palpably obvious that the days of that obsolete sovereignty were numbered. Each successive war, although until now only waged on the outer edges of that empire, has visibly shaken its power and prestige in the eyes of the world. Coincident with our attempts at gaining an entrance into that sealed region, a movement has been roused among the Chinese people themselves. From the moment that we showed that the Government of China was powerless to prevent the invasion of its territories, and even punished for its deeds, the principle of unhesitating obedience in the people of China, which has hitherto been as strong as it was consistent, was destroyed, and the strange spectacle of a rebellion in that country was presented to the astonished gaze of its rulers—a rebellion which, as far as soon found that they were unequal to put down, and which has, in fact, become chronic. Thus it has been the destiny of England, directly and indirectly, to break down a governmental fabric which has so long existed for the European world, and to uncover to its own subjects its hollowness and its evils. We have in this matter taken on ourselves a great responsibility; and the moment has arrived when we must accept that responsibility in its fullest and widest sense. The practical occupation of the capital of the Celestial Empire has necessarily brought matters to a climax. Under all the circumstances, it is the wisest, and indeed the only, course which we could consistently take. Unless this country was prepared to undo the work of so many years, and to withdraw from the position which we have taken—a simple impossibility—there was nothing else to be done; and again we can only express our gratification that our Plenipotentiary has so acted as to belie those forebodings and doubts as to his conduct which were caused by the information received previous to the last mail, and which we ourselves amongst others expressed. As we had reason then to blame, so much the greater is our pleasure that we are now enabled to give all praise to Lord Elgin for the course he is now pursuing.

On the subject of the most important domestic bill of the past Session a strong letter from the statesman most interested in the progress of that measure has been read at a Bankruptcy Reform meeting at Manchester. The Attorney-General has followed the severance of the debtor's estate from his estate in utter ignorance of the details of his great Bankruptcy Bill, had hindered its advance, and also upon those who, representing districts that were clamorous for the reform of the present system, neglected to attend and support the bill. Sir Richard Bethell could not understand how it was possible to withdraw the measure out of personal feeling, and states, as it was hardly needful for him to do, that he abandoned it after consultation with his colleagues, and after assurance from the Law Lords that they would not deal with it after a certain date over which the garrulity of the Commons would long have delayed it. The stern reproof of the first law adviser of the Crown may produce benefit when the new edition of the measure, promised by Lord Palmerston, shall come before the House; and it is earnestly to be hoped that it will be accompanied by a clause providing for amending a reform in the present wicked and wasteful system, which plunders debtors and creditors alike, and spreads ruin where well-devised machinery would effect redemption, a set of sciolists, prejudicial persons, and chatterers will not again interfere their imbecilities between our commerce and requisite legislation. Sir Richard Bethell's own labours in the cause are priceless to the country, and have been given by himself at a personal sacrifice which ought to have secured him from such impertinence as that to which he made reference. We trust that, before the first of English lawyers takes a title from his Sovereign, he will have obtained from his countrymen the still higher distinction of cleanser of the Augean stable of bankruptcy.

THE COURT.

The Queen received at ten o'clock on Thursday morning the gratifying intelligence of the safe return of the Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, who had arrived an hour previously in Plymouth Sound, on board her Majesty's ship Ariadne, after a voyage of four days from Cape Race.

The nineteenth anniversary of the birthday of the Prince was celebrated on the 9th inst. at Sandringham, notwithstanding the disappointment at that time felt at the non-arrival of his Royal Highness in England. The usual quarters of the troops were occupied by the garrison of Windsor, including the Windsor Rifle Volunteers, took place in the House Park, and her Majesty awarded several of the occasion to present Victoria Crosses to a number of distinguished soldiers. After the review the Queen, accompanied by Princess Alice, Princess Helena, Princess Louise, Prince Arthur, and Princess Leiningen, walked in the House Park, and visited the Duchess of Kent, who resided with her Majesty at Frogmore. Her Majesty returned at 5 p.m. In the evening his Royal Highness Prince Alfred, who had landed at Plymouth in the morning from the Ariadne, arrived at the Castle, and attended by Captain the Major Cowell, R.E.

On Saturday the Queen, accompanied by Prince Alfred, drove out in an open carriage and visited the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore.

On Sunday the Queen and Prince Consort, Prince Alfred, Prince Arthur, Princess Alice, Princess Helena, and Princess Louise, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended Divine service in the private chapel. The Rev. C. J. Vaughan, Rural Dean preached the sermon.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Prince Alfred, walked in the House Park and visited the Princess of Saxe-Leiningen. The Prince Consort, attended by Major-General the Hon. C. Grey and Colonel the Hon. A. Hardinge, walked in the afternoon at a considerable pace. The Council at the Royal Horticultural Society at South Kensington.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Alice, walked and drove in the House Park. The Prince Consort, accompanied by Prince Alfred and the Heraldric Prince of Holstein-Augustenburg, were out shooting.

On Wednesday the Queen and Prince Consort, accompanied by Princess Alice, walked in the afternoon in the afternoon the Right Rev. the Bishop of Carlisle had an audience of her Majesty, and did homage. The Prince Consort, accompanied by the Right Hon. Sir G. C. Lewis, Secretary of State for the Home Department. The Rev. and Rev. E. Southwell Bowles, Rural Dean, and Rector of Kidlington, preached the sermon.

On Thursday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, walked in the House Park. The Prince of Wales arrived at the Castle at a quarter before seven o'clock in the evening.

The Countess of Caledon has succeeded Lady Macdonald as Lady in Waiting to her Majesty. Lord Harris and Lieutenant-Col Henry Bentinck have succeeded Lord Cremorne and Lieutenant-Colonel F. Cavendish as Lord and Groom in Waiting.

THE EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH.

The Empress of the French, travelling under the strictest incognito, arrived at Paris on Wednesday evening. Her Majesty drove from the London-bridge Railway Station to Claridge's Hotel in a hackney-coach, and so well preserved was the incognito that her visit there was not even known to the authorities of the hotel until late in the evening. Yesterday (Friday) her Majesty visited the Exhibition of the Arts-Unions in Paris, and subsequently paid a visit to the Crystal Palace. The Empress is on her way to Biarritz, where the Duke of Hamilton (Princess Marie of Baden), who is cousin of the Emperor Napoleon III. Her Imperial Majesty is attended by a suite of the ladies and gentlemen.

ARRIVAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales arrived at Windsor Castle at a quarter before seven o'clock on Thursday evening. The Royal standard, consisting of the Royal Arms of Wales, and the Royal Arms, came to anchor in Plymouth Sound at half-past nine o'clock in the morning. The Prince landed at Plymouth at the dock-yard, and proceeded at the Royal Victualling Yard soon after eleven o'clock. His Royal Highness received complimentary visits from the Corporation of Plymouth and Devonport, and at ten minutes after twelve o'clock left Plymouth for Exeter, where he arrived at half-past two o'clock. The railway officials by the Prince Consort. The Royal Standard on the 10th inst. which floats days next on board. She experienced very bad weather during the whole voyage until Tuesday last.

His Excellency the Swedish and Norwegian Minister and the Countess Piper have left London for an absence of a few months in Sweden, during which time Baron Beck Friis will act as Chargé d'Affaires.

A marriage is arranged between Lord Ashburnham and the Countess of Rothes and the Hon. George Waldegrave. The Countess of Rothes succeeded her mother in the honours of her family last year.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

The parish church of Houghton-on-the-Hill, Leicestershire, having undergone extensive improvements, was reopened on 31st inst.

On Thursday week the chancel of Bathealton Church, which has been entirely restored from designs by Mr. F. Trosby of Taunton, was opened for Divine service.

The parish church of South Hinksey, after having been closed for three months for the purpose of restoration, was opened by the Bishop of Oxford on Monday, the 5th inst.

Yesterday week the Bishop of Oxford held his triennial visitation at St. Mary's Church, Reading. There was a numerous attendance of the clergy, and the rural deans delivered their charges at the Townhall.

On Sunday week Wragby Church, Yorkshire, was reopened for Divine service, and a new organ, by Messrs. Conacher and Co., of Huddersfield, was played for the first time. Considerable alterations and improvements have been made in the church.

The parish church of St. Thomas Greetland, Halifax, was formally opened for worship on Wednesday week. The church is a plain Gothic building, containing sittings for upwards of 1,000 persons, and cost £3,000. The site was presented by Mr. Ben C. Sutherland Wallace.

Her Majesty the Queen has sent a donation of £200 to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, in aid of the Apostolic Fund, of which society her Majesty is patron; and the Royal Highness the Prince Consort has sent £100 for the same object.

TESTIMONIALS TO CLERGYMEN.—The Rev. W. Brownlow, M.A., Rector of Wilmington, Sussex, has been presented by the parishioners, from scholars, teachers, and others in the Sunday-school; and Mrs. Brownlow, a richly-carved oak reading-desk and lectern. The latter, also solid oak, with brass, has inkstand with inscription. Rev. R. Smith, a silver inkstand, from the parishioners of Ashton-under-Lyne, on his leaving that parish.

CAMBRIDGE, Nov. 12.—Professor Kingsley delivered his inaugural lecture in the Senate House, Cambridge, on Monday. There was a large attendance of the members of the University, undergraduates, and the Undergraduates. The lecture lasted an hour and three-quarters, and was listened to throughout with the greatest attention. The subject was, in respect to the memory of the late Sir James Stephen, Professor of History, considering the importance which those would occupy portions of the next Long and later terms.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

In the Bankruptcy Court on Monday there was a meeting in the case of Barnes and Troughton, of the Shoreditch Bank, which has failed with liabilities, £120,000; assets, £70,000. Assignees were chosen, and further proceedings adjourned.

The Butchers' Company entertained a large number of distinguished persons on Wednesday night at their new hall in Swithin's-lane, City. Among the guests were the Duke of Somerset, Lord Palmerston, and Lord John Russell, by whom, as also by Colonel M'Murdo, speeches were delivered.

The Chrysanthemum Show at the Crystal Palace, which opened on Tuesday, seems to promise to be one of the principal events of those beautiful flowers. Notwithstanding the unfavourable season, the entries were more numerous, and the display finer, than on the first and last year. The collection of pompons was particularly fine, and contained several new varieties.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT SITTINGS.—Subjoined are the days appointed for the Central Court for the present civic year:—1860: Monday, Nov. 26; Tuesday, Dec. 11; Monday, Dec. 17; Monday, Jan. 7; Monday, Jan. 21; Monday, Feb. 4; Monday, Feb. 18; Monday, March 4; Monday, March 18; Monday, April 8; Monday, May 6; Monday, June 10; Monday, July 8; Monday, Aug. 5; Monday, Aug. 19; Monday, Sept. 9.

THE GALWAY PACKET CONTRACT.—A rule for a new trial in the case of Irwin v. Lever, has, it will be remembered, been already granted. Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Q.C., and Mr. Court of Exchequer Bar, will be instructed to show cause against the rule, but, the Lord Chief Baron expressing his opinion that the judgment should be entered up, the application for a rule was made absolute.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.—On Tuesday evening the first lecture of the sixteenth course in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association was delivered in Exeter Hall by Lieutenant-Young Men's Christian Association was delivered in Exeter Hall by Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Henry Havelock, K.C.B., his subject being "Our Indian Colonel Sir Henry Havelock, K.C.B., his subject being "Our Indian Empire." The Rev. Dr. Bevan occupied the chair, and the platform were the Rev. Dr. Raffles, Q.C., General Alexander Lawrence, Rev. Dr. Campbell, Rev. Dr. Pettefer, &c. The hall was crowded. At the close of the lecture, which was highly interesting, the chairman conveyed the thanks of the meeting to Sir H. Havelock.

THE "GREAT EASTERN."—In the Court of Queen's Bench on Monday a rule was moved for calling upon the Great Ship Company to show cause why they should not be ordered to produce the list of shareholders to him under an indemnity, or why the award should not be set aside, and the matter referred back to the arbitrator. This rule was moved for on the Great Eastern by the petitioner. The rule was granted. On Thursday a rule nisi was granted in the case of Sir Morton Peto v. the Great Ship Co., to show cause why the award should not be set aside, on the ground that the arbitrators were not duly appointed, they were not sworn, and they made no written statement of the matter in dispute. The two rules will be probably argued early next week.

THE INCOME TAX DUTY.—The Commissioners for the county of Surrey, and Messrs. Isaac and Inchbald, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Surveyors for the county, have been negotiating a settlement of the assessment of the second half of the duty on the 1859 crop till November, 1861. As set forth in the Act, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are empowered to vary that year the rates of the duty on the 1859 crop till November, 1861. As the scheme of 1859 was to levy the duty in such a manner as to produce in the present year, consequently, the value not being realisable, the disasters have no funds to meet the demand, and many failing to pay, the Commissioners have the gentlemen of the deputation that they should carefully inquire into the allegation of disaster, and that they will not be induced to make a loss to the Government.

The strange agitation that Robert Ernest Graham, clerk to Mr. Stafino, wholesale watch-manufacturer, Thavie's Inn, of fraudulently obtaining certificates and bankrupt's effects to the amount of £4,000, under his Gridiliad, before Sir R. W. Carden, on Tuesday and Wednesday. Accordbig to the evidence of witnesses, the bankrupt was in the employ of Mr. Stafino as a wholesale business on his own account, and in a manner which displayed an amount of cool effrontery and audacity that fairly astonished all who saw it. It is satisfactory to state that, from the exertions of those in charge of this remarkable case, a portion of the property nearly £2,000 in value was recovered. At the close of the examination the prisoner was committed to take his trial.

The suit of Di Sora v. Borghese—one of those arising out of the will of the late Mr. Thomas Thynne—was heard before the Vice-Chancellor Wood on Tuesday. The plaintiff, the Duchess Di Sora, who is the sole executrix and trustee under Mr. Thynne's will, and the late Lady Catherine Gwendaline Talbot, second daughter of John, Earl of Shrewsbury, claimed to be entitled to the testamentary custody of the infant children of the mother, to one moiety of the real estate, and also to one moiety of the personal estate, of which the testamentary was possessed at the time of his death, besides a dowry in money of £60,000, which, by the terms of the marriage settlement, had not been paid. The Vice-Chancellor gave judgment, holding that the effect of a decree to enforce the payment of the dowry would be to put the power of disposing of his estate to strangers; and, as the fact did so, the result is that nothing but the dowry of £60,000 will be the Borghese's share.

NEWGATE PRISON.—The Chaplain of Newgate, the Rev. John Davis, has drawn up a report of the moral improvement of the prison for the past year. At the outset he expresses his satisfaction at seeing the demolition of the western side of the prison, necessary to the completion of the new gate system of imprisonment. They had now had, in the male wing of the prison, full time to test the effect of the new system of separation on gross offenders and on those charged with minor offences; and that experience, after many years of indiscriminate association, had convinced him, in decided advantage in many respects. The fears of suicide and lunacy, he says, had vanished. The system of separation had prevented the prisoners in gaol from being successful, and not allowed the other to advance so far as to injure the institute. The prisoners were not subjected to either undue excitement or to an opposite excitement, and then offere some suggestions with respect to liberated prisoners. The report of Mr. Neese, he says, fully corroborates the state of mind that they continue long to possess. The loss of character and fitness makes the struggle for life very severe, and, in many cases, fatal. The same and fitness makes the struggle for life very severe, and, in many cases, fatal. The same and similar obstacles present themselves to the female prisoner. Many of them have no friends to whom they can resort these sins. They have made their difficulties in the past, and, placed in the position of the outcast, they are unable to meet them; so good is to be done to these men except where their purpose of mind is to do good.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 890 boys and 861 girls (in all 1691 children) were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1850-59 the average number was 1,548. The deaths in London in the week that ended last Saturday exhibit a small increase in the number of deaths of the three preceding weeks, 1,600 in 1858 and 1940. In the present return they are 1694. For the corresponding weeks of the last ten years 1,615 persons have died on an average of that week to be, after correction for increase of population, 1192, compared with which the return for the week is less by 198. This decrease is the more remarkable notwithstanding the inappreciable of the air has been considerably lower than it usually is in the first ten days of the month, the mean for the first 10 days 36 years. A cooper aged 42 years died from "alteration of the stomach, disordered by drinking," a coroner's jury returning a verdict that he died from the effects of drinking a corrosive poison. A man aged 70 years died from "exhaustion, produced by a chemical factory. It is added that he would had been incapable for a drinking man for the last twenty years old, was poisoned by "arsenical exhalations from the green paper of a breakfast-room." The daughter of a tailor, aged 18 years, was burned to death, her clothes taking fire from lucifer-matches with which she was playing; the son of a wharf labourer aged 2 years was scalded to death by a pan of boiling clothes taking fire; a fourth died from "burns on the chest." A boy aged one year was fatally scalded by drinking hot water from a can.

NOMINATION OF SHERIFFS.—On Monday the nomination of Sheriffs for the various counties of England and Wales—with the exception of Lancashire and Cornwall, the Sheriffs of which are appointed by the Duchy, and Middlesex, where the Sheriffs are elected by the Livery—took place in the Court of Exchequer, in the presence of a large number of persons. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his gold robes of office took his place on the bench, which was occupied by the Lord Chief Baron, Mr. Baron Martin, members of the Council, the Queen's Remembrancer, and other Her Majesty's Secretary at the Treasury

LITERATURE AND ART.

THE London publishers have put on their armour of proof—query proofs?—and are rapidly rushing into the tented field—or rather the advertisement columns of the newspapers—to do battle with the demons of dulness and ignorance. In more prosaic terms, we may explain that the winter book-publishing season promises to be an exceedingly busy one. Ominous people may doubt whether any works of transcendent merit are likely to make their appearance, but works of transcendent merit will some for quality. Not only in the book world, but in minor spheres of newspapers and periodicals, signs of unusual activity are apparent. In the provinces, however, plus much reliance on the report that a further run will be made on metropolitan localities as soon as the time to new magazines, and that a "Shilling Jar" is about to follow—at a very humble distance—in the wake of "Cornhill," a further sequence of two "Half-crown Jars," "Crump-stone Bone," "Long-song," "Aldgate Pump," and "Charing-cross Hack," "the more the merrier. Our good friends the ill-natured people, must not help feeling that every new literary venture is launched at a dead set against, and a defence to, its predecessor, and that the prime object of every man of genius is to attack the lowest depth of his rival's dulness, and always overlook this trifling fact, that, while the increase of new publications is, on the whole, moderate, the increase of readers is enormous, and that, consequently, there is room for all. We hear people talking glibly enough, nowadays, of the seventy or eighty thousand per diem, of the Times, of the Times selling at a penny-farthing-and-forty pence, and of the quotidian sale of the Daily Telegraph being nearer seventy than sixty thousand—we are far too much given to look at our own world-wide circulation—and of some of the penny family journals attaining a sale of a hundred and fifty thousand weekly. These statistics are rather below than above the mark: but they cease to astonish when we reflect on the huge population of the country which reads them, and is taken place within late years. People read nowadays public which has taken place within late years. People read nowadays who never read before, and those who used to read now read a great deal more. So, wherever we really have to do with a shilling monthly with Aldgate pump or King Charles's statue on its cover or not, we unhesitatingly say that there will be room for it, and that readers will not support any literary undertaking conducted with sense and ability, and that there is room enough for all.

We spoke of bibliopolic announcements. It occurred to us lately that the great publisher of Albemarle-street, whose name is known to all the book-buying country, was rather slighted to call him, he might well be entitled in applying for an injunction to restrain his brother booksellers from assuming a title to a reputation which can be any virtue in prescription, belongs to him alone. The proprietor of the Quarterly and Murray are always true. "Mr. Murray" is a name synonymous. He has always repudiated the Co. or the plain surname. The prefix "Mr." gave an elegant, but unpretending, individuality to the favour of his soberly-couched announcements of his forthcoming works. We feel it almost a favour on the part of "Mr. Murray" to issue with his good name a work of merit. Assent was taken away; and here was a gentleman enjoying his own tortured ease in his own sanctum in Albemarle-street, who was compelled, whether or not, to partake (for a handsome consideration) of the treasures of his library. With regret we observe that this name has been dropped, and has been rudely ejected of late. The babes and sucklings of bookselling have usurped the "Mister," and we trouble for the future to hear of shall be announced "Mr. Newberry's" new work, or even a new edition of "who killed Cock Robin?" or that "Mr." Edmund Cavil is about to publish the entire correspondence of Alexander Pope, Esq., in eight-day size? There is the portion of the magnificent Madeleine at Paris, again. The chequered marble of which the columns are composed, as some fabulous suppose, from the analogy to the resemblance to the historical shepherds-plaid pantaloons worn time out of mind by Mr. Moses, after the fashion of the ancient Arcadian denizens, have begun to quarrel with the inscriptions on the Grands Commissaires of the Empire, which are to be engraved on the Holy Memorial. Why label these guns as "Armstrong" or "Whitworth" or "Horse" or "Foot"? Why not at once brand the whole of their ignorance as to the why and the wherefore; but the latest exception has been taken to another legend on the Madeleine, to this effect:—

TO THOSE WHO FELL BY THEIR COMRADES.

"Erected," or "offered," or "subscribed for," is, of course, sub-understood. "To those comrades" would be a more literal, but more satisfactory.

The popular and miscellaneous library of the late well-known transatlantic comedian and manager, Mr. Burton, has been duly sold, as announced some time since. The sale lasted fifteen days, and the amount received is 2,000 guineas. Only moderate prices were realised by the books and engravings. Among the odds and ends a repeater watch, worn by Mr. Burton in "Valley Forge," and a curious old-fashioned chair, "Clara Fisher's Shakspearean cabinet, numbering fifty pieces"—of what, we are not informed—was knocked down for 100 guineas. Thirty-three dollars fifty cents were given for two goblets professedly made from Shakspeare's mulberry-tree. If all the goblets made, and all the rum, from Shakspeare's mulberry-tree, in the traditional tree are genuine, rum-chairs from the same, to be from this traditional tree genuine, Shakspeare must have possessed not one but a Barnum Museum of Curiosities, and a forest of Arden instead of a few mulberry-trees.

A graceful compliment has lately been paid by Royalty and by Bureaucracy to literary merit in Italy. Signor Manzoni, the veteran of Woolwich Arsenal, has, in his scanty hours of leisure, found time to write a new historical work, for the publication of which the author has been called "Chips from the Block." A presentation copy was forwarded by Colonel Tolloi, head of the Arsenal, to the Minister of the Interior, who graciously accepted the gift, and, through Sir Charles Phipps, sent the artisan-author a cheque for ten pounds. Moreover, Sir Rodolph Lanyon, permanent Under-Secretary of State for War Office, has presented Mr. Knell with a splendid copy of Dr. Ure's "Dictionary of Arts and Manufactures," with a handsome autograph inscription on the flyleaf. These little courtesies honour alike the giver and the recipient.

Authors are rewarded in somewhat different, albeit not so graceful, a fashion abroad. M. Arsène Houssaye, ex-director of the Théâtre Français, ex-journalist, and writer of "Confessions," "Portraits Intimes," &c., was fortunate enough to possess a couple of houses in the Rue Chateaubriand, in Paris. These houses were taken on lease for the construction of a new boulevard. In ordinary cases the value of house property whose demolition is necessary for improvements is appraised by a jury, and the proprietor gets about a quarter of the sum he demands; but M. Houssaye is in favour with the powers that be, and, without the intervention of a jury, the municipality (i.e. the Government) have awarded him the comfortable sum of 375,000f. What would the Manchesterites say to such liberality?

From America we learn that the ninth volume of Mr. Bancroft's "History of the United States" is nearly ready for the press. Journals do we trust that Mr. Bancroft's life may be prolonged until his great task is completed; but, alas! how many have begun and left unfinished the "work of a lifetime"! Where is the history which was to be brought down to "a period within the memory of men till living," and which was so confidently promised us by Lord Macaulay? Debonair propos et Dieu dispose.

A curious art-fraud has just been discovered in Persia. General De Bartholomei writes from Tiflis to the Revue de l'Orient to complain of a gross imposture which for a length of time has been practised by the Jew goldsmiths of Hamadan and Schiraz. It appears that quantities of ancient coins of the Seleucids, Arcasids, and Sassanids dynasties have been dug up at Teheran, and eagerly purchased by European tourists. The earlier specimens may have been genuine; but it has become known that the Israelite goldsmiths of Hamadan and Schiraz have long been in the habit of manufacturing slavish antique coins and forwarding them to Teheran, where they have been buried, and subsequently dug up and sold to credulous English travellers. Decidedly, the romance of the East has flown. The bulbul sings no more to the rose; and Nouroddin and the Fair Persian have turned swindlers.

FINE ARTS.

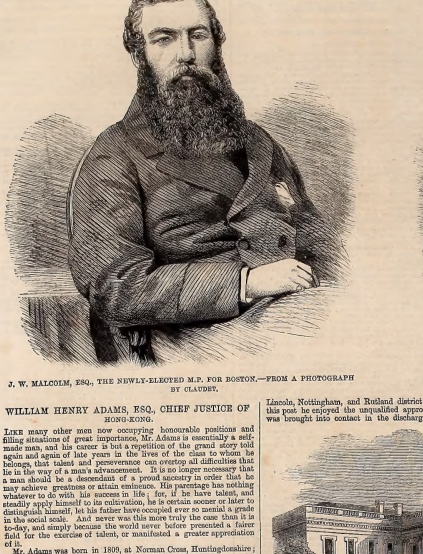
BRITISH INSTITUTION.—EXHIBITION OF COPIES BY STUDENTS.—By a committee of taste to-day, the governors of the British Institution have thrown open to a sort of private-public view the copies executed by the students of the respective schools of the Royal Academy, and of the Old Masters. We have already on more than one occasion expressed ourselves strongly in favour of the principle of these exhibitions as a course of study; and we see no reason in the display now presented to us to modify our opinion on the subject. Copyism is a fatal bar to the advancement of the art, inasmuch as the greater the success of the copyer the greater the certainty that he will never arrive at excellence in his original efforts. Again, there is a class of connoisseurs to whom we mean, to the very best copy in the present collection, being one after Rembrandt's portrait of Burgomaster Six, now in the collection of the Earl of Warwick. This is a notable piece of mimicry, and, viewed apart from its prototype, might pass for a genuine production of the master. The ground essential which is always too much neglected by us—drawing. Yet upon this production no less than upon the original being employed. In the one case, as in the other, the result is equally objectionable as being a speciality, is the portraiture of Gainsborough, whose portrait of the Misses Mrs. Graham and her sister Lavinia, one of them showing the slightest approach in character, colouring, or handling, to the original. Again, Reynolds's "Mrs. Siddons as the Tragic Muse" has eleven copyers; and the same master's "Miranda" fourteen. These works are of a class which, from their popularity, are more painted over than others, particularly the high lights, covered with regular dabs of paint. The efforts made by the copyers to imitate these impasti are ludicrous, and only show how much is misapplied. What possible good, let us ask, if, as in the case of the Rembrandt, the approach to the original is only understood in the sense of a fac-simile, but have been a successful imitation of an artist's peculiar manner, unimpaired by a scintilla of the original's excellence? Another feature in the policy of the proposed scheme of the "British Institution for the Promotion of the Fine Arts" extends no further than to this copyism, the sense of the Institution's name, which is to promote excellence, to the sole business of exhibiting and selling works on commission.

THE WORKS OF THOMAS FAED.

The practice of making collections of the works of particular artists has been extending very much of late years, and with a result both agreeable to the art-loving portion of the public and advantageous to the artists themselves. Of late the collections of Mr. Sam Rogers have just thrown open, at their gallery in Waterloo-place, a very choice assortment of the works of Thomas Faed, who understands how to paint a picture better than any. Mr. Faed does not aim at quantity so much as quality; he seldom contributes more than one picture to the annual exhibitions of the Royal Academy, but they are always works which command attention by the originality and intelligence displayed in the conception, and by the feeling for truth and nature in the harmonious colouring, and the nice treatment in the execution. The present collection comprises "The First Break in the Highland Line," which was in the Royal Academy in 1860; "Lesterner nein' beans guid o' himsel,' exhibited in 1858; "My ain Fireside," one of the best subjects, exhibited at the British in 1856; and "His only Pair," which created so amusing a sensation at the present year's exhibition. There are also two drawings, "Highland Mary" and "Auld Robin Gray," the subjects, exhibited at the Glasgow Art-Union Exhibition in 1856; and two portrait subjects, which we believe have not before been exhibited.

HOLMAN HUNT'S "THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD."—Mr. SIMMONS has at length completed his engraving of Mr. Holman Hunt's celebrated picture "The Light of the World," and as admirably performed as it is possible for the art to be. The engraving may be considered both as the translation of a picture and simply as a work of art, and in both it is one of the most perfect things modern art has produced. Those who recollect the picture will be aware of the difficult nature of the task of reproducing a work in which such a vast amount of the finish of the pre-Raphaelite school is lavished, and almost mystic softness surrounding the Saviour, merging into the still greater softness in which the figure is lost in the darkness of the forest-gloom. The peculiar tints growing in the foreground are elaborated with the utmost minuteness of manipulation, and the lovely moss that covers the door, and the whole of the peculiar chiaroscuro which is made to pervade it, were a great triumph; and Mr. Simmons has most undeniably achieved it.

MUSIC.



The production of Edward Loder's opera, "The Night Dancers," at Covent Garden on Saturday last was quite successful. It continues to be performed every evening, and has the prospect of a long career. The libretto is not a good one, and the story is not unequal novelty; for a dramatic work, if not kept before the public, is speedily forgotten. The title of the opera, "The Night Dancers." It was first produced at the Princess' Theatre fourteen years ago when it was the most perfect things modern art has produced. Those who recollect the picture will be aware of the difficult nature of the task of reproducing a work in which such a vast amount of the finish of the pre-Raphaelite school is lavished, and almost mystic softness surrounding the Saviour, merging into the still greater softness in which the figure is lost in the darkness of the forest-gloom. W. H. ADAMS, ESQ. (FORMERLY MEMBER FOR BOSTON), CHIEF JUSTICE OF HONG-KONG.

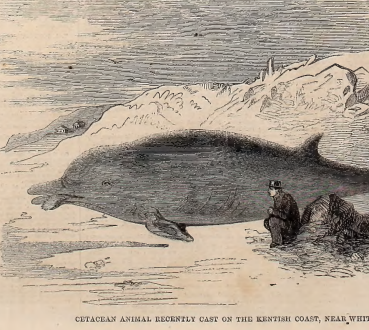
WILLIAM HENRY ADAMS, ESQ., CHIEF JUSTICE OF HONG-KONG.

LIKE many other men now occupying honourable positions and filling situations of great importance, Mr. Adams is essentially a self-made man, and his career is but a repetition of the grand story told again and again of late years in the lives of the class to whom he belongs, that talent and perseverance can overtop all difficulties that lie in the way of a man's advancement. It is no longer necessary that a man should be a descendant of a proud ancestry in order that he may achieve greatness or attain eminence. His parentage has nothing whatever to do with his success in life; for, if he have talent, and steadily apply himself to its cultivation, he is certain sooner or later to distinguish himself, let his father have occupied ever so menial a grade in the social scale. And never was this more truly the case than it is to-day, and simply because the world never before presented a fairer field for the exercise of talent, or manifested a greater appreciation of it.

Mr. Adams was born in 1809, at Norman Cross, Huntingdonshire; there is, therefore, every reason for hoping that there are many years of activity and usefulness yet before him. After completing his school education, which, from all that can be gathered on the matter, was nothing extraordinary, he took to the business of a compositor in a printing establishment in London. We say took to the business, for there appears to be considerable doubt of his having been properly apprenticed, and some of those who knew him most intimately in after life assert that he acquired a knowledge of the business by the exercise of that shrewdness for which he is distinguished in common with self-made men generally. Be this, however, as it may, it is certain he was a compositor in his youth; and, like many before him, he did not work many years at the case ere he conceived the notion of becoming a writer for the press as well as the setter up of other men's compositions. His first efforts were a series of anonymous letters to the John Bull, and the style in which they were written was so strikingly indicative of great powers that the editor was induced to seek out the author and engaged him as one of his regular "staff." How long he remained on that paper it is difficult to say with precision; but in 1834 he removed to Boston to take the management of the Lincolnshire Herald, a Conservative paper, which had not long been started at that time. In this situation he acted by turns in every capacity connected with the getting out of a small journal, from the writing of the "leaders" to the distribution of the type. At the time he entered this situation Lincoln, Nottingham, and Rutland districts; and as long as he held this post he enjoyed the unqualified approval of all with whom he was brought into contact in the discharge of its important duties.



"THE WHITE HOUSE," WASHINGTON, THE RESIDENCE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.—SEE SUPPLEMENT, PAGE 473.

From a very early period of his connection with the club already referred to, those friends who urged him to study for the Bar entertained a conviction also that he was a fit and proper person to represent Boston in Parliament; and in this year (1856), on the occasion of Mr. Heathcote retiring from the representation of Boston to take that of the county of Rutland, he was brought forward in the Conservative interest, in opposition to the late Mr. Ingram. With so popular an opponent, however, as Mr. Ingram his chance of success was exceedingly small from the very outset of the contest; and the result of the poll only showed matters to be what had been anticipated. Though defeat was certain from the commencement of the battle, Mr. Adams stood the contest out, in order to pave his way for the next general election; and he had not long to wait for this, for a dissolution took place in April the following year, when he was returned, without opposition, as the fellow-representative of Herbert Ingram of Boston in the British House of Commons. That was a proud day not only in the history of the representatives, but of Boston; for them, for the first time in its history, did Boston return two townsmen to represent its interests beneath the roof of St. Stephen's. And little doubt can be entertained that he would have been returned again and again had he determined to present himself before his constituency on future occasions. But the time had come for his taking another step in that advancement for which he had worked so long and so patiently—for his receiving another and a higher reward for the lifelong labour he had so nobly prosecuted, and which reward was his appointment, in the early part of 1859, to the high and responsible position of Attorney-General of Hong-Kong. He therefore, at the dissolution, in March of that year, addressed his farewell to his Boston constituents, and in the course of a little time took his departure for his distant home. Since then he has been further promoted to the office of Chief Justice, and no one rejoices more at this than those many warm-hearted admirers of his left behind in the old town of Boston, and we believe the hearty wish of all is that his health may be preserved, so that after a term of service in a distant clime he may return to the circle of his old friends, and spend in quiet and comfort the declining days of his life in the place where so much was done by him for the qualifying of himself to fill the post to which he has so honourably risen.

CETACEAN ANIMAL CAST ASHORE NEAR WHITSTABLE.

ANNEXED is an Engraving of one of the "monsters of the deep which was killed on the North Kentish coast, near Whitstable, on Monday, Oct. 29. It may be of interest to those of our readers who are naturalists, as the animal does not seem to belong exactly to any of the described genera. The following description of it has been obligingly communicated by the gentleman to whom we are indebted for the sketch:—"Its extreme length is 26 feet, and its greatest girth nearly 20 feet. The snout is 17 inches long, and 7 inches wide. The pectoral fins are 29 inches long; the dorsal one shorter. The tail, set transversely and very slightly bifurcated, is 7 feet across. The 'blowhole,' as shown in the Engraving, is set transversely on the crown of the head, in a single straight line, about 6 inches long, and slightly behind the eyes. The eyes are of the human shape, about twice as large, and with eyelids. The pectoral fins are set very low, so much so that a straight stick would touch the sand of both. There is not the slightest trace of baleen, or of teeth. The tongue is entirely detached beneath, and is fringed with a kind of papillæ in a double row, which is about three-quarters of an inch in length. The forehead rises abruptly to the height of 13 in. from the snout, and there is but very slight trace of any ridge between them. Below the throat are two diverging grooves about 18 in. long. The pectoral and dorsal fins divide the whole length into three portions, of which the two end ones are about equal, the middle one being rather longer. The colour is a brownish black—quite black on the back and tail, and shading to a dirty white beneath, and on the cheeks. With this animal was taken her young one, also a female, about 14 ft. long, and only differing from the old one in being of a slighter make and of rather higher colour." This description is of course that of the grampus or bottle-nosed whale, but the name, in the entire absence of any vestige of teeth, do not agree with any recorded description that I have met with, whilst the absence of "lobes" equally prevents their being assigned to the whale family. The snout, or beak, seems of a very heavy massive inside, and in this respect, as well as in shape, quite answers to the French name of 'Bec d'Oie.' The jaws of the young one are equally devoid of any vestige of teeth. The creature were one are equally devoid of any vestige of teeth. The creature were purchased by Mr. Mathilde fisherman, who intend to take a note of the food they find in them, and to preserve the skeleton. If any of your readers will be kind enough to forward further information, I shall be very happy to furnish it in reply to a note directed—G. B., Sulling Vicarage, Kent."

J. W. MALCOLM, ESQ., M.P.

MR. MALCOLM, whose Portrait we engrave on the preceding page, was elected on Wednesday, July 25, 1860, to represent the borough of Boston in Parliament, in place of the late Mr. Herbert Ingram. He is the eldest son of Mr. John Wingfield Malcolm, Esq., of Portman-square, and was born in 1835. He received his education at Eton, and at Christchurch, Oxford. Mr. Malcolm has travelled in Russia, Germany, Egypt, America, Jamaica, Cuba, the United States, Hudson's Bay Territory, and Canada. One of his brothers, an officer in the Rifles, was killed at Inkerman; his third brother is First Lieutenant of the Royal Engineers at Canton. His uncle, the late Neil Malcolm, Esq., represented Dumfries in the Parliaments of 1826 and 1830.

The hon. gentleman, who is new to public life, may, perhaps, be formed a Liberal Conservative. In the address which he has issued marked out for himself will be best gathered from the address delivered by him to the electors of Boston on the nomination day:—

Mr. Malcolm said he appeared before them as a candidate for their suffrages in the Conservative interest. He wished to extend the franchise to all who were qualified by their education and position to exercise it with discretion. The length of time which had elapsed since the last Reform Bill, and the great increase of wealth, commerce, and intelligence, he thought fully justified its extended, not only with reflex, but also with advantage to the expression of the virtual and the country. Every one must admit that the franchise was not nearly evil in England; but at the same time there was no doubt that, as regarded speech and of the ballot, there were much liberty for the exercise of the franchise, which, by the action, the freedom of the press, and the non-interference with the exercise of the elective had chiefly to remove the evils of expenditure, bribery, and corruption. The franchise and extravagance of corruption, there was undoubtedly, owing to the ballot, a great diminution of expense, and of bribery and corruption. But these evils would never be corrected by cries for the pennies of the Charter, universal suffrage, or by ballot. Bribery and corruption could be put down by merely cutting down the Estimates; but the whole administrative system must be kept through, and sufficiently and efficiently defrayed, and then not only a reduced expenditure but also additional efficiency would be obtained. As to the public establishments, one of the most strongest objections against the ballot was that it was a thoroughly un-English and unfair mode of voting. It was a mode of voting unknown to the franchise, let him come forward and give his vote openly. With reference to foreign affairs, he considered that the last war was a most unnecessary one, and to all lovers of liberty. The Sardinians, whose Government was the most enlightened of all the Italian States, were fighting for their national rights, and not a Power was consequently risen up there which none they would afford no efficient assistance. Regarding the question of the income and expenditure balance against the autocracies of Russia, France, and Austria. France professed to be in a friendly state with other Powers, but she was continually augmenting her fleet, and, so he had no doubt, was Russia. Austria was also augmenting her fleet, and he thought that must also keep up our fleet for the purposes of efficiency, in order to maintain the position of one of the

ITALY IN TRANSITION: The Venetian Provinces, from Napoleon's Abdication to the Present Time. With Notes on Social and Political Matters. Illustrated by Official Documents from the Papal Archives. By the Author of "Rome and Her Rulers."

"Author of "The Trumpet of a Prophecy," &c.

"This volume is a valuable addition to the most curious and important of all histories, when the fate and fortunes of the most interesting people in Europe are considered. . . . The author of 'Rome and Her Rulers' has done well to publish this volume. . . . The 'Secret Record' of Italy is a subject on which a work lamentably supplying with the cut-and-dried confusion of reporting the opinions of the Times, Chambers's Journal, and the Morning Post.

"The most interesting portions of the original documents, printed by the revolutionary Government of Bologna, and on sale in the streets, are the scrupulous accuracy of Mr. Arthur's extracts and compilations from them. . . . The author has done his work with great ability. He has shown a man as the author of this volume is, in whose writings and deliberate opinions we can trust to the issue of fanaticism, but the free development of liberty towards all the individuals concerned in that system, from the Pope to the quarrying friar, may be left without misgiving to the author of 'Rome and Her Rulers.'"—Spectator.

"We would not for a moment appear to wish damage to be done to Italy. It abounds with high intelligence, generous thinking, and a liberal spirit; and we hail the rise and the just progressive growth of Italy."—Christian Witness.

"Mr. Arthur possesses and peoples our lively; its records of the revolutionary authorities, and the Papal Archives, the Vatican, the Vatican Library, the cafés, the clergy, are all full of suggestive realities. . . . If any one can understand the true meaning and drift of the present war, in the character of the Papal Government, we refer to Mr. Arthur's book."—Daily News.

"A book of this kind Mr. Arthur has written more than well. . . . It is a small pamphlet, and to read a public meeting—and which is more than can be said of many a ponderous volume. . . . Mr. Arthur's narrative is full of interest, and he has made himself master of his subject with the yet greater charm of earnestness and of truth. We refer more especially to the chapter on Rome in the Holy Week, and to the three magnificent ceremonies over which the Sovereign Pontiff presides in person. . . . Mr. Arthur's book is a valuable one, and we hope it will be widely read and duly considered."—Morning Post.

"In the normal action of an exceedingly inter-ating and very able work on Italy, by the author of 'Rome and Her Rulers,' we find an intervention, we find some documents that, now published for the first time, will be found to be singularly significant."—North British Review.

WILLIAMS'S PATENT DOUBLE-ACTING HARP. Price 50 guineas. Manufactory, 27, Great Portland-street, Regent-street, W.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE, price Fifty Guineas, harmonises the merits of the ordinary Cottage pianoforte with the brilliant and powerful tone of the Grand. The touch, repetition, and general mechanism have been brought to a degree of excellence previously unknown to the cottage pianoforte, but which, by the new principles introduced by Messrs. Chappell and Co., especially invite the attention of the public, the profession, and the trade, to the Foreign Model, feeling assured that the Pianoforte, in all respects unequalled, has hitherto been made in England. Every instrument is warranted for five years, and, if desired, will be tuned and regulated for the purchaser.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE EARL OF DUNDONALD.

The Right Hon. Sir Thomas Cochrane, G.C.B., Admiral of the White, and Rear-Admiral of the United Kingdom, tenth Earl of Dundonald, in the county of Ayr, Baron Cochrane of Dundonald, Lord Cochrane of Paisley and Ochiltree, in the peerage of Scotland, and a Baronet of Nova Scotia, Marquis of Maranham, in Brasil, Grand Cross of the Imperial Brazilian Order of the Cruzero, Knight of the Royal Order of the Saviour of Greece and of the Order of Merit of Chili, one of the greatest of modern British seamen, and a coomander whose exploits and fortunes form a home and abroad, have given him a name in history, was the representative of a noble Scottish family, distinguished as much from its antiquity as by warlike reputation, and was the son of Archibald, the ninth Earl of Dundonald by his first wife, Anne, second daughter of Captain James Gilchrist, R.N., and the first wife of the distinguished Admiral, the Hon. Sir Alexander Forrester Inglis Cochrane, G.C.B. He was born the 14th of December, 1775, and may be said to have been from his earliest youth to the time of his death actively engaged in the pursuits of his profession. When he was only five years of age his name was entered on the books of the Venerable, commanded by his uncle, Captain afterwards Sir Alexander, Cochrane. He first went to sea the 27th of June, 1793. Previously to this he had been guarded to a captaincy in the 79th Foot, but had not joined his regiment. On the 17th of May, 1794, when acting Lieutenant of the ship under his uncle's command, the Fleet's young Cochrane contributed to the defeat, on the coast of North America, of a French squadron of five sail, two of which were captured. On the 21st of December, 1795, Cochrane went from Gibraltar Bay in command of the boats of the Queen Charlotte and the Emerald frigate, to relieve the Lady Nelson cutter, then surrounded and attacked, off Ochiltra Point, by several French privateers and Spanish gun-boats, some of which he pursued and boarded with the most undaunted gallantry, chasing others under the very cannon of the harbour. On the capture, in 1800, of the French 74 Le Généreux, he was appointed her acting Captain; but on the 28th of March following he was promoted to be Master and Commander of the Speedy sloop-of-war; and in the ten succeeding months he took 31 vessels, carrying, in all, 198 guns, and 885 men, besides assisting at the capture of many others. For one of those, the saucer, by boarding, on the 6th of May, the Gamo, of Barcelona, on the 6th of May, 1801, he received his promotion to Post Captain. On the 3rd of April, however, the Speedy was captured by the French squadron under Admiral Linois. In the action Lord Cochrane's conduct has been so conspicuous that, on presenting his sword, the Captain of the French ship, Dessaix, returned it to him, with the request that he would continue to wear what he had so nobly used. On the 6th of the same month he was on board the French squadron when attacked by Sir James Saumarez in Algeciras Bay; and, being soon afterwards exchanged, he returned to England, and went on half-pay. On the 6th of October he was appointed to the Arab, 22 guns, from which ship, after serving at the blockade of Boulogne, he removed, on the 1st of December, to the Pallas frigate, 32, in which, in the following year, he was sent out with despatches to his uncle, Admiral Sir A. Cochrane, at that time employed in the blockade of Ferrol. During the two next years Cochrane was incessantly and successfully occupied in capturing the vessels of the enemy and in doing them the most deadly injury on numerous occasions. In April, 1809, Lord Cochrane was selected by the First Lord of the Admiralty, on account of his daring valour, to command a fleet of fire-ships intended for the destruction of the French fleet then lying at anchor, and blockaded by Lord Gambier, in the Basque Roads. On the night of the 11th of that month he went on board one of the explosion-ships containing 1000 barrels of gunpowder, and performed the hazardous service effectually. For his signal gallantry on this occasion he received the Knighthood of the Bath. He had been chosen M.P. for Honiton, and afterwards, in 1807, for Westminster, and as he intimated his intention to oppose the vote of thanks proposed by the Government to Lord Gambier, which, it was supposed in the Basque Roads affair, that nobleman, who was said to be a courtier, had not sufficiently availed himself of the means which the House urged reform in the Navy, and they were so distasteful to the then Government that it probably led to the severity of the treatment he received in consequence of the following unhappy affair.—In the early part of 1814 Lord Cochrane was charged with being implicated in a fraud committed by one Charles Random de Berenger and others, who contrived that, on February 22, 1814, an express should be sent from Dover with the information that a French officer had arrived announcing the death of the Emperor Napoleon by assassination. The feuds too mostly ten per cent in consequence of the false news. The transaction nevertheless anticipated realising a considerable amount by realising out. Some were disappointed, and others were not disappointed, at the failure of Berenger, the Hon. Andrew Corbynne Johnstone, Butt, Sandoun, Hughes, Holloway, and Lyte, the parties engaged, were tried, together with Lord Cochrane, at the King's Bench, Guildhall, on the 8th of June, 1814, before Lord Ellenborough, for a conspiracy, and were all convicted and variously sentenced. Sergeant Best and Messrs. Topping, Scarlett, and Brougham were Lord Cochrane's counsel. It should be observed that Lord Cochrane's conviction mainly depended on Berenger going into and changing the price of stock. Lord Cochrane's share in (Berenger) spreading the false rumour. This visit has since been over and over again denied in an exculpatory way, but Berenger, his wife, family, and general credit is now given to Lord Cochrane's innocence. Lord Cochrane, after his conviction, was committed to the King's Bench to be imprisoned for twelve months, and at the end of that time to stand in the pillory. He was also degraded from all his naval honours and rank, and was expelled the House of Commons; but, by re-election, he took the seats on the 3rd of May, 1815. He was subsequently made Rear-Admiral of the Blue. His suit to procure a temporary escape from the King's Bench, for the public defrayal, by a penny subscription, to the Admiral, was unsuccessful. Lord Cochrane's wife was a daughter of Mr. Corbynne. His lawsuit was ejected from Westminster Abbey, and his escutcheon was removed. Navy Lists of 1815 and 1816 will show the subsequent service of her naval hero. Lord Cochrane succeeded to the Earldom of Dundonald on the death of his father, Lord Cochrane, and here his achievements were as of the days of old. He took command of the Chilian navy at the age of 38. In 1851 he became Admiral of the White, and in 1854 Rear-Admiral of the Fleet of the United Kingdom. The Earl originally published a work on the scientific attainments, and was the author of a pamphlet entitled "A Letter to Lord Ellenborough." He long held the opinion that by loosening up the annihilating forts, which was submitted to the Government, a great saving of steam would be effected, and a valuable improvement in the speed of steam navy. He leaves his son "Archibald, Lord Cochrane, born in Chili, 1814, and married, in Chili, 1837, Katherine Frances Cochrane, daughter of Thomas Barnard Cochrane, Esq., of Valparaiso, in Chili, and has issue one son and a daughter—namely, Thomas Barnard, Lord Cochrane, born in Chili, 1838, and married, in 1865, Lady Grace Elizabeth Frances, only daughter of the late Alexander Nicholson, Esq., Speaker of the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia, and has issue one son, Archibald, born in Nova Scotia, 1867; and a daughter, Katherine Jane Auckland, Captain R.N., C.B., born in 1813, distinguished at Acre, and in his command in the Black Sea in the destruction of the Russian fleet, and where he was wounded; Ernest Grey, Lieut. R.N., born the 9th of June, 1834; and Katherine Elizabeth, married to John Wilson Patten, Esq., Lancashire, M.P., Hants. The Earl of Dundonald died on the 31st ult., and is succeeded by his eldest son, Thomas, Lord Cochrane, who served in the Crimea with the Army, who was born in 1814, and married, in 1841, Louisa Harriet, daughter of William Gore Langton, Esq., Somerset, M.P., and has issue by her (with a family of two sons and two daughters. It is a curious circumstance worth noting that the Earl of Dundonald's ancestors, the Cochranes, bore three arms and in death. Sir Charles Napier, had a family connection between them. Sir Thomas Cochrane, the Regent, was the son of Lord Dundonald's first cousin and military man, among whom may be mentioned the late General Sir Alexander Dallas, and in India, his son Lieutenant-Colonel (the late James) Hope, R.C.B., commanding in China. William John, eighth Lord Napier, now Lieutenant-Colonel in the Scots Fusilier Guards, married Lady Catherine Cochrane, first cousin to the Earl of Dundonald and second daughter of his maternal uncle, Archibald, ninth Earl of Dundonald. The second Earl of Hopetoun, whose sister, Lady Henrietta Hope, married Thomas, fifth Lord Dundonald, and mother of Lady Charlotte Napier.

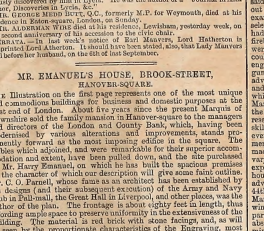
On Wednesday morning the funeral of the late Earl took place. The remains were laid in the family vault, and were followed to the grave being in the nave of the sacred edifice, by the rest of the family, including the late Robert Stephenson, M.P., and Mr. Brassey. Forming the procession and occupying various positions in the nave were, amongst others, the Duke of Buccleuch, K.T., Vice-Chancellor Sinart, Sir Thomas Trevelyan, Sir Michael Seymour, M.P., Mr. Hamilton, M.P., Sir Augustus Clifford, Colonel Sir Henry Ewart, Lord Armstrong, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Childers, Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Collier, Captain Goldsmith, C.B., Captain Schomberg, Captain Hay, and Captain Noble.

THE EARL OF CAWDOR.

The Right Hon. John Frederick Campbell, D.C.L., F.R.S., first Earl of Cawdor, of Castle Martin, in the county of Pembroke, Viscount Emlyn, of Emlyn, in the county of Carmarthen, and second Baron Cawdor, of Castlemartin, in the peerage of the United Kingdom, Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of Carmarthenshire, was the eldest son of the two sons (the late Admiral the Hon. George Frederick Campbell, the other) of John, first Lord Cawdor, by Caroline Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Frederick, fifth Earl of Carlisle. He was born on the 8th of October, 1790, and was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, he was M.P. for Carmarthen from the year 1812 till 1820, when he succeeded to the barony of Cawdor on the death of his father. He was himself created, on the 5th of October, 1827, Earl of Cawdor, and Viscount Emlyn, in 1841 he was made Knight of the Thistle, and a Knight of Oxford. He married, on the 4th of August, 1823, Sarah Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Thomas, second Marquis of Bath, by whom, who survives him, he had issue three sons and four daughters. Of the daughters two have been married—viz., Emily Caroline, married to the Hon. Octavius Duncombe, brother of the first Lord Feversham, and Georgiana Sarah, to Lord Bolton, Bart., of Bolliston, Flintshire; Elizabeth Lucy, married to the Earl of Dunraven, and Mary Louisa, married to Lord Henry Somerset. The Earl was a Family Trustees of the British Museum, a Fellow of the Royal Society, being one of the Council in 1831, and a Fellow of the Antiquarian, and was a member of several other learned bodies. The Earl of Cawdor died on the 7th inst., at his seat, Stackpole Court, in the county of Pembroke, Pembrokeshire, and he is succeeded by his eldest son, John Frederick Vaughan Viscount Emlyn, who was born in 1817, and married, in the 30th of June, 1842, Sarah Mary, second daughter of George Granville, Duke of Sutherland, Marquis of Stafford, and granddaughter of William, fourth Duke of Devonshire, and has a family of two sons and three daughters. The late Earl's grandfather succeeded had a Royal descent through his mother, Lady Isabella Howard, daughter of the fifth Earl of Carlisle, descended from the Tudor line, and also descended from the early Plantagenets—by his father, as above, and also by his mother, Lady Caroline Howard, whose mother was Isabella Byron, daughter of Sir Richard Viliiers, whose wife was Lady Frances Brudenell, sister and heiress of Stackpole Court, and who was Lady Frances by the marriage of their ancestor, Sir Alexander Campbell, with Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Sir Alexander and son of Robert Lord, last Baronet of Stackpole Court, who died unmarried in 1638.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR HENRY ORE ROBERTS, K.C.B.

The distinguished officer who was the son of William Roberts, Esq., of Gloucester, and the grandson of William Roberts, President of Magdalen College, Cambridge, and who was born in that city during the reign of the late King George on the 30th of April, 1819, and died at his residence, Hinton House, Redmarley, Gloucestershire, on the 7th inst., after an honourable and active service of nearly forty-one years. Sir Henry entered the Army as ensign in the 49th Foot in 1842, and after passing successively examinations in bringing himself into the long-trended notice of the Duke of Wellington, was in 1845 made Lieutenant Resident at Kurnaul, and in the summer of 1846 was appointed Major for holding successively the command of the brigades at Kurnaul and at Rajpoore. Upon the outbreak of the Sutlej War in 1845 he was specially appointed to the command of the northern division of the army, together with the command of the province of Loodiana, and was subsequently put in command of the field division in Rajpoorna, assembled to assist in putting down the civil feuds and rebellion in Cutch. He was subsequently made Companion of the Bath for his services were acknowledged by Government in the highest terms of commendation, and received the long career his activity and energy as a soldier on all occasions met with the strongest acknowledgment of the many military commanders under whom he served.



Sir Henry Roberts from 1857 to 1861 commanded the outposts in Wagore, Ajmeh, and with a party of the Kotah Irregular Horse surprised and captured, after a forced march, a body of influential Meenah chiefs. He was also present with the detachment of the Nugger Parkur Field Force which attacked and defeated a party of Khoosa under the celebrated chief Shoke Khan in 1859. While in Scinde, as Brigadier at Sukkur, in 1863, under the command of Major-General Sir Charles Napier, Roberts, with a field detachment, marched to Hyderabad, on the 8th of April, and assumed command of the garrison at Fort Amree, near Schwan, Meer Shah Mahomed, brother of Meer Roostum Khan, Ameer of Meerpore. He subsequently joined the division in Rajpoorna, Roberts took the strongly-fortified city of Khotah by assault, and defeated the Gwalior rebels under the Rao Bahib and Tantia Topee, in a skirmish at Sangamer on the 8th, and again in a general action at Khotah on the 25th of March, 1858. For these services, and for his conduct, Sir Henry Roberts was appointed a Knight Commander of the Bath in 1859, and received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament. He married Miss Baikie, daughter of the Rev. Robert Baikie.

SIR CHARLES FELLOWS died at his residence in Montague-place, Russell-square, on Thursday week. He was born in 1799. He received the honour of knighthood in 1845, as a reward for the services rendered by him in connection with the Ancient Lycian marbles and antiquities presented by him to the British Museum. He was a Commander of the Legion of Honour, &c.

MR. GEORGE HOLLINGWORTH, formerly M.P. for Weymouth, died at his residence in Eaton-square, London, on Sunday.

MR. ALEXANDER MACKENZIE, of Dingwall, Lewisham, yesterday week, on account anniversary of his accession to the civic chair.

BISHOP HARE.—The Rev. Dr. Hare, Rector of Hurstmonceux, Lent Hatherton is appointed Lord Atherton. It should have been settled, also, that Lady Manners died before her husband, on the 8th of last September.

MR. EMANUEL'S HOUSE, BROOK-STREET, HANOVER-SQUARE.

The illustration on the page represents one of the most unique and commodious buildings for business and domestic purposes at the west end of London. It is situated in Brook-street, on the estate of the Dowrubire and the family mansion is Hanover-square to the manages and directors of the Metropolitan and District Railway Companies, whose offices, together with extensive alterations and improvements, stands prominently forward as the most imposing edifice in the square. Its handsome white stone and red brick elevation, for their superior accommodation and extent, have been pulled down, and the site purchased by Mr. Emanuel, the owner, on which he built the superior premises of the character of which our description will give some faint outlines. Mr. C. O. Parsons, the architect (whose offices are appropriately placed in this building (and their subsequent extension) of the Army and Navy Club in Pall-mall, the Great Hall in Liverpool, and other places, was in charge of the building. The frontage, which is eighty feet in length, thus affording ample space to preserve uniformity in the extensiveness of the building. Which is carried out in Portland stone, and has each of the seen by the proportionate characteristics of the Engraving, most prominent position, and the centre portion of the first floor, which is subdivided into two suites only, each being glazed with plate glass of the best plate-glass. The base of the building in the interior is finished in the style of the Italian Renaissance. The walls are deposited every night most costly jewels and precious stones, large chests of plate, &c.; rooms for customers and clerks are on the ground floor, communicating by trade purposes, where business is conducted with other dealers in these valuable articles. The basement contains the kitchen, the servants' hall, kitchens, and other domestic offices. On the ground floor is the shop, or showroom, which is approached from the street by a handsome folding door, 10 ft. 6 in. in height, by 10 feet in width, and 19 feet in height. In the centre is a large stove, ornamental in its character, so as to warm the entire shop in the coldest days of the year. At each end of the year, is filled with full blooming plants. All the cabinets are made of oiled oak, with plate-glass doors, and are fitted with the same costly wood, with unusually large panels of plate glass. The ceiling is beautifully decorated after the style of the Italian Renaissance, with panels containing, in colours of green, crimson, and purple, emeralds, rubies, and amethysts. A single chandelier, with twelve lights, is suspended from the centre of the room, and gives a brilliant appearance, as the cabinets are lined with chased and burnished gilt mouldings, and the panels are filled with mirrors. Leading out of four steps, an entrance is given to the large plate-room, where a dinner service a la Russe is displayed in full and tempting elegance. On the same floor is the private apartment, accommodation, are the diamond and model rooms, with various recesses, tables, and desks, for the employés of the establishment. The first floor is also the scene of elegant rooms, suitable either for the purposes of a commodious drawing-room, or for conference with the customers in respect of the costly trade in which Mr. Harry Emanuel is engaged. At present it serves both purposes, as its representative, Mr. Stevens, is always resident on the premises; and, spacious as is the accommodation, the whole area seems quite absorbed by the uses to which it is devoted.

THE NEW BISHOP OF CARLISLE.

The Hon. and Rev. Dr. Waldegrave, who has been appointed to the bishopric of Carlisle in the room of the Hon. and Rev. Dr. Montague Villiers, translated to Durham, was formerly Chaplain and Private Master by his Grace the Archbishop of the province on Sunday last. The Bishop-elect was then preached a sermon, which was by the Rev. Charles Bridges, M.A., Rector of Hinton Martell, near Wimborne. The Bishop-elect, vested in his robes of episcopal office, was led up the centre aisle by the Bishop of Durham and Ripon, the first-named Prelate saying, "Most Reverend Father in God, we present unto you this godly and well-learned man to be ordained and consecrated Bishop." The Archbishop then demanded the Queen's mandate for the consecration, which was produced and read. The oath of supremacy, &c., was then taken having been administered, the Bishop was admitted to his high office by the imposition of hands.

The Bishop will have episcopal jurisdiction over Cumberland, Westmorland, and parts of Lancashire. He will not be entitled to a seat in the House of Lords until he has been longer in the bishopric than Canterbury, York, London, Winchester, and Durham. The Bishop-elect was born in 1820, and is the Cardinal. The new Bishop will take place, according to the Carlisle Patriot, on this day (Saturday), when the enthronement will be performed by proxy. The Bishop will preach at the cathedral on Sunday morning (to-morrow), and at St. Cuthbert's Church in the evening of the same day, on which day he will be enthroned.

The Hon. and Rev. Samuel Waldegrave is the second son of the late Earl Waldegrave, and was born at Chewton, Somersetshire, in September, 1817. His education commenced at Chesan School under the Rev. Dr. Wilson, and subsequently at Eton and Oxford. He took his degree as was one of the earliest pupils of the Rev. A. C. Tait, now Bishop of London. At Easter, 1850, he took a double first-class; in the autumn of the same year he was elected Fellow of Balliol. In 1851 he took Holy Orders. He subsequently filled the academic offices of Public Examiner, Select Preacher, and Proctor. In 1858 he was appointed Chaplain to the Queen, served—at first as assistant of the present Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, and then as Dean of the Chapel Royal. In 1860 he resigned, quitting that charge for college preferment he had the honour, in conjunction with Mr. Baring and other excellent men, of carrying on the Government of Canada. Subsequently he was made Dean of Durham, by Act, seeing an incumbent minister appointed for, and a church far advanced in the year 1860, was made Archdeacon of Northumberland. He has resided entirely at Barford St. Martin, near Salisbury, till 1867, when, at the request of Mr. Bickersteth to the see of Ripon, the new duties of a Canon Residentiary of Salisbury Cathedral were added to his previous engagements. As Proctor for the Chapter of Salisbury Mr. Waldegrave was present at the Convocation of the province, being generally present at the Convocation in June, 1869. Having been thus prepared for higher duties, on the episcopal office, Mr. Waldegrave was, in June last, nominated to the see of Carlisle, by Lord Elmerston. The consecration however, was delayed by the protracted processes of law involved in the translation or creation of three Bishops until Sunday last, when it took place, as above stated, in York Minster. The Bishop of Durham and Prelates were the Archbishop of York and the Bishops of Durham and Ripon.

Dr. Waldegrave is the author of a small volume of university sermons entitled "Sin and Death," and of a work on the Apocalypse, being a statement of the teaching of Scripture concerning Justification, Sanctification, and Assurance, entitled "New Testament Millenarianism," in which, in the Hampton Lecture for 1870, these views of the millennial prophecy which are commonly called Millenarian are firmly though kindly combated.

The presentation of the freedom of the city of London, with swords, to Lord Clyde and Sir James Outram, which has been delayed primarily on account of the visit of the former to the south of France, and the illness of the latter, will take place at the Mansion House on Tuesday next, and will be followed by a banquet on a magnificent scale at the Mansion House.

THE STORMING AND CAPTURE OF THE PEIHO FORTS.

In addition to the details of this gallant affair contained in our last week's Number we give the following account by a correspondent of the China Mail, in connection with the illustrations on page 469:—"The plan of attack for the 21st of August was, that the first division of English, with the rest of the French, should cross the river, and threaten the southern forts; while the second division should assault the nearest northern forts. Accordingly, on the evening of the 20th the second division moved out and took up a position in front of the said fort, but just out of range; while working parties were thrown out to cover them. The Admiral and General-in-command then examined the intervening ground as closely as possible in order to make their arrangements for the attack. The Chinese evidently had some inkling of what was going on, for they threw out showers of fireballs from the forts, and fired a few shots over where they were and what they were about; but, whether it was that they either could not make them out, or did not consider the work that they were engaged in of sufficient them at all seriously, they only fired one or two guns during the night. At daybreak the next morning the division then moved forward, and the Chinese batteries having got some range, and pouring in a tremendous fire upon the fort with precision, while the Royal Marines, 67th, and 102nd Regiment of French, advanced, the Bulls, and other enjoyed the sport. The Englishmen remained in reserve. The Chinese replied with great spirit, but little apparent skill, almost all their shells bursting short, and their sound shot falling every where but in the fort. In arriving at a point of land, distant about 1500 yards from the fort, the infantry were halted, and made to lie down. The artillery continued to advance in columns varying from 500 to 1000 yards, and opened a still more telling fire, sending every shell and round-shot amongst the forts, and in a short hour nearly silencing the enemy's big guns. The infantry then advanced again—half of the French regiment and the wing of the 44th being ordered to the right flank, while one wing of the Royal Marines advanced with scaling-ladders and pontoons, and the other wing, with the remainder of the French, remained in reserve. As the enemy's party got close, the fire poured into the fort from our batteries became terrific. Shot and shell fell in a shower of shell, and the fire of every minute, and the enemy could not show themselves above the parapet at all. Through the loopholes, however, they kept up a heavy fire of musketry, which was returned in like manner by our sharpshooters. Occasionally, too, a big gun from the south side sent a round shot plump in among the advancing troops. The most determined resistance to the attack took place inside the fort, and the terrific fire they were being subjected to, but the moment the first gun to a great height their shots were consequently few and far between. This fort was fronted by two wet ditches, the outer one being feet in depth, and the inner one eight feet deep, the first one defended, moreover, by a strong abattis, the second by sharp stakes on both sides. On arriving at the first ditch, the Royal Marines, of course, experienced, by using the pontoons, the men being knocked over here by the dozen. The Royal Marines, the 67th, and the Royal Engineers, under Captain Colonel Travers, stuck to their work, however, and planted the ladders against the wall, and over they went—some 200 of them—in a moment. A few minutes' fighting with the bayonet, closely followed, however, by some Marines, and thereby the rest of the storming party. The French adopted a very similar plan to that of the Royal Marines, and their Chinese coolies and made them stand in the ditch holding scaling-ladders up over the top of the wall, and so got over the second ditch and got to the top of the wall. The Tartars fought bravely, even after the fort was taken, occupying the guns and firing upon the troops, and were shot and bayonetted in numbers. They finally fled, however, through the embrasures on the southern side of the fort, and endeavoured to make their escape to the next fort, which half a mile off, few with success, however, the greater number being shot in the attempt. Our loss in killed and wounded amounted to 201."

PRESENTATIONS TO THE BOSTON VOLUNTEER CORPS.

On Thursday week the Mayoress of Boston, in the name of the ladies of the town and neighbourhood, presented a silver trumpet to the Artillery Corps attached to the Rifle Corps of the 4th Lincolnshire Rifle Volunteers, and Engineers of the 4th Lincolnshire Rifle Volunteers, in the name of the ladies of Boston and the neighbourhood, I have the pleasure of appearing before you for the purpose of presenting to you this mark of appreciation of the manner in which you have come forward at the call of your country. They express their thanks to the gentlemen who, at all your countrymen, feel at the success of this patriotic movement, which has called down the admiration of our foreign friends. It shows that, at the slightest shadow of danger, strong hands and brave hearts are ever ready to unite together, in defence of our hearths and homes, and that at the slightest danger to which our England will need no better bulwarks than her brave volunteers, and that you will be found ready to defend with your property and your religion, the only one which we, as women and Christians, can countenance. I have also to present you with your trumpet—Captain Garfit: I present you with this bugle; and may they never sound but for the peaceful purpose of calling you to your duties. You should be called upon to be used on the bloody field of war, may your actions be in accordance with the motto engraven on them—"Vigilans Sed Pacis."

Captain White returned thanks on behalf of the Artillery Corps, and said that, if they had received any other encouragement than for the faithful and punctual performance of the duties they had taken upon themselves, they had received it that day, in the presence of their friends and fellow-townsmen, and in the presence of their native town. It was not in his place to speak of the exertions and value of the volunteer force, but he felt sure that the ladies would ever remember that they should be called upon to fight in defence of their native land, they would be found ready to handle the weapons which were placed in the militia.

Captain Garfit said the volunteers had been enrolled for the noblest of all purposes—the defence of their Queen and their native land. They believed that they had already done something in preserving peace. They had also shown themselves that they were ready to do their duty, and if anything was required to make that duty a pleasure it was the countenance and support which they had received from their fellow-townswomen. He rejoiced to find the sympathies of the ladies were with them, and that they were ready to encourage them. The ladies had also bugle sounding above the roar of artillery and rifles on the field of battle, that it had been given to them by the ladies of their native town. He hoped that the 4th Lincolnshire Rifles be handed the ladies of Boston for their very handsome gift.

The trumpets and bugle were then called forward, and the beautiful instruments given into their keeping.

Major Bourchier also returned thanks, and said the volunteers wanted nothing now to make them perfect but steady attention to drill. During the twelvemonth they had been exceedingly well drilled, but they were anxious to learn. He trusted to see them continue to pay the same steady attention during the next three or four years as they had done during the past year. He was sure that the ladies of the town might be satisfied that their handsome gifts had been unworthily bestowed.

Captain Garfit then called forward from the ranks Alfred Wren, and presented him with a medal for being the best shot in the company; Sergeant Whelpton received a second medal as the second-best shot; and Corporal Sharp a field-glass as the best shot at short ranges. Alfred Wren was also presented by Ensign Cox with one of Hayes' rifles, having made the greatest number of hits at the rifle contest on October 3.

After three hearty cheers had been given for the ladies, the rifle company went through a variety of skirmishing manœuvres, and

THE PRINCE OF WALES AT HAMILTON, CANADA WEST.

HIS Royal Highness had a grand reception at Hamilton, the prettiest little city pertaining on its best to the Queen's dominions. Here the state labours of the Prince may be said to have closed. The most important of his labours at Hamilton was the formal opening of the waterworks and the opening of the Great Agricultural Exhibition of Upper Canada, the Crystal Palace—a temporary one of which took place on the 19th and the latter on the 20th of September.

THE WATERWORKS.

These works were commenced in 1857 and completed in 1860, a period of about two years and a half having been occupied in their construction. The water is derived from Lake Ontario, which is about 40 miles distant. The water is derived from Lake Ontario, upon which the city of Hamilton fronts, though in communication with Lake Ontario, is separated mainly at the shores and inlets, and so much influenced by the landwash and sewage as to render it objectionable as a source of supply. Burlington Bay (which is the name given to that portion of C.W. D. LA FRENIERE, Rotterdam.—I perceive it is a print under examination. the lake which fronts the city) is a fine sheet of water, running up into the country about seven miles, and varying in breadth from half a mile to two miles. The water from the lake, where its width is under five miles, through which a navigable channel or canal is maintained by parallel lines of piers, is, when drawn from a depth of not less than 40 feet, considered pure water from the bay after an easterly storm has brought sand into the mouth. Advantage has been taken of this fact in the mode in which the supply before it is pumped. A long, wide, and deep trench has been excavated parallel with the lake shore, about four miles from the shore-water line, into which the lake water passes through a natural filter-bed, and thence is raised by two powerful engines to a reservoir an distance of three miles and a half from the lake, and two miles and a half from the city, giving a total length of six miles of pumping-main. The water used in the reservoir is 107 feet above Lake Ontario, which gives an effective fire-pressure over nearly the whole town, thus dispensing with engines. The cost of the works was about 200,000 sterling—a very large sum for the size of the city, which is not now supposed to contain more than 20,000 inhabitants; but it is anticipated that the reduction in the rate of insurance effected by the works will amount to the greater part of the annual interest on the cost of the works, and that the water rates collected from the use of the fire-plugs, street and street-watering will make up the balance, while a considerable surplus for future purposes will be caused by their development. The whole of the works were designed and carried out under the direction of Thomas Keefer, Esq., as eminent Canadian engineer.

INAUGURATION OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

The Royal party arrived at the Crystal Palace about half-past eleven o'clock. The streets through which his Royal Highness and suite passed were crowded with people, who cheered vehemently as the party passed. On their arrival on the ground the President and officers of the society conducted his Royal Highness and suite to the platform prepared for them, and here, in the presence of between forty and fifty thousand people, an address was read by Mr. Wade, President of the Association, which began as follows:—

We, the agriculturists, artisans, and manufacturers of Upper Canada, beg to represent to your Royal Highness assembled with us on this occasion, that our best Greetings Majesty's crown and person, and to express our loyal and affectionate devotion to her throne and family. In the products of our soil and of our industry. This is the fifteenth exhibition of the Agricultural Association of Upper Canada, and we think it demonstrates to those who have witnessed the successive exhibitions that the country over which it is exercises a the maintenance of the religious and civil rights of all classes of her subjects, we have still sought the magnificent events of your Royal Highness's visit to this colony, and resides that we have the opportunity of exhibiting to your Royal Highness what we have among all its branches of industry, exhibiting to our future Sovereign such proof of the industry, skill, and intelligence of the inhabitants of this country.

His Royal Highness then read the following reply:—

Gentlemen,—I return you my sincere acknowledgments for the address which you have just presented, upon the occasion of the opening of the Agricultural exhibition of the Agricultural Society of Upper Canada, and I take this opportunity of congratulating the agricultural and industrial communities who are now assembled from distant parts in the county of Hamilton for the more than usual and remarkable reception which the Queen's representative has repeated to-day. Blessed with a soil of very remarkable fertility, and a hardy race of industrious and enterprising men, the husbandry of Canada is a most important position in the markets of the world, and I rejoice to learn that the improvements in agriculture, especially in cattle, sheep, and horses, of late years developed in this northern country are not increasing the capabilities of your soil, and that it is enable you to export annually large supplies to those people whose stock and other products are not sufficient for their wants. Gentlemen, I am glad to see the Almighty has this year granted you that great boon—a people—an abundant harvest, and I am sure you are glad many a home of those I see around me, and bring increased wealth and prosperity to the numerous settlers on the fertile lands under the dominion of the Queen, deputed by me to visit British North America, cause this day: but in a private capacity. I am about to visit, and I am sure you will join me, a remote side land which claims with us a common ancestry, and in whose extraordinary progress and future magnificent destiny we cannot but feel sympathy. I visit British soil, let me once more address through you the inhabitants of Western Canada, and tell them an affectionate farewell, and express to them my sincere hope that they may long continue to enjoy the blessings of peace and prosperity which they now possess.

His Royal Highness and suite then left the platform to the music of the band, and proceeded to the building, which is a temporary one, and the fifteenth annual exhibition of the Agricultural Association of Upper Canada.

THE WHITE HOUSE, WASHINGTON.

THE mansion of the President of the United States, the private residence of the Prince's reception at the President's mansion, but the interior—"On the morning of the 19th (the day after the Prince's visit (on the 18th of October) there was a reception at the White House, which was thronged during a couple of hours by many hundreds of ladies and gentlemen. The famous White House is not, however, the most very large, mansion; it contains some handsome apartments, and in the interior decorations and style of furniture is a fair specimen of Republican simplicity. The reception was held in the east room, a noble apartment, 80 feet by 40 feet; it runs the full depth of the mansion, and has six windows, three at each extremity; the hangings are of white and crimson satin damask, and the floor is covered with There are handsome pier-glasses between the windows, resting upon carved and gilt tables, with marble slabs. There are four richly-carved white marble chimney-pieces, over which are handsome mirrors. At the space between the two fireplaces, on the east side of the apartment, is the place where the President stands to receive his visitors. There is here a wide window, over which is a magnificent gilt cornice, in the centre covered with the American eagle, all gilt, surmounting the escutcheon of the Republic. On the ceiling above the national arms are painted in fresco; the draperies are of rich crimson satin damask and white lace. The ceiling is flat, panelled, and painted in fresco. The carpet, manufactured expressly for the spacious apartment, is of very handsome design. The furniture is of modern French fashion, the material mahogany, covered with crimson damask. The grand reception-room is further lighted by a very large and handsome crystal chandelier; the paper on the walls is white and gold. The tout ensemble is handsome, if not splendid, and, when filled with gaily-dressed ladies and gentlemen, many in uniform, presented an imposing appearance. Adjoining the large apartment is the green room; the curtains are of green damask, the wall paper is also green, and so is the carpet. There is a superb white marble mantelpiece, on which rest several magnificent vases. The centre piece is a bust of Washington surrounded by a wreath of flowers, also from Japan, stands near the fireplace. The windows command a fine view of well-kept gardens, with rich parterres of flowers, and trim lawns, adorned with statues and a fountain. At the reception there was very little ceremony. The venerable President, who has a fine exterior, and whose manners are highly polished, stood in the centre of the room, having the Prince on his right. Lord Lyons occupied a position close to his Royal Highness. The President shook hands as each person was presented, and the Prince bowed, but sometimes the ladies succeed in getting a curtsey of his Royal Highness. The whole scene was very interesting to a stranger. There was a diplomatic dinner in the evening; and subsequently Miss Lane, the President's niece, held a reception. A display of fireworks also took place within sight of the mansion.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

D. T.—The report of Mr. Louis Paulsen's arrival in England is premature; but we believe he is on the Continent, and we hope he intends to visit us next year. We have not seen his new contrivance.

CHESS SECRETARY.—Mr. Kling has left town again; we are told, with a view to deliver a series of chess lectures in various towns, in which country his name will be favourably known. Newark, Hull, and Newcastle, not chosen to mention. Your best plan will be to write to him at the Caledonian Hotel, Adelphi, London, W.C.

A Lancashire and Yorkshire reader is kind enough to direct his proposal to the secretary of the Westminster Chess Club.

SOLUTION OF PROBLEM No. 571.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. B to K 6th	1. K to B 7th, or
2. B takes K P	B takes R (ch)
(or)	(or)
1. B to Q 8th (ch)	1. Q moves
2. B takes Q (ch)	2. Q moves (ch)
3. B takes Q (ch)

Black has a variety of moves beside those we have given, but in every case he is shown mated in two moves.

PROBLEM No. 573.

By Mr. ALFRED KEMPE.

One of the competing Problems for the Cambridge Prize.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White, playing first, to mate in three moves.

MATCH BETWEEN MR. KOLISCH AND MR. HORWITZ.

As a record of a contest between the players of distinction we account it desirable to publish the following games, although they possess no intrinsic excellence whatever to entitle them to preservation.

GAME III.

(Played at Paris.)

WHITE (Mr. H.)	BLACK (Mr. K.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt to K B 3rd
3. B to Q B 4th	B to Q B 4th
4. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt takes K P
5. P to Q B 3rd

(The customary move here is P to Q 4th.)

5. B to K 3rd	P to Q 4th
6. P to Q 3rd	Kt to K B 3rd
7. P to K R 3rd	B to K 3rd
8. Kt to Q B 3rd	P to Q B 3rd
9. Kt to Q 5th	Kt to Q 2nd

(Had we seen this move we should have played to Q Kt 4th (ch), &c.)

10. Kt takes B	P takes Kt
11. Castles	Q to Q B 2nd
12. B to K R 4th	Q R to K sq
13. Q Kt to Q 4th	Q R to K 3rd
14. Q Kt to K 2nd	B to K 2nd
15. Kt to K 3rd	Kt to K 5th
16. Kt to K B 5th	P to K R 4th
17. P to K R 4th	P to K Kt 3rd

(Rendering the probability of Black playing to Kt takes Kt(ch), unlikely.)

17.	P to K R 4th

And, after a few more inconsequential moves, Mr. Horwitz surrendered.

(Ruy Lopez—Knight's Opening.)

WHITE (Dr. K.)	BLACK (Mr. H.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt to Q B 3rd
3. B to Kt 5th	P to Q R 3rd
4. B to Q 4th	P to Q 4th
5. P takes P	Q to K 2nd
6. Kt to K 5th	Kt to Q 5th
7. Kt takes K P	B to Q 2nd
8. Kt takes B	P takes Kt
9. Kt to K B 3rd	P to K Kt 3rd
10. B to Q 3rd (ch)	K to Q sq
11. Q to R 2nd	Kt to Q 4th
12. Q to K 2nd	P to K B 3rd
13. P to Q B 3rd	Kt to K B 2nd

(Black's game is now irredeemably lost.)

14. P to Q 4th	P to K B 4th
15. Kt to Q 2nd	Castles on K's R
	(A hydrostatic sacrifice for a player used to the Muzio Gambit, but a very good move in the circumstances.)
16. Q takes B	Q R to K sq

(Mr. Horwitz calls to us what would be the result of Q takes Q P, and we find that the following would be the result:—17. Q to K 5th (ch), K to Q sq; 18. Q to K 7th (ch), K to B sq; 19. Q to K 8th (ch), K to Kt 2nd; 20. B to K 6th (ch), K to R 3rd; 21. Q to K 3rd (ch), K to Kt 4th; 22. P to K R 3rd (ch), K to R 5th; 23. Q to K 2nd (ch), K to R 6th; 24. VICTOR EMMANUEL DIRECTING THE BOMBARDMENT OF CAPUA.

THE bombardment of Capua began on the afternoon of the 1st inst., and on the following morning the garrison surrendered. A lively picture of the bombardment is given in a letter from the camp:—"At three o'clock King Victor Emmanuel passed on his way to Santa Maria. The King was alone in a small carriage with his Adjutant, without escort. The King came back at half-past three, and ascended the top of Monte S. Angelo, accompanied by Generals Sonnaz, Menebrea, and De la Rocca. Arrived at the top, the King himself planted the red flag which was to serve as the signal for the commencement of the bombardment. He then went down the mountain halfway, and took up his position between two rocks, to shelter himself from the wind, which blew very cold. An Adjutant placed a telescope before him, but he only made use of his eyeglass. Victor Emmanuel has quite a bronze colour, and thus looks remarkably like a quadroon or mulatto. His fingers are covered with rings. He speaks very loudly, and everybody goes and talks to him without further ado. At four o'clock the battery of Casa Bianca set the first shell flying. A quarter of an hour afterwards the walls of Capua were surrounded by a circle of white smoke. The artillery of the Italian army fired badly and very slowly. The battery of Porticelli wasted almost all its shots. The batteries on the left were somewhat more effective. The Neapolitans fired very well, but their bombs did little execution, on account of the muddy state of the ground. One artillerist and one mule killed constitute the whole loss of the Garibaldians. At five o'clock the firing was very brisk. Victor Emmanuel looked at Capua through his eyeglass now and then, and I heard him remarking, 'It is a pity that we have to do damage to so handsome a town; I wish they would capitulate quickly.'" The Daily News of Tuesday last contains a letter from its special correspondent in Italy, who writes as follows respecting the bombardment of Capua:—"The battery which threw the first shell was that on the extreme right, commanded by the Piedmontese Captain, Gusberti. It consisted of three mortars, and of three rifled 12-pounders. The other five batteries followed its example, and in less than five minutes a dense circle of smoke covered all our lines from Carditello on the left to the Volturno on the right. The bastions of Capua, in their turn, opened fire with their heavy guns, and a most dreadful cannonade ensued. The sky was covered by dense clouds crossed by the luminous parabolas of the slowly-falling shells. As the daylight gradually disappeared and the darkness came on, the aspect of the murderous fight became still more imposing and terrible. Nothing was to be seen but the flashes of the guns and the luminous curves traced by the shells on the black sky. Nothing was to be heard but the roaring of the iron mouths and the terrible noise of the falling houses of the town. A strong north wind, from time to time, brought to my ear the loud screams of the unhappy inhabitants.

GARIBALDIANS CROSSING THE VOLTURNO.

Colonel Dowling, assisted by English volunteers, threw a bridge across the Volturno, and the Garibaldian troops commenced crossing on the morning of the 26th ult., to form their junction with the Sardinian army. The Neapolitans had previously abandoned all their positions, and had fallen back towards Gaeta. The passage of the Volturno took place without accident—a circumstance no doubt due (says one correspondent) to the shaky appearance of the bridge, which impressed man and beast with due caution. Day was just dawning when the Garibaldini passed this Rubicon. The line of march was the high road from Capua to Isernia, passing through Calvi: striking off from this road to the west, halfway between Capua and Calvi, is the road to Gaeta. On and on the column wound, like a brilliant serpent, with the muskets catching now and then a ray of the sun. That night the Garibaldian troops camped out, and the next morning moved towards Teano, near which town the meeting of Garibaldi and Victor Emmanuel, already described, took place.

THE FIRST VISIT OF VICTOR EMMANUEL TO THE CAMP OF THE NATIONAL ARMY AT ST. ANGELO.

On the morning of the 27th ult. Victor Emmanuel, accompanied by a few of his Staff, visited the left bank of the Volturno and the camp of the Garibaldini. As soon as his presence was known to the troops they crowded the sides of the road, and gave him a most enthusiastic reception. In the rear of our Engraving is a house which had been occupied by an advanced post of Garibaldini previous to the bridge being thrown across, and its surface shows good evidence of the rifle and cannon practice of the Neapolitans, who, in the hope of dislodging their foe, kept up an incessant fire upon it. On the background rises the Hill of St. Angelo.

SABOTS ELASTIQUES, AN APPARATUS FOR WALKING ON WATER.

This practicability of walking on water has from time to time engaged the attention of scientific minds in Europe from a comparatively early period. We were recently shown an engraving, bearing the date of 1641, which represents a man with large flat sabots upwards of six feet, and a huge cylindrical belt buckled round his waist, who is described as "water-walker." Unfortunately, the letterpress, though evidently taken from some book, being unaccompanied by any explanatory notes, any allusion to the principle on which locomotion is to take place in the dark as to the means by which the pedestrian contrived to maintain his buoyancy and equilibrium. The next representation in point of date, as well as nature, is a modern one, and probably forms the subject of the above Engraving, and which is preserved in the MS. apparatus of the British Museum. It is accompanied by a brief specification, without date, but probably written towards the end of the last century, explaining the object of the invention and the nature of the contrivance by which he trusted to effect it. This man, one Senor Perer, a Spaniard, appears to have been a cool-headed, sensible person, fully alive to all the difficulties of his undertaking, and not at all disposed to overestimate its utility and importance.

He speaking of the various "artizers" who had occupied themselves in discovering a method of walking upon the water, he tells us that "one Limani thought fit, in 1785, to publish to those uneducated in these matters that he had found means of walking on water with a dry foot." The Governor, it seems, had given Limani a sum of money for the secret, but, on examination, it was found that nothing could be made. "There my hero appeared, pulled on his shoes, began to walk, and immediately vanished backwards, his head beneath, and his feet above the water. In this position he would have remained, had not people from the shore assisted in case of accident rendered him assistance. After this failure the report went forth that it was impossible to walk upon water. These words induced the Governor of Gibraltar to send for me, and to prove to others that the exploit was quite practicable. My first obstacle was to discover some method to prevent an upset, and also how to overcome the fear of drowning, a kind of ballast or counterpoise was indispensable.

"Upon this, I caused two boxes to be made large enough to displace a volume of water equal to the weight of my body, and to that of the balance. Another impediment then presented itself—viz., that of making them steer. A keel distance to prevent their separation. For this purpose I had three triangles made, each furnished with a pivot at their angles, and placed in sockets of brass, arranged in such fashion as to allow the boxes to advance in parallel, one with the other. When this was done, to prevent the boxes being open, and that they might be always kept under water, it was necessary to construct two other small boxes, open at one end, to fix to each of the large ones, and to attach them by a stem of iron. These boxes hinder a man from sinking below the sole of his foot.

"After all this was done, I had a pond d'appui in the water to be enabled to go here and there, for, without that, my invention would be useful for nothing else than to walk in a straight line. Had I even way not too rapid; and I have traversed the Seine several times without much opposition.

He then goes on to describe his plan for overcoming the difficulties arising from a rapid flow, which consists of a contrivance somewhat resembling the paddle-box of a steam-vessel, as follows:—"Thus, I believe, I have surmounted the most formidable obstacles. *1st. The equilibrium, by means of the boxes, which form the double property of floats and machine beneath the surface of the water, and which in consequence renders the submersion of the man impossible. *2nd. The steering. 3rd. I have prevented the view of any part of the mechanism beyond the sheet of the water, which is effected by the immersion of the crest of the two boxes, so that they shall not hinder the walk of the man; 5th. The feet of the man are always above water, and cannot sink one more than the other, which is the cause of accidents. How it came to pass that the original drawing and specification of this machine remained in Spain, by all of which it should appear that the inventor's hero escaped notice, we are unable to tell. They are there, and this so far as we know, is the first time a specimen has been given of either of them.

In 1838 the Brussels journals gave an account of one M. Teissier who "walked upright in the water, dressed as Neptune, and carried in his hand the emblem of the fabled god," and who, "having advanced about 50 yards in the river, fell backwards, and disappeared in the space of twenty minutes." But they say nothing of the mechanism by which these evolutions were performed. A few years later we find the same feat was accomplished on the Seine, in Russia, by aid of a newly-discovered apparatus called the "water-shoe." And, again, about the same period, that a similar attempt had been made with complete success both at Dresden and Stuttgart, where "some expert swimming masters undertook the experiment for a wager with the recently-devised submersible shoes." The experiment was as follows:—"Two hundred and fixed off the fowling-piece several times in succession, and the Dresdener quickly smoked his cigar. In both these instances, as well as in the performance on the Neva, there appears to have been no exertion of mechanical skill. The apparatus, we take it, was simply that adopted in 1845 by two young men—a Swede and a Norman—who, according to the report of the Continental papers, deriving the idea from the year called skee, by aid of which the inhabitants of the Northern regions traverse the snow-filled valleys and ravines without sinking, established at Hanover the exploit not only of walking, but of even running upon the water. With similar appliances of schneeschuhen, skates, &c., as they are more classically called, porteurspalu a Mr. Ochonez, about two years since, won a wager by ascending the Rhine, from Rotterdam to Cologne, in that time. Instead of using one foot before the other, he is described as standing erect on his sabots, which were about fifteen feet long, and two inches broad, and propelling himself by paddling with a long pole, flattened at the end—a mode of progression which cannot fairly be ranked with that of perambulating the water step by step.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

A NEW COMET was discovered on October 23 and 24 by M. Temple at the Observatory at Marseilles.

THE SIXTY-SECOND NEW PLANET, recently discovered at Berlin, has been named "Ceres," the name of the Muse devoted to love and marriage.

PROFESSOR H. DUFF'S "STUDIES IN ELECTROLYSIS" have been translated from the German, and are appearing in the Bibliotheque de Geneve, edited by Professor De la Rive.

GEODESY OF UPPER ETHIOPIA, &c.—The first part of a large work on this subject, by M. d'Abbadie, revised by M. Bertrand, has been laid before the French Academy. The author has thoroughly explored the country from 1838 to 1848, and in 1849 published a resume of his operations which he has determined, and which were noted by the late M. Jacoby in the Geographical Journal of Berlin. The first part is preliminary, and contains the modes of observation, &c.

THE ARCHIPELAGO OF MERIDIONALIS, an elegant and rare neuropterous insect, of the extreme south of France, is described by M. Leon Dufour in the new number of the Annales des Sciences Naturelles. The insect, which somewhat resembles the ant-lion, has a rapid but short flight, and is nearly provided with four membranous wings inclosed in a sheath, and several of these insects are inclosed in a box they will even attack and devour each other. The specimens described in an engraving.

THE WINTER-SLEEP OF MARMOTS has been investigated by M. G. Valentin, particularly with respect to the movements of the heart. The insertion of a thermometer, and the observations during a long period, showed that the heart oscillations of the ventricles was normal in a moderate degree of warmth, but that the pulsations were found to be more profound, and the number of pulsations increased. The respiration was also found to be normal in a moderate degree of warmth, but irregular, and increases in proportion as the number of pulsations increased. The waking of the marmot was found to be preceded by a movement of the sole of its foot with sulphuric acid, usually applied to the nostrils, which produced violent inspirations. Experimenting further, M. Valentin states that the destruction of a considerable quantity of blood by bleeding or hemorrhage caused the animal (after six hours) to awake, and to go to vigorous action.

THE PROGRESS OF SCIENCE is recorded by the German philosophers in their annual volumes. Professors Kopp and Will, of Giessen, have just published their annual report for 1859, especially devoted to the progress of chemistry and the allied sciences. The Royal Society of Berlin have completed the fourteenth volume of their series, and that of Munich the twelfth. In England and the physical sciences, so much to be regretted that electricity and the physical sciences, social volumes like those of Berlin and Munich, which record the yearly progress of the different parts of his "Bio-graphical and Literary Dictionary," and the History of the Exact Sciences," graphical and Literary Dictionary," and the History of the Exact Sciences," combining memoirs of the lives and works of mathematicians, astronomers, physicists, naturalists, navigators, engineers, and all countries and times, which further information, to be comprised in an appendix. The new part includes the letters from A to Z.

THE CHEMISTRY AND PHYSIOLOGY OF BONE form the subject of a series of studies by M. Alphonse Milne Edwards in the new number of the Annales des Sciences Naturelles. He examines the structure of the bones of Mammalia, Birds, Reptiles, and Fishes, with the minutest detail of the tissues of Malder, Ferey, Merchand, Müller, and others. Bone consists of animal matter, which is soft, flexible, and elastic, and of mineral matter, principally phosphate of lime, with some phosphate of magnesia, the fluoride, phosphate, and carbonate of lime, and traces of soda, sulphur, in the forms of gelatinous matter, fat, phosphoglyceric acid, and albumen. The proportion of the animal and mineral substances is variable in water. M. Milne Edwards has experimented severely upon all the bones of the human body, and arrives at the following conclusions:—The decomposed tissues subsists as the result of the combination with phosphate of lime; gelatine exists in the bones of the adult, and in those of the child in time; the carbonate of lime is combined with the phosphate of lime, and not with the gelatine or the organism, and is less in proportion in the bones of the child than in those of the adult; the fluoride of lime is in the composition of bone, &c. The mode of experimenting on the bones of man and other animals, and the various ages examined and analysed, by the author memoir occupies 180 pages.

GEOLOGY OF SCOTLAND.—In the new number of the Journal of the Geological Society of Dublin, Professor Jukes reviews his researches, the subject of his latest communications being the "Drift or Boulder Period" of Scotland, and the relations of the subject to the Glacial Period and many engravings of the sections of the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, and the Pentland Hills and the west. He gives the following as the general results:—1. A period when the plateaux of the Lowlands were covered by a thick boulder clay, with the moraine country stood as high or greatly higher than at present, and the subjacent rocks, destroyed the inequalities of the surface, and the subjacent rocks, destroyed the pre-existing sinuosities, and rounded off the hills and valleys. 2. A pre-existing sinuosities, and rounded off the hills and valleys. 2. A period of submergence, when the sea covered all the country. 3. A gradual emergence, during which the accumulation of sand and gravel, with the transported blocks of the land retained a higher position than it now has, and the Lowlands were covered by a forest of Scotch Firs, and by a peculiar assemblage of animals and plants migrated thither from adjoining lands. 4. The land attained its present level, and for many forty feet above the present tide-mark; and the clay of the "carses" of the Forth and Tay was deposited in the estuaries then occupied by which the land attained its present level.—In the same journal appear some notes, by Mr. C. Gustav Thost, upon the "Glacial and Post-glacial Deposits of the Roman Country" in the Highlands, which he compares to Switzerland, where a great variety of minerals is found in the drift, and where the glaciers are still retiring and receding.

ATOMIC OR MOLECULAR WEIGHT OF SIMPLE SUBSTANCES.—M. J. S. Stas, an eminent chemist, has published the first part of a memoir on this subject, which is an important memoir on this controverted question, which memoir has been crowned and printed at the expense of the Belgian Government. In this memoir M. Stas states, the illustrious Swedish chemist Berzelius, after having made a great number of researches, deduced from chemical proportions or equivalents, coincided from his researches that these numbers represented the atomic weights, or the weight of the smallest particle of matter which can enter into combination, or which can exist in the free state. In 1815, however, Dr. William Prout, in a memoir published in the Annals of Philosophy, advanced the opinion that the atomic weight of bodies, well determined, at that time, might be represented by whole numbers, that of oxygen = 100. This opinion has generally received in England, but not on the Continent, and was shown to be incorrect by Berzelius, Dumas, and Stas. The latter undertook his researches in respect to carbon was shown by Dumas and Stas; and also in 1850, with respect to chlorine, bromine, and iodine, by Marignac and Marchand, and subsequently arrived at a totally different conclusion. Since then M. Stas has given that question much attention, and has published the present memoir, which will add confidence in the correctness of Prout's hypothesis. The author has arrived at the conclusion that the atomic weights are not proportionals, and all the conclusions derived from it by Dumas and others, and that Prout's hypothesis is not admissible, and that we are yet in error among the weights of simple bodies which unite to form definite combinations. His views will certainly be opposed.

PRIZE FOR AN ESSAY ON SEAWEEDS.—Sir W. C. Trevelyan has placed at the disposal of the council of the Society of Arts the sum of £100, to be awarded in the course of the present year "On the uses of the marine algæ, and their products, as food or medicine for man and domestic animals; and on the best means of collecting and preserving them, and of adapting for the results of original research, not mere compilations, and must be accompanied by a letter of authority from the chairman of the Sea-weed Curing and preserving them, and to send in before the 31st of December next.

NEW RAILWAY PROJECTS.—Application will be made next session for powers to construct a railway between Wrexham and Brightlingsea, near Colchester. Application will also be made on behalf of a line from Bishop Stortford to Braintree, via Dunmow. The Eastern Counties Company support the latter line, and have given the promoters of the undertaking for powers to construct a line diverging from the East Anglian, at Walkden, to Bridgwater, in Somersetshire. The Great Western Company have leases to Great Thetford, on the Cambridge main line; and a line from Long Stratton to Beccles, on the Yarmouth and Lowestoft line. The Suffolk and Essex Railway Company undertake (authorised last Session) on the Eastern Counties proceeding to establish a communication between those places.

THE dispute which has existed for such a long time past between the Meehlin line from and their workmen at Nottingham was brought to a satisfactory conclusion yesterday week, and the men resumed work.

According to a Paris correspondent the Czar of Russia has received the most cordial reception at Turin, by way of showing his resentment to the attitude which Sardinia has assumed. It is said that a decree to this effect has been dispatched to all the Russian embassies.

THE SISTERS MARCHISIO.

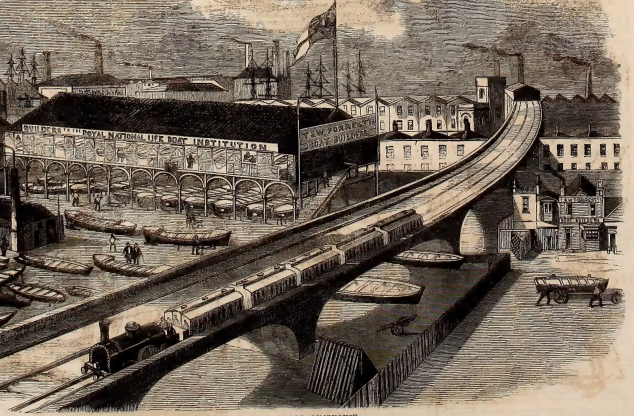
THESE ladies, at present the chief stars of the Parisian musical firmament, will, it is understood, soon appear above our horizon. In giving portraits of them in the character of Semiramide and Arsace (in Rossini's most gorgeous opera), in which they have created so great a sensation in Italy and France, we shall gratify, we think, our musical readers by extracting from the Constitutionnel the account given of them on the occasion of their début at the Grand Opera, in July last:—

"The Sisters Marchisio have only been two years on the stage. Mdlle. Barbara, the contralto, first made her début at Madrid. Mdlle. Carlotta, the soprano, had not at that time decided whether she should follow the same career. She was a pianist, a pupil of her brother, was a pianist, a pupil of her brother, one of the most eminent musicians in Turin, their native city. Nevertheless, the true strength and success of these two singers lies in their union. Their voices blend so finely that, when heard together, they seem to be but one. When the sisters were heard in "Semiramide" there was a cry of admiration, of which the echoes passed the Alps. Milan, Trieste, and Venice applauded them in succession, and Paris has only had her turn when they were able to disengage themselves from the last contract which bound them to the Scala.

"Mdlle. Carlotta, when she appeared on the stage, was greatly agitated. She trembled so much that she could not articulate a word, but the repeated bravos of the public enabled her to recover herself. She sang the cavatina 'Bel raggio' beautifully, and, according to the Italian fashion, was immediately recalled. Her voice, of a charming quality, of perfect flexibility, of singular freshness and purity, rises with no effort to the highest region of the scale, while her low and middle notes are not deficient either in sweetness or brilliancy. Her duet with Assur, the quartet, the finale, and, above all, the second duet with Arsace, were followed by loud applause. The magnificent andante 'Tu sereno intanto il ciglio' was encored; and the two sisters had to reappear in the midst of the warmest acclamations.

"Mdlle. Barbara was entirely successful in the part of Arsace. She was less agitated than her sister, or succeeded better in controlling her emotions. She declaimed the celebrated recitative 'Eccomi alfin in Babilonia,' with excellent accentuation, though she must have felt great difficulty in singing for the first time in French. She sang her air, the duet with Assur, and the first duet with Semiramide, exceedingly well; but the triumph of the two debutantes was in the marvellous adagio, which they vocalised with unparalleled grace, lightness, and delicacy. It was encored by the whole audience, and the sisters repeated it with the same perfection, changing the cadenza. At the succeeding performances their success has been still more brilliant and complete."

We may add, that "Semiramide," since its production in July, keeps exclusive possession of the Grand Opera stage, and that the Parisian public crowd nightly to hear and see these charming sisters with unabated curiosity and interest.



THE SISTERS MARCHISIO, AS "SEMIRAMIDE" AND "ARSACE," AT THE GRAND OPERA, PARIS.

MESSRS. FORREST'S LIFE-BOAT BUILDING-YARD.

THE accompanying Engraving represents the building establishment of the Messrs. Forrest, known as Norway Yard, Limehouse, where the boats of the Royal National Life-boat Institution are constructed. The firm of Messrs. Forrest is well known to the mercantile navy, having been in existence ever since 1786, during which period some thousands of their little craft have been carried by the shipping of England over the wide waters of the world. From this yard have also been launched boats of every size and variety—from the small, gaily-painted pleasure-boat floating on the ornamental waters of the "stately homes of England," with their merry-hearted crews of school-boys and happy sisters, to the more useful-looking cargo-vessels employed in our colonies, or some of the smaller of those dashing clipper-yachts of which England and her aristocracy are so justly proud. At the time our Sketch was taken as many as fourteen of the life-boats of the National Life-boat Institution were in different stages of construction, some of them only in frame, others prepared to be dispatched to their stations, to be ready for their errands of mercy.

In addition to the boats ordered by the before-named institution, a great many have been constructed for foreign and colonial Governments, of which we may mention Russia, Prussia, Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, South Australia, New South Wales, Vera Cruz, Ceylon, Mauritius, and Colombia. Eight life-boats of a smaller size, on the institution's plan, were recently built by Messrs. Forrests, by order of Messrs. Samuda (Brothers), to be carried on the decks of the Spanish vessels building by that celebrated firm at Millwall.

Messrs. Forrest have, we believe, been the sole builders to the National Life-boat Institution for the past eight years, and it is only proper to state that the success of the present highly-matured and approved plan of life-boat now adopted by the society is indebted to a very considerable extent to the intelligence and energy they have assiduously brought to bear, in conjunction with the officers of the Life-boat Institution, on this important and national subject.

THE RETURN OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

THE safe arrival of the Heir Apparent of the Crown of these realms from his transatlantic tour is suggestive in many respects. In his case the usual rapidity of locomotion which characterises a princely progress was at the last remarkably neutralised. However it may be on land, it seems that there is no royal road on the ocean; and the proximate Ruler of that Britannia which is said to rule the waves was baffled and delayed in his transit home by meteorological influences in an uncommon degree. It is an ill wind that blows no one good; and, if the Prince of Wales was obliged to encounter the tedium and the discomfort of a singularly-protracted voyage from one hemisphere to another, he has, perhaps, found compensation in learning how deep and breathless was the interest which pervaded the whole British mind in those days of suspense that intervened between the ordinary period in which a vessel makes a run from America to England and the moment of his actual arrival. Not so long ago an event connected with the fortunes of a member of the Royal family—the marriage of the Princess Royal—afforded an opportunity for a display of feeling on the part of the people of England which was characterised at the time as evincing an almost purely personal interest in, and affection for, a child of our Sovereign. The solemn anxiety with which, day by day, every one looked for the intelligence of the safe return of the Prince of Wales had its origin in a similar sentiment, intensified, no doubt, by the recollection of the peculiar position which his Royal Highness holds in reference to the body politic of the United Kingdom. In this instance happily the abstract reverence for that part of our institutions which is comprehended in the maintenance of a constitutional monarchy was mixed up with an individual regard for the eldest son of a Queen, who is justly believed to have taken care that, so far as judicious education in all its bearings is concerned, no peril should here-after arise to one of the main principles of our governmental system in the person of her heir. There have been Princes of Wales who, if they had been storm-delayed in the wide waste of waters that flows between Europe and the Western World, would have elicited no eager inquiry, have excited no earnest sympathy, and generated nothing like that sensation which prevailed all over this country a few days since, and which presented to the world a whole nation watching with bated breath but eager hope for the return of one who seemed to have been suddenly elected into membership with every family in the kingdom. It is not too much to say that the people of England in recurring to the conduct and demeanour of the young Prince during his visit to North America have been surprised into a pride in the boy. As yet no occasion had arisen for giving him a personal welcome; but he may be sure that the very first time he makes a public appearance he will learn unmistakably from the reception that will be given him that England is glad to see her Marcellus safe at home again.

A good deal has been said, and justly, with regard to the judgment which dictated this tour of the Prince; and although it is probable that the fact will, ere long, pass into that region where the nine days' wonders of this fast-going world find a resting-place, if not an oblivion, it is still not too late to dwell once more on some of the effects which will have been produced by this remarkable excursion. It is not very likely that any direct or immediate results will arise. There was nothing in the exact nature of a political purpose or any palpable and positive object to be attained by what was in itself more of an educational exercise for the Prince than anything else. Fortunately, in our own colonies there was no disorganisation, social or political, on which the presence of the son of the Queen might have been experimentally tried; and there was nothing in the mutual relations between this country and the United States towards the adjustment of which a personal visit from such an unofficial plenipotentiary as the Prince of Wales might have done something. The exhibition of no such unusual phase of diplomacy was needed in either case, and all that has occurred has only tended towards the furtherance and extension of the good feeling and good will already existing in reference to this country both in Canada and the United States. It is in this character as a high personal compliment from the Sovereign of Great Britain to her husband's former transatlantic dependencies, and as a friendly courtesy towards our kindred on the other side of the St. Lawrence, that this event was no doubt viewed. When, however, the enthusiasm of the reception with which the Prince was greeted has passed away it will be more than probable that it will be found that the circumstance of his visit has left behind it the seeds of advantages in reference to the future intercommunication between this country and the United States in particular.

Although of late years facility of intercourse between the two countries and commercial reciprocity have done much to tone down those international feelings which amounted almost to animosities, yet it is certain that a good deal of mutual jealousy, and not a little mutual distrust, continued to exist between Englishmen and Americans which was not merely national but almost personal. The quarrels of blood relations have been always the most bitter and the least reconcilable, and the instance of England and America has proved no exception. Time, the great soother, has done much; community of interests has been working with its usual force towards a more thorough understanding and the promotion of a better spirit between the two peoples; and it is, we believe, not too much to say that the acceptance of the hospitality, so cordial and so lavish, of the United States by the Prince of Wales may be taken as representing that shake of the hand which, among the Anglo-Saxon race, is emblematic of the restoration of perfect amity. There is a circumstance which, in speaking of this matter, should not be lost sight of. We refer to the very good taste which, as good feeling, which so eminently distinguish her, the Queen took the earliest opportunity after the return of the Prince of Wales to invite the Minister of the United States to pay her a visit at Windsor, in order that among the various tokens to meet him were the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary. This was a graceful and a delicate mode of acknowledging the hospitality which had been shown to her eldest son in the United States and will no doubt be accepted as such a recognition and duly appreciated in that country.

It needs no very prophetic inspiration to foresee that, in the changes and occurrences which are inevitably coming upon the world, and most certainly on the European world, the great moral importance that the best understanding and the most cordial alliance should exist between England and the United States. It is by no means impossible—indeed, the more we consider it, the more probable it seem,—that the time will come when Great Britain and America, the two representatives of political and personal freedom of thought and action, will be called upon to vindicate together the principles of that liberty in which they live and move and have their being against the combined despotisms of the earth. It is not in this way—the shades of difference between them being but slight and only turning on details, the broad and abstract principle being the same—to be an exemplar of the blessings of self-government. How great, then, would be the force of a junction of two such peoples and two such States in a crusade against that system of social and political organisation which prevails in almost every nation of Europe, and which everything shows is tottering to its fall! In the meantime, the two really great nations of the world are destined to teach others how to live as they themselves have learned to do, how gladly they should both welcome any event which tends, however silently, indirectly or remotely, to lessen the distance which old prejudices and recollections of the past have created between them! Such a circumstance, we are fully persuaded, is to be found in that interchange of kind feeling which was represented on our part in the intention and purpose of the visit of the Prince of Wales to the United States, and still more pointedly typified in the manner in which he was greeted by the citizens of that great Republic.

EMBARKATION OF THE EMPRESS OF AUSTRIA AT ANTWERP FOR MADEIRA.

The Empress of Austria arrived at Antwerp on Tuesday evening last at seven o'clock, accompanied by a numerous suite, and was received on the quay by the Burgomaster and the authorities who had been engaged for her by his Excellency Baron de Stuers, the Austrian Minister. The Empress and her suite were conducted to the Hôtel de Flandre, which had been taken at the station of Antwerp for Mayence. She was received by the Imperial Highness the Duchess of Brabant, and by the Count of Flanders, and several of the highest civil and military dignitaries of the Belgian Court. The Austrian and Belgian flags were likewise in attendance. Three bands and the troops of the garrison performed military honours on the occasion. The arrival of the Empress at St. Antoine and many of the public edifices were decorated with the colours of Austria, Brabant, and Belgium.

On Monday the British Royal yacht the Victoria and Albert and the Osborne arrived in the river, having been in attendance on the Prince of Wales during the Hanoverian voyage.

King Leopold arrived from Brussels at about seven o'clock on Wednesday morning, accompanied by a staff of Aides-de-Camp. General Brenaers, arriving at Antwerp at about the same time. The Duke of Brabant received his father-in-law by a salute in salutation.

At nine o'clock this morning, the Duchess of Brabant, and the Count of Flanders accompanied the Empress of Austria on board the Victoria and Albert, and, together with the distinguished persons of her suite, breakfasted with the royal family. The royal barges then left for the departure of the Royal guests, King Leopold and Prince Albert accompanying the Empress on board the yacht. The Empress and took their leave.

At the same time the Victoria and Albert and the Osborne left their moorings and proceeded to join the squadron of the river, the guns of the squadron firing a salute of one hundred and one guns. The Empress and her suite were received on board the Victoria and Albert by the Duke of Newcastle, Lord Alfred Paget, and Admiral Sir Thomas Maitland, Admiral Milne, and Admiral Dacres.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Moniteur has broken silence on the subject of the Emperor's visit to the country, and on Sunday it officially announced:—"Her Majesty the Empress has left Paris on a short tour in England and Scotland for the benefit of her health. The journey, which has been suffered in consequence of the death of her sister, the Duchess d'Alba."

The France Centrale, of Blois, has been suspended for two months by a decree of the Minister of the Interior for "violent attacks on the Constitution, and excitement to hatred and contempt under pretence of defending the interests of religion." The France Centrale had published an article against the law on the liberty of the French Bar.

The Paris Presse states that M. Thiers has just sent to the press the last sheet of the eighteenth volume of "History of the Consulate and the Empire," which will appear on December 5.

The new Bourse at Marseilles was opened on Saturday week, and in a short time 300 persons were regularly assigned to the agents-de-change, merchants, and brokers were filled. The total expense of the building, its first cost, and the ground, is estimated to have been 2,000,000f. M. Lepaute, of Paris, has fixed up a clock, which is said to be unequalled in the world, and it cost 30,000f. M. Jouffroy is admitted to be large sculptor of the Marseilles, has four smaller ones, showing the time at Trieste, Paris, Cadiz, and Constantinople.

SPAIN.

The Marquis de Miraflores has been appointed Spanish Ambassador at Rome. The Queen has presented a rich gold cross to the Pope.

The Epoca says that the letter which the Queen has written an autograph letter to the King of Naples explaining the line of policy which her Government is obliged to follow in consequence of circumstances, and expressing sympathy with his position.

The Congress assembled on the 12th instant, and reports from committees on the bill fixing the number of vessels in the navy for 1861, and on the budgets of the departments of War and Foreign Affairs, were presented.

ITALY.

THE SIEGE OF GAETA.

The siege of Gaeta continues; though, beyond a few skirmishes, in which the Sardinians have, as usual, got the best of it, there seems to be no progress to speak of. On land, the Neapolitan troops which were outside Gaeta have been driven within the walls. The Neapolitan garrison refuse to hoist another flag. The Sardinian Staff officer is increasing. Four Generals—Salasan, Colonna, Barbalonga, and Polizzi—have resigned. The last has thrown up his command in favour of General Bertolini. Colonel Pianelli has surrendered a battalion of chasseurs to the Piedmontese. Further resistance by the Bourbon troops is considered by the Piedmontese as mere stands and the confusion which prevails. The batteries of Capricorni and Santa Agata have been dismounted, and are in possession of the enemy. On Wednesday week twelve large rifled cannon were embarked at Genoa. They are intended for use against the fortress of Gaeta. Another gun, of the same description, has arrived. It was believed that, if nothing took place in the meanwhile, on the 25th inst. the fire of the besiegers would be opened from the heights which is now occupies, and will not cease till the town surrenders or can no longer be resisted.

Francis II. has addressed, under date the 15th, a second complaint to the European Courts, in which he enters more fully into the additional wrongs inflicted upon him since his first, and lays them all to the door of Victor Emanuel, whose decree disposing of the Neapolitan fleet he characterises as "a fresh act of violence and command upon the weakest terms as the act of a conqueror and brigand. The King's complaint to the Courts of Europe is followed by that of his Ambassador at the court of the Piedmontese troops into Naples, which protest the Spanish Minister, Count Bermudez de Castro, declares to be null, as by which the sovereignty of Naples was secured to the Spanish branch of the Bourbon family in this way—that the Duke of Parma and the Duke of Bourbon should be the heirs presumptive.

The news concerning the state of the Neapolitan kingdom grows worse and worse. Not only are the people declaring for Garibaldi's hands into Count Cavour's hands. The reactionary movement in the provinces is also increasing in importance. Ancona, it is said, now has its broken out afresh, and in not less than five provinces, with the Abruzzi at their head, has it become necessary to proclaim the state of siege.

Accounts from Naples make mention of ominous disturbances in Calabria. A meeting of 10,000 persons at Cosenza had declared itself in favour of "Francis II. and his constitutional Government," and shouted "Long live Garibaldi!" "The Dictatorship for ever!" "Death to the Piedmontese!" by the Royalist troops, and apparently without any bloodshed; but Signor Farini, Victor Emmanuel's Minister of the Interior, has issued a decree that the country is to be treated energetically" the leaders of the insurrection. The Sardinian soldiers have occupied the posts hitherto held by the Papal Gendarmerie, and the latter have been sent to Fort St. Elmo shall not be abolished, but shall be repaired and armed.

A decree by which the Dictator bestows Ducal honours on the soldiers of Garibaldi has been published. The King, after having declared that they had rendered themselves worthy of the nation's gratitude, institutes a commission for regulating the question of degree with regard to the Garibaldian officers, while the volunteers in general are invested with the rank of the Piedmontese soldiers, on condition that they bind themselves down to two years' service at least. The Prince Dictator Garibaldi, Duke of Caprera, and Count Bronzetti, under Garibaldi's command, rod have is to be accorded, and travelling expenses, of which the Neapolitan troops have been deprived. The decree of the last, says,—"The weather here at present is delightful, the air is balmy as in the month of May. It is what is called the Indian summer."

We have had another slighter shock of an earthquake. It was very sensibly felt on the opposite side of the lake at Rochester and Oswego, on the 26th ult., less so on the Canadian side.

The harvest has been considerably. The farmers are in good spirits, and are beginning to liquidate their debts to the storekeepers, which, as a class, are in a very prosperous state in the city. Trade is another year or two to make up fully for the late commercial depression.

The Hon. George Brown, leader of the Opposition, is receiving numerous invitations to address public meetings throughout Canada. Numerous invitations to address public meetings throughout Canada. News of the progress of the movement has been met by processions extending a mile in length. The Orange body had been creating some alarm, but, at a meeting of the Grand Lodge of Orangemen of Western Canada, held at Hamilton a few days ago, and at which 963 Orange lodges, comprising 50,000 members, were represented, the following resolution was adopted by a large majority:—

Resolved—That the Government of Canada having neglected to enforce the laws against the Roman Catholic Bishops in their leading on our citizens, and to lay down a proper programme for the occasion, and sanction the Orangemen in organising it, more especially as the Orangemen on that day as the responsible representatives of the people, and are determined to maintain the constitutional rights and liberties of the country, that the Right Worshipful Grand Lodge feels it to be its duty to call on the Most Worshipful Grand Master to convene a Grand Lodge of Representatives of the Orangemen of Western Canada, and that the proper constitutional manifestation at such step during the present crisis in the affairs of Canada, and the welfare of Great Britain, the progress of the Right Apostolic Religion throughout the world, and by withdrawing from them the direct and indirect support of the loyal Orange body.

THE FRENCH COINAGE.—In 1819 the Mint of Paris coined 31,737,981f. in gold, and only 5,875,941f. in silver. In 1859 it coined 79,339,840f. in gold, and only 8,873,941f. in silver. This fact accounts for the great scarcity of gold in circulation and the overflowing of silver.

THE TURKISH BANK.—The Paris papers assert that the necessary assurance has been received anon by the directors of the Turkish Bank for buying up the coinage at Constantinople and disbursing them from circulation.

CONSTANTINOPLE AND BAGDAD TELEGRAPH.—The telegraphic line between Constantinople and Bagdad is rapidly progressing towards completion. The Mosul station is now in full work. At Orfah and party have advanced as far as Korkuk; and this latter station will be opened in a few weeks. Bagdad, it is reported, will be in connection with the capital in three or four months. The line between the former city and Bussorah is the object of the difficulty of the country, which is traversed by powerful Arab tribes.

The Empress of the French.—Yesterday week her Majesty left London for Hamilton Palace Scotland, as a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Hamilton, Duke of Sudery of Hamilton, and Brandon. Her Majesty reached York, and took up her abode, with her suite, at the Royal Station Hotel. After breakfast on Saturday she spent nearly an hour in the cathedral, flanked by the Dean and Canon Hay, Dr. Monk playing voluntaries on the organ, and the great being lighted up specially for her inspection. Her Majesty arrived at Edinburgh in the afternoon, and was met by a large assemblage of curious spectators, who cheered her Majesty heartily. On Sunday she attended high mass at Grand Master's Church, Edinburgh, and on Monday left for Dalkeith Palace, the Prince of Wales having preceded her the previous day. The Empress and her party walked both to their hotel through a great shower of snow. In the afternoon they took a walk round the outside of the city. On Monday the Empress Eugenie visited the chief sights of Edinburgh—the castle, Holyrood Palace, Arthur's Seat, and Leith Fort. She inspected with much interest the relics and memorials of Mary of Scotland. Her Majesty visited Melrose Abbey and Abbotsford on Tuesday.

The Prince of Wales arrived at Windsor Castle on Saturday last, from Liverpool, in the royal yacht Victoria and Albert, and the Empress at Antwerp, to convey her to Madeira.

England is about to raise the rank of her embassy at Vienna, and henceforth she will be presented by an Ambassador Extraordinary instead of an Envoy Extraordinary, at the Imperial Court. Lord Bloomfield is to be the new Ambassador, and Lord Loftus succeeds him at Berlin.

The reports from the provinces do not intimate much satisfaction with the new Constitution. The raising of the taxes appears to be the point everywhere insisted upon.

A letter from Venice contains the news of General Benedek's arrival at Verona as Commander-in-Chief of the Austrian army in Venetia. It is stated that the Emperor Francis Joseph is in order of the day of the 18th, that his Government has decided on not assuming the offensive; but that, if attacked, it will defend its possessions in Upper Italy to the last extremity. The garrison of Venetia is to be raised to 100,000. It will be enlivened with institutions on a liberal scale. It also states that an Austrian corps of observation is about to be sent to the Molde-Wallachian frontier.

UNITED STATES.

The Republican party has achieved a great triumph, the return of the elections in the different States showing that Mr. Lincoln has been elected President, and Mr. Hamlin Vice-President of the United States. The result of the Presidential election is thus remarked on by the New York Times, a Republican organ:—

It is to-day no matter of conjecture, but a settled results of yesterday's election. But there can be no reasonable doubt that the Republicans have elected their President. We have a majority of the electoral vote over the victory small and important as it is. The contest, on the part of the Republicans, has been throughout one of great energy, and the zeal of their supporters has been waged almost exclusively on the basis of fear. There has been no union of principle among them, nor have they been able to concentrate their strength upon a single candidate. The result is what might have been expected—disorganization, temporary success. The party will to-day regulate a large and most important charge in the administration of the Government. The policy of extending slavery into territory now free will not be allowed to prevail. The slave to avail will no longer impose its claims and its law upon the Federal Government. The Government will no longer be regarded as a mere instrument for fortifying and incre sing slavery. The African race will not be treated as a subject race, and the Democratic party will be taken for its expression. It will, indeed, have entered upon a new career, and a role of action and contention in place of the corruption, imbecility, and bad faith which have characterised the party for the last few years. There is no time we had a change in these respects. The Republicans now rule in a State power, and will be called upon to the most careful, and permanent Administration the country has seen for a long time; but they must not—it will from themselves the enemies which they will be called to encounter.

The New York papers are almost entirely devoted to the Congressional elections. On the 17th Mr. Seward delivered an address at the Palace Gardens on the evening of the 2nd. He was listened to by an immense audience, and was received with a round of loud cheers, while immerable thousands of Republicans in different parts of the grounds, unable to hear him, were addressed by speakers who had mounted chairs from platforms erected in the open air. Mr. Seward was received with the most enthusiastic demonstrations. He spoke for an hour and a half, pronouncing in favour of the Republicans for the last few days. He commented upon the prosperity of New York city and the Free States, as compared with that of New Orleans and the other States, ascribed it to the influence of free institutions, gave his reasons for asserting that the Republicans would be successful in the State Ballots receiving the support of the Republicans, and declared that it was his belief that the threats of a dissolution of the Union would cease when Lincoln was elected.

A fratrifal steam-boat explosion has occurred on the River Mississippi. The Pike was burnt to the water's edge, and twenty-three lives lost. New Orleans, burnt on the 2nd inst., and thirty persons were killed, and fifty others injured.

Advices from San Francisco report the loss of the mail-steamer Granada at the entrance of the harbour.

At the special meeting of the prominent citizens of Georgia, the United States' Arsenal at Augusta, in that State, had been placed in possession of Governor Brown. The arsenal at Charleston, South Carolina, was to be occupied by a company of the 2nd Cavalry, at the request of Governor Pickens. The Federal Government looked on the measure of precaution in view of any possible trouble which might arise from the result of the Presidential election.

The commercial crisis in Lancashire continues has been brought to light at Lebanon, Indiana, in which the cashier and several others connected with the Bonne County Bank have absconded, and are charged with forged on the former. The president of the bank has absconded, and it is believed that he is deeply implicated in the transactions.

Official despatches received at Washington from Peru represent that Mr. Clay had demanded his passport, at the same time addressing a note to the Government stating that the course of Mr. Consul Carvallo was taken by surprise, as he had been led to believe that his proposition, which had been forwarded to Mr. Clay, would be submitted to the Washington Cabinet.

In reply, the Government transmitted the Mr. Clay's passport, with a reiteration of their argument in answer to Mr. Carvallo's note, and declaring that it was in all Washington until the other orders from Lima, when he, too, will probably withdraw, and thus terminate all diplomatic intercourse between the two countries.

CANADA.

The customs duties of Canada received in September last amounted to 764,686 dollars, being an increase of 149,350 dollars over the receipts of September, 1859, when they amounted to 615,477 dollars.

The Government of Canada, residing from Toronto on the 1st inst., says—"The weather here at present is delightful, the air is balmy as in the month of May. It is what is called the Indian summer."

We have had another slighter shock of an earthquake. It was very sensibly felt on the opposite side of the lake at Rochester and Oswego, on the 26th ult.; less so on the Canadian side.

The harvest has been considerably. The farmers are in good spirits, and are beginning to liquidate their debts to the storekeepers, which, as a class, are in a very prosperous state in the city. Trade is another year or two to make up fully for the late commercial depression.

The Hon. George Brown, leader of the Opposition, is receiving numerous invitations to address public meetings throughout Canada. Numerous invitations to address public meetings throughout Canada. News of the progress of the movement has been met by processions extending a mile in length. The Orange body had been creating some alarm, but, at a meeting of the Grand Lodge of Orangemen of Western Canada, held at Hamilton a few days ago, and at which 963 Orange lodges, comprising 50,000 members, were represented, the following resolution was adopted by a large majority:—

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams were received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday):—

ITALY.—Turin, Nov. 22.—The King will proceed to Palermo on Monday next. The Opinione says:—"The negotiations with Rome for the restitution of the war matériel taken from the Bourbon fortresses are not yet concluded. General Goyon has refused to deliver the matériel to the Bourbon Government or to the Ministers of Victor Emmanuel. Naples, whose title General Goyon has admitted, will not yet recognise."

Venice, Thursday.—The Tombola was held on the market-place yesterday evening, and passed off without any disturbance of public order.

INDIA.

We learn from the Bombay journals (October 27) that the arrangements were complete in each presidency for the collection of the first half-year's income tax. Proper officers have been appointed, and circulars issued, requiring forms to be filled up and sent to the assessors before the 1st of December.

The Bombay Telegraph observes:—"We do not remember ever to have known affairs more tranquil than it is at present. With the exception of the occasional raids of freebooters and robbers, the empire may be said to be perfectly pacific. All the threatening rumours so prevalent some months ago, have entirely disappeared, and people of all ranks are gradually becoming reconciled to the position affairs have assumed. In inland cities the nature of the Income Tax Bill is still but partially understood, but we do not doubt the Government will do anything to apprehend from the fair operation, on this account. In Bombay the Government have been particularly happy in the organisation of the proposed tax in the hands of the Income Tax Commissioners. The whole of the selections and nominations have been received with feelings of lively satisfaction, and we may say that the list of respective officers will fully justify the confidence reposed in them. In the Mofussil the appointments appear to have been equally judicious, and Government have reason to congratulate themselves upon their discernment."

Sir Hugh Rose is winning golden opinions by his zealous endeavours to improve the condition of the soldier and the morale of the army under his command.

The volunteer movement progresses satisfactorily. In Bombay upwards of 300 names had already been enrolled, and the force may be said to be actually established. One difficulty a fell which at home is of course unknown. Not only the half-castes and Eurasians, but Parsees and other natives seek admission as volunteers. "Caveat would be as impressive," says the Bombay Gazette, "for men of all these various races to serve cordially and well together. The reasons for European soldiers to serve efficiently if they were distributed among the native regiments instead of being kept together are obvious enough. Some attempts were made a few months ago in Bombay to compose a corps of members of all sections of the community, but the proposal was at once suspended, and it was, we believe, wisely, in order to preserve the distinctness of race. The Bombay Volunteer Rifle Corps will, therefore, consist of European only."

The Gazette of Perugia publishes a decree of the Commissioner-General Pepoli confiscating, for the benefit of the consumers of Citta di Castello, the property of the Company of Jesus, situated in the territory of that town.

A civil war had broken out in Yucatan, caused by the imposition of new duties on goods imported into the country, and on the revenue of the island of Carmen. Preparations for hostilities were going on, and Government was marching forces against the rebels.

A pamphlet, entitled "Pape et Empereur," which has just appeared, proposes to abolish the spiritual power of the Pope, and establishment of a general council of the Church episcopacy, the election to ecclesiastical offices by the clergy by means of universal suffrage, the suppression of concordats, and the civil constitution of the clergy.

Lieutenant-Colonel Cleland Combermere, her Britannic Majesty's Consul at Tampico, died on board the steamer Tennessee on the 5th inst. The body was conveyed on shore and buried with military honours, the Consuls of the different nations and the authorities of the city attending the mournful ceremony. This gentleman had served ten years as Consul at Tampico, and was a victim to that unhealthy climate.

The Brussels journals announce the death of the Nestor of the bar, Jean Baptiste Gendebien, who was born at Mons, and practised his profession there in 1789, and established himself in the Faubourg de la Blanche-aux-Epines, at Brussels, in the year 1815, since then, in all matters. He is succeeded in his business by his son, who has passed his seventieth year.

SIBERIAN EXILES.—A St. Petersburg letter says:—"The Government has several persons exiled to Siberia passing through this city, the women and children that accompany them. Yesterday the station of Tobolsk was to be reached from Perm by a train of exiles which had been according to the district they start from. From Tobolsk to Tumen is a journey of 200 versts, to Kamenskoi 150, to Ishimsk 200, to Tara 200. Most of the exiles go through Ishimsk to Merchinsk. This long journey, made in the criminal vehicle with women and children, has a tendency to kill the morale."

Advices from British Columbia to the 10th ult. state that the Government of Vancouver's Island was about to borrow 60,000 dollars, at 12 per cent interest, for the purpose of improving the harbour of Victoria. The new loan was not likely to meet with opposition, as the people were in favour of discovery, with nothing very startling. The schooner Stanley Bell was about to sail from Victoria with a cargo of coal for Valparaiso, which was warranted by a merchant of that place to be of the best description. The vessel was to go round Cape Horn as far as Sitka. She was fitted up with two three-pounder guns, the number of the ports in order to intimidate Russian, well known as a successful prospector on Fraser River.

A SEXTON OF ANTONELLI.—After that can do he said spiritual duty, there is something in Antonelli's character which will make a man than any other functionary we have seen here. Though there may be an appearance of humanity in the tone and manner of the man, there is in his eye, there is nevertheless, something in that tall, lithe, and rather stately figure, that will not be passed over without a shudder by any one who has seen him as no ordinary character. We happened to meet him one day ascending the staircase of the hotel at which we are residing, and as he came up the duffel coat he observed had not loved them; that they for their cruelty and their deceit. He was dressed in black, and as soon as he reached the top of the staircase he unbuttoned overcoat. He was dressed in the uniform of the guards of Rome sickle men should rule both Pope and people.—Letter from Rome.

THE NEW PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.—The following account of Mr. Abraham Lincoln, the President elect of the United States, is given in a letter from New York:—He was born in the county of Hardin, in Kentucky, on the 12th of February, 1809. His parents were both natives from Virginia into that State, to Ill, was settled by the Indians whilst he was engaged in his studies. He grew up a tall, strong youth, and at twenty-one had presumably, and left a widow and some children, one of them being Abraham Lincoln, aged six years. The widow married again, and for a while, took up her residence in the south of Indiana, and there Abraham Lincoln passed the greater part of his youth. He was employed on a farm till he was of age, but he neither made it his life's ambition; in fact, he passed only a few months at a time in any one occupation, and was a wanderer, a rover, and a boatman, and a hunter, and a fisherman, and a soldier. In 1830 he went to the State of Illinois, and earned his living as a boatman. He settled down at last in that State, and was for a time in business as a shopkeeper, and afterwards enlisted as a volunteer in a company which was raised at Sprinfield to take part in the war in Illinois against the Indians, of which Black Hawk was the chief called the Black Hawk. He served with credit, and was promoted to the grade of Captain. From 1834 to 1836 he lived in Springfield his residence near Springfield, the capital, and has ever since resided there. In 1832 he was elected to a curfeldom in the Legislature of that State, but failed. The year after, however, he was elected, and he sat during four re-elections. During this time he studied law, and, having passed, he commenced practice with great success at the bar of Springfield. In politics, to which, while following his profession, he paid much attention, he was a Whig party, and was a warm supporter of Henry Clay. In 1846 he was elected to Congress, and continued to belong to it till 1848. He was a member of the Illinois, and repeatedly expressed his sentiments on the subject of slavery. In the stormy debates which took place on the Missouri question he more than once spoke, and voted not fewer than forty-two times for this measure. He opposed the Mexican war, and was in consequence defeated. From 1849 to 1854 he was absent from the political arena, devoting himself exclusively to the exercise of his profession. In 1854, however, a vacancy occurred in the United States Senate for the State, but was defeated. In 1856 he came was at the head of the list of the electors of Illinois, and voted for Fremont and Dayton. In 1858 he was unanimously nominated by the Republican Convention of the State to succeed Mr. Douglas in Senator, and a warm contest took place between him and that gentleman. Both visited every part of the State to harangue the populations; Mr. Lincoln boldly declaring for the abolition of slavery, and Mr. Douglas for the right of the people to settle sovereignty. Fortune was then adverse to Mr. Lincoln, and Douglas was again elected.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The next examination of candidates for admission to Sandhurst will be held during the week which commences the 17th of December next.

Lieutenant-Colonel Robert Macdonald, C.B., late of the 35th Regiment, died at Brighton on the 14th inst., at the advanced age of 84.

Admiral Sir Graham Eden Hamond, G.C.B., has been nominated Rear-Admiral of England, vice the Earl of Dundonald, G.C.B., deceased.

It is rumoured that, from economical reasons, several of the charges of the regiments in India which were anticipated this winter will not take place.

Her Majesty's ship Bellona, Captain Sir L. M'Clintock, arrived at Portsmouth on Monday on her return from the North Atlantic telegraph cruise.

The Queen has been pleased to approve of the Argyle and Bute Regiment of Militia being brigaded on artillery corps. The Duke of Argyle continues to be Colonel.

Ensign Chaplin, who so greatly distinguished himself before the Taku Forts, has been promoted to a lieutenancy, without purchase, in the 101st Foot.

The Englishman states that General Gregory, after fifty-four years' service in the Indian and English armies, has at length quietly appropriated his saturday requires and deserves.

Major-General Sir Hope Grant, commander of the forces at Chatham, has issued an order to the officers under his command notifying his intention of carrying out a system of tactical operations with the forces at his disposal, in order to afford the officers an opportunity of learning the duties they will be called upon to perform when suddenly required to encounter an attacking force in the field.

A succession of lectures to the troops at Woolwich has commenced in the mess room by authority of the General commanding the garrison, Sir R. J. Dacres, K.C.B. Former lectures of this kind have been severally delivered to the officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers, and to the corps of artillery, all of whom manifestly appreciated the efforts thus made for their intellectual improvement.

The Marchioness of Queensberry entertained over three hundred and fifty of the officers of the Volunteer corps at a ball and supper on Thursday week in the New Masonic Hall, George-street, Edinburgh, in a style worthy of the occasion. A marble statue of Victory stands at the head of the room, among whom were the Marchioness of Queensberry, with Lady Victoria Douglas, Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Alexander Gibson Maitland, Colonels M'Lean and Anderson, Royal Artillery; Colonel Tremayne, 16th Lancers; Colonel Sir Archibald Campbell, commanding the Argyllshire Highlanders, and Mrs. Hamilton; General Anderson, R.H.A.; Captain Page, and several other officers of distinction. Between eight and nine o'clock Radcliffe and Nevee, alternated with hymns sung by the latter, in which the volunteer portion of the company joined, the Marchioness and party shortly afterwards entered the room, and, having taken the chair at the head of the table, the following toasts were duly proposed and responded to:—"The Queen," "The Prince Consort," "The Prince of Wales," "The Queen and Royal Family," "The Army and Navy," "The Volunteer Force," "The mottoes and badges of some regiments are of historic, whilst others are of a still more special, interest. The 1st Dragoons use for their motto "Nec aspera terrent," and for their badge the sun "the Goldstream Guards," "Nulli Secundus," used by the navigator, Sir Francis Drake, in his circumnavigation of the globe, and adopted by the Army List; the 16th Lancers have the apt words, "Ant enim aut omnia vincit;" the 10th Hussars "Nec temere nec timide," "Meritorious;" while the Scots Fusilier Guards rejoice in the double motto of "In fernis hostis" and "Unita fortior," and the Coldstream Guards in the "Nunquam non paratus" and "Val exvius triumphant." The former motto was won by Lieutenant Hamilton, of the 1st Regiment of Foot, at the battle of Almanza, Lord Carnegie of Panmuir, was granted to it to honour of the Queen, Katharine of Braganza, whose dowry included Tangier, which, in 1684, was to be perverted into a cruel slaughter when the regiment was commanded by Colonel Kirke, in 1685, during Lord Dartmouth's command. The 1st Regiment is attributed to their presence at the "Bloody Assizes" of Judge Jeffreys. The "up this country" motto of the 41st Regiment origin, probably, in a regimental order of merit established in 1767.—Daily News.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

The Newhaven and Sheffield Artillery were inspected on Saturday by Captain Darby, who expressed himself highly satisfied with their appearance.

Lieutenant-Colonel Dickson, Assistant-Inspector of Volunteers, reviewed the Edinburgh Artillery Volunteers on the Queen's Park, and afterwards had his duties performed at the Drill Hall.

The Marquis of Lorne, Colonel of the London Irish Corps, has issued a circular to the officers, requesting them to use their influence to pay more careful attendance to their duties, and be more frequent in attendance.

The 2nd Cumberland Rifle Volunteers, 1,000 strong, and composed chiefly of pitmen from the various bedding yards, has been formed in Liverpool. The men were all dressed in their pit clothes, and were inspected on Saturday evening.

Four or two more companies, composed entirely of Jews, are to be attached to a brigade now in the course of formation in the city of London. It will not be necessary for them to attend drill on Saturday afternoon, as is the Sabbath.

On Thursday and Friday, last week, the Post-office Companies of the Civil Service Regiment met for their prizes, when some good firing was exhibited. The match consisted of seven rounds, two to Lieutenant Colonel Scudamore's 10 points out of ten shots, 20 and 19; the highest scoring the largest every time, Private Cooper, of the Savings Bank Company, making nine bull's-eyes in ten shots, at 200 and 500 yards. The third prize for the largest number of hits was awarded to Private Cooper.

A memorandum has just been issued from the War Office, in which practices are duly ordered to be carried out in connection with the Volunteer Artillery, and to be reported at once of the inspecting officers, "the Government aiming at the establishment of a system of practice which will enable the force to be brought into action with the least possible delay, and to bring into efficient performance a month, and in others, some of these valuable practices have been taken away from the Volunteer Artillery during the year, for tactical purposes." We trust that the vigorous rebuke administered by the Secretary of War to artillery officers will not be lost upon them.

Some prizes were shot for on Tuesday at Scapa Pack by members of the Orkney Volunteer Artillery, the Kirkwall Company, under the command of Mr. Davie, and which was some time since shot for by the Bristol and the 2nd Gloucestershire Artillery Volunteers, the Kirkwall men, however, not having competed for on Tuesday by members of the British Volunteer rifle Corps, of whom they were formerly the only representatives in the Orkney Isles. The money prizes were won by Captain Lighton, Private G. Schey, and Sergeant Sinclair, the latter gentleman having previously won the prize at Bristol, and to whom having made them with a greater number of hits, was adjudged the first prize. The shooting was considered very good, the distance being 200 yards, and the same number of points and hits. A Whitworth rifle, the result of a subscription among the officers, was presented to Lieutenant Davie, and was by sergeant Hanson, of the Artillery Corps. It was of the value of £30; the prize for the best shot in the Artillery Corps was a rifle value £20, and that of Sergeants Gray and Baker.

A handsome silver cup, the property of the Corps, subscribed for by the ladies of the district, has been presented to the 3rd Sussex (Hailsham) Artillery.—Mrs. Hawkins, wife of Captain Hawkins, of the 3rd Sussex Artillery Volunteers, presented a silver bugle to the 1st Devonshire Volunteers, in the name of their lady friends in the neighbourhood of Ilfracombe, on Wednesday last. The bugle contained fifteen silver medals, presented to Sergeants, Buglers, and Privates

LITERATURE.

An Autumn Tour in Spain in the Year 1859. By the Rev. Richard Roberts, B.A. Saunders and Otley.

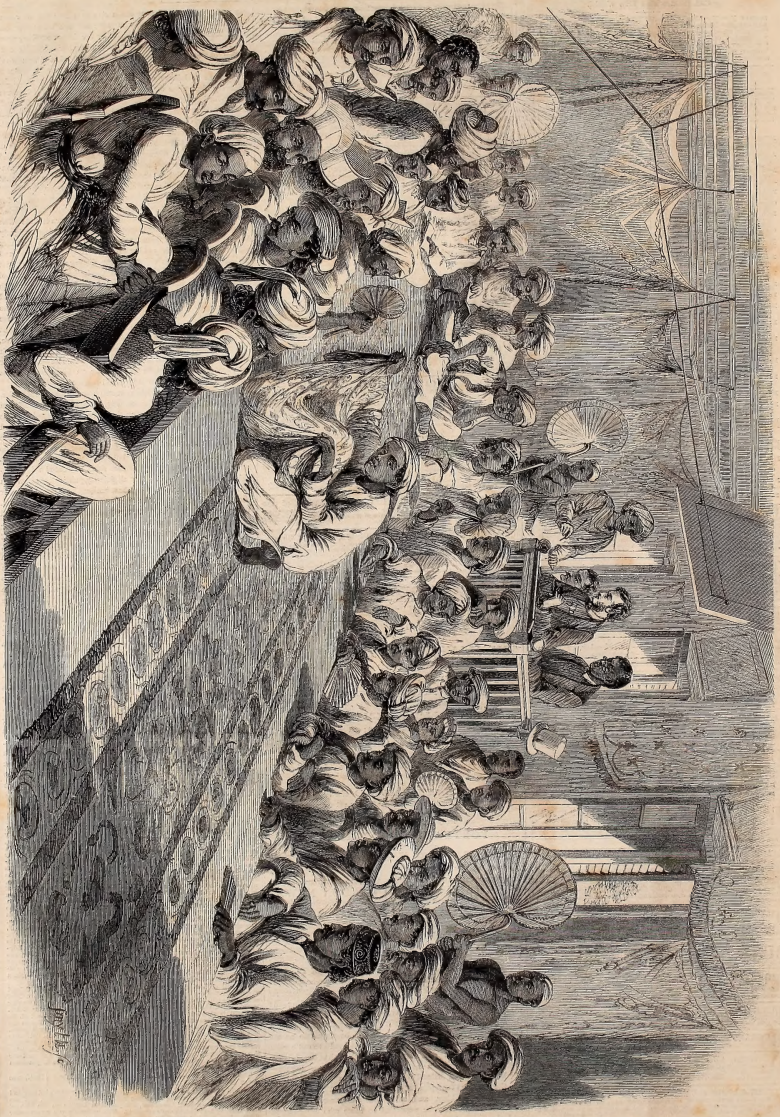
The Vicar of Milton Abbas, Dorsetshire, is well organized for a traveller, and is a very agreeable narrator. When an English gentleman sets out to wander through such a comparatively untrodden country as Spain he must pack up, with his other comforts, a certain amount of good humour, and a determination not to allow comparison with home conventionalities to occupy too great a space in his mind. In this important point Mr. Roberts has shown himself to have been well provided. All the difficulties and discomforts of an inn he met with in a peculiar way, are met with excellent temper and, indeed, with a palpable predisposition to look chiefly at the brighter side of circumstances. He seems to have possessed some advantages in having Lord Portarlington for his travelling companion; and, on the whole, it appears that he enjoyed a pleasant tour, and writes of it with an easy satisfaction which gives his book a decided charm. To those who are not well read in Spain this book can hardly imagine that Mr. Roberts's volume will prove especially interesting; and even to those who are familiar with Spain great gratification will be afforded in the amiable —we use the word advisedly— sketches of the scenery, life, and character in the work before us. Mr. Roberts, starting from Paris, entered Spain from the Bordeaux route; and the first chapter carries us to Biarritz, where we have some sketches of the habitues of that watering-place, including mention of the Emperor, Empress, and Prince Imperial of France; thence through the Pyrenees, and, crossing the Bidassoa, passing at the Isle des Faisans, which lies in the middle of the river, celebrated as the strip of neutral land, or rather mud, on which Louis XI. had an interview, in 1463, with Henry IV. of Spain; and where again, in 1615, the two kingdoms of France and Spain exchanged brides—Anne, daughter of Henri Quatre, going into Spain to be the wife of Philip IV., while his sister, Anne of Austria, found a husband in Louis XIII. Forty-five years later, the same spot witnessed another interview of high import, when Cardinal Mazarin and the Spanish Minister, Don Louis de Haro, brought the long wars between the countries to a close by the treaty of the Pyrenees, and the marriage between Louis XIV. and his first consort, Maria Theresa—an event which in time led to the occupation of the Spanish throne by the Bourbon Philip V. A melancholy interest attaches to this last occasion, as it is supposed to have caused the death of Velasquez, who, in his capacity of Aposentador Mayor to Philip IV., had to fit up the pavilion erected on the Isle des Faisans. His death, which took place on the 7th of August, 1660, only a few days after his return to Madrid, was caused, it is said, by a fever, according to other accounts, by excessive fatigue, his broken-hearted wife following him to the grave before the end of another week. On, next, to Vitoria and Burgos sped our traveller, picking up all sorts of matter for his narrative; and at length, having weathered the icy blasts and chaotic wildness of the Pass of the Somo Sierra, he entered Madrid. The incidents of his visit here are related with wonderful minuteness—a ball-fight, although graphic, being by no means the best specimen of Mr. Roberts's faculty of observation and facility for communicating his impressions of what he saw. A good deal of space is occupied by an account of an examination of the Escurial. It is stated that, contrary to received opinion, the landscape which surrounds this "eighth wonder of the world" is full of beauty, and by no means answers those descriptions which declare its environs to be characterized by unmitigated barrenness and bleakness, extending to the very walls. "When, however," says our traveller, "having entered its vast courts, now silent and untrodden, we began to examine the building more closely, I must confess my disappointment. Prepared though we were to admire, no amount of prepossession in its favour could transmute such unsightliness into beauty. Its gridiron ground plan (an inspiration of pedantry and superstition combined) is fatal to simplicity and grandeur of design; and, although no building of its vast proportions can be altogether destitute of a certain grandeur majesty, yet still feel it has nothing to recommend it to your admiration beyond mere bulk. The windows, of which is said to contain 2,600, are thousand, are positively hideous, the least objectionable of them having the form of those in a modern dwelling-house, while the upper stories are lighted by apertures, which resemble nothing so much as the portholes in a man-of-war. In fact, when I thought of the sums spent upon it—not less, it is said, than 6,000,000—and the different results that an architect of the thirteenth century would have achieved with such means, I could only look upon it as golden an opportunity had been thrown away, and a building worthy of that magnificent site had not been erected which, not giving the effectiveness to sheer mass, would have combined with a harmonious proportions those united elements of grandeur and beauty characteristic of the best period of Pointed architecture. The effect of the whole is simply oppressive, without one grain of the elevating influence which animates the creations of the great mediæval builders. Nor does this impression wear away as you become more familiar with the various features of the edifice; and next day it was as much felt as when we first trod its courts. The situation, however, is superb. Backed by a noble mountain, an offshoot of the Guadarrama range, the Escurial stands in an attitude of observation; so to speak, overlooking the whole land with the stamp of Spanish Royalty, cold, ponderous, and stately, marked indelibly on all its features, while its mixed character of convent and palace typifies the intimate connection between the Throne and the Church existing in the days of its founder."

We can only indicate that, after leaving Madrid, Mr. Roberts visited such salient points as Toledo, Talavera, Aranjuilla, Yuste—famous as the last retreat of Charles V., to the account of which we would direct special attention, Placentia, Merida, Zafra, the Sierra Moreno, Seville; and, finally, made his way to Gibraltar. As he goes he manages to glance at every characteristic of each place and its inhabitants, the less prominent ones being ingeniously made to play their parts in the interest of the narrative in a way that was hardly to be expected when such subject-matter as the Alhambra is so fully elaborated. All the way to Gibraltar the same spirited continuous sketching is kept up; the entrance and the departure from that fortress for home being as amusing as any part of this amusing book. If, as is likely enough, Mr. Roberts's work should stimulate any of his roving countrymen to adventure on a trip to Spain, it will be satisfactory to them to know that, although there are still many difficulties and annoyances to be encountered in reference to locomotion, as far as roads, means of transit, and the important item of the commissariat are concerned, yet they are by no means insuperable to those who exercise a little forethought, and who do not mind roughing it occasionally; while as regards those points connected with brigandage, which are associated in our minds with all Spanish travel, they are completely at an end, owing to the admirable organization of the Guardia Civil—a body of police which, Mr. Roberts says, are second only to the Irish constabulary. We confess, too, that we are a little surprised to learn that the Canadas, as a rule, remarkably clean; and that the peasantry best out a statement of Mr. Disraeli, in his romance of "Contarini Fleming," that they are the cleanest in the world; besides which, they are the fortunate possessors of abundance of wholesome household linen. Altogether, our author has produced a most readable and, in many respects, a most suggestive book.

THE TURNER PRIZE PLATE WON BY THE ST. GEORGE'S VOLUNTEER CORPS.

Turkish Life and Character. By Walter Thornbury, Smith and Elder.

This is a work written on the same plan, and possessing exactly the same characteristics of style—verging from the necessity of the case of repetition upon tediousness—as "Life in Spain," published some little time since by Mr. Thornbury. We are not prepared by any means to sit down the peculiar manner which the author has adopted in moulding his narrative as a fault, tending towards flippancy, an accusation which has been made against him in some quarters. Indeed, in noticing his "Life in Spain," we stated our inclination to go along with the sort of half-bantering, half-dreamy fashion in which it pleased Mr. Thornbury to clothe his writing. But there is such a thing as too much partridge; and, while admitting the temptation to give a new turn to a series of descriptions of Turkish life and character which are getting dangerously familiar, so far as authors are concerned, to the British reading public, we cannot but admit that a perusal of a second work in precisely the same style as a previous one does give us an idea of the feeling which brought down some hostile criticism even on the first instance. Although, too, the main part of the subject-matter of the book consists of reprints from serial contributions to periodicals, and therefore is likely in the nature of things occasionally to want due sequence and connection, in preparing the existing work for publication some little care ought to have been taken to prune down palpable repetitions which would not have been observed in the reading of a series of papers from week to week. The second and third chapters, which treat of the conspiracy to assassinate the Sultan in 1857, might surely have been recast, so as to have avoided the iteration, more than once, not only of general matter, but of phrases, and even of sentences. Mr. Thornbury has probably had some inkling of the defects in the workmanship of his book, because in his preface he is careful to state that, whatever may have been the original character of his chapters, they were all written with a steadily-maintained harmonious purpose, and can no more be judged of separately before being arranged into a book than the pieces of a Chinese puzzle can be before being fitted into the snug box that gives them unity, symmetry, and purpose. Now, it seems to us that no one could have indicated the points of failure in the book better than the author has done himself in this deprecatory appeal. Nevertheless, there is a great deal that is meritorious, and a very great deal that is exceedingly amusing, in these volumes. The powers of minute observation possessed by the writer are very large; and his faculty for miniature word-painting exists in him in a proportion as nearly equal as possible, and, although efforts to be forcible do not necessarily imply force, there is a considerable fond of the right stuff in Mr. Thornbury. His "affectations" once got over, you cannot but be struck with the graphic power with which he treats himself and his theme; such, for instance, as the scene to be witnessed at the Valley of Sweet Waters at Constantinople. It was impossible to describe the life and character without bringing this picture in; and the obvious difficulty has been skilfully avoided. The most striking chapters in the work are those which treat of the madhouses in Constantinople, and Turkish prisons and Turkish galley slaves. Before concluding our remarks on what, after all, is a book which we think we may be stated that its "purpose"—using the word with a certain significance that it has acquired in literature of late years—is to manifest the impossibility of the continuance of Turkey as a European empire. In Mr. Thornbury's opinion the "Sick Man" has now become decidedly moribund.



The Imperial Atlas of Modern Geography. By Blackie and Son.

This is a very handsome and a very complete work. It contains an extensive series of maps embracing the most recent discoveries; and the latest, or nearly so, for of course the new kingdom of Italy is not included—political divisions of territory in all parts of the world, compiled from the most authentic sources. This atlas is intended as a companion to the "Imperial Gazetteer," published by Messrs. Blackie, in the course of the compilation of which the editor (Mr. W. G. Blackie, F.R.G.S. under whose supervision the present work is brought out) accumulated a large amount of recent geographical information, obtained on extensive knowledge of chartographical sources, and established an intimate correspondence with many eminent practical geographers—considerations of no mean importance in carrying such an undertaking to a successful issue. In the preparation of this atlas attention has been directed more to rendering the maps useful and acceptable to the general reader than to shaping them exclusively to the demands of the experienced geographer; and it has been sought to make it thoroughly popular in case, though scientifically accurate in details. It is also for an atlas portable in size. The coast surveys of the British Admiralty and of the United States' Government, the maps issued by the French Dépôt de la Marine and the Dépôt de la Guerre, Government maps of various Continental States, communications from Government officials both in this and other countries, the stores of information, including many unpublished documents collected by the Royal Geographical Society, and the maps and works of a long list of geographers and travellers, beginning with Humboldt, have been consulted and made use of. Without entering into the details that form the usual staple of atlases, special prominence is given to Great Britain and her colonies, which occupy no less than nineteen sheets, or about a fourth part of the whole work. The maps of the Isthmus of Cunnana, of Arabia, the Red Sea, and the Persian Gulf, and of Independent Tartary are new features, as are likewise the series of maps devoted to illustrating the Islands of the Indian Archipelago. There are other noticeable arrangements which give peculiar value to the atlas as a whole; and when it is said that it contains seventy-eight maps comprising above one hundred different maps, and a general index containing references to about one hundred and twenty thousand places, it must be supposed that it is a model of completeness in every respect.

PRESENTATION OF PRIZES TO THE ST. GEORGE'S RIFLE CORPS.

The achievements of the St. George's Rifle Corps, comparatively speaking in this busy hive of industry, are numerous; and, if they have not yet been equalled by, to the best shot at 600 yards—Mr. F. Crooks. 7. A lancaster rifle (the gift of Mr. G. Lancaster), to the best shot at 500 yards—Lieut. Wesley Richards rifle was also presented to Mr. C. N. Peal. The Turner Plate, to be competed for annually by the members from the Victoria, Queen's (Westminsters), and the St George's, was presented to the St. George's, who had gained it; and the medal accompanying it was given to Mr. F. Crooks. This prize is a statuette of the Queen, in solid silver, after the portrait of her Majesty by Chalons, the gift of Mr. Turner, of New Bond-street, an honorary member of the corps, and estimated to be of the value of upwards of 100 guineas. The statuette, which we have engraved above, represents her Majesty standing in her coronation robes, with her left hand resting on a truncated column. The prize was competed for on Thursday, the 25th of October, by the Victoria, Queen's (Westminsters), and St. George's Rifles, and won by the last named. Dr. Irons subsequently presented the corps with a silver bugle, the gift of Mr. Peal.

THE COURT

The Queen received the noblemen and gentlemen of the Prince of Wales's suite with other guests at dinner on the first anniversary of the birth of his Royal Highness. Most of the visitors took their departure on Saturday; on which day the Queen did not leave the castle owing to the unfavourable weather.

On Sunday the Queen and Prince Consort, the Prince of Wales, Prince Arthur, Princess Alice, Princess Helena, and Princess Louise, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended Divine service in the private chapel, which was read by F. C. Cook, one of Majesty's inspectors of schools, preached the sermon. In the afternoon the Queen, Prince Consort, Prince of Wales, Prince Arthur, Princess Alice, Princess Helena, and Princess Louise walked in the Home Park, and afterwards in the East Terrace, walked on the East Terrace. The Royal party were accompanied by the Duchess of Sutherland, the Hon. Caroline Stanley, Lieutenant-Colonel the Earl of St. Germans, Lord John Russell, Lord Palmerston, and Sir Edward W. Head.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, walked in the grounds of the castle, and visited the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore. Her Majesty, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and Prince Arthur, went shooting, attended by Lieutenant-Colonel Keppel. The Duchess of Kent and the Princess Alice walked and drove through the Queen's Lodge, and took luncheon with the Queen.

On Tuesday, being the birthday of Princess Frederick William (the Princess Royal), her Majesty received the congratulations of the Royal family. The Queen, accompanied by Princess Alice and Princess Helena, visited the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore. Prussian Aides, with the Secretary of Legation, arrived at Windsor Castle to wait on the Prince and the Duchess. The Prince Consort went out shooting, accompanied by Prince Alfred, the Count de Gleichen, and the Honourable Colonel Grey, Equerry in Attendance. Captain G. H. Seymour, R.N., had the honour of accompanying the Prince. The Prince of Wales, Prince Arthur, Prince Alfred, the Hon. R. Bruce and Lieutenant-Colonel Keppel, left Windsor in the forenoon for Chiswick.

On Thursday the Queen and Prince Consort walked in the Home Park.

The Duchess of Athol has succeeded the Countess of Caledon as Lady in Waiting to her Majesty. Lord Charles Bitrray has succeeded Major-General Seymour as Equerry in Waiting to the Queen.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The Prince of Wales arrived in Odessa on Wednesday morning, accompanied by Major-General Bruce, Colonel Teesdale, Captain Lindsay, R.N., Captain Grey Hillier, under the command of Colonel Norris, M.P., attached as a guard of honour to his Royal Highness, and Mr. Gordon, Secretary of Legation. His Royal Highness was received by Admiral Zavoiko, Governor-General of Odessa. The Prince and suite, on the arrival of the train at the railway station to receive his Royal Highness, entered the railway station and ascended to the platform, where people, who cheered as Royal Highness very heartily. Flags floated from the various civil and public buildings, and merry peals from the church bells were rung, and the whole city presented a scene of unusual animation. During the day his Royal Highness received the visits of Admiral Lutke, M.P., and many members of the University, and in the afternoon the Prince made a visit of ceremony to the Governor-General, who returned to his Royal Highness an address of congratulation on his safe arrival in England and return to Odessa.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge has arrived at Gloucester House from visiting her Majesty at Windsor Castle.

His Excellency Baron Brunnow, the Russian Minister, has returned to London from the Continent to resume his diplomatic functions at this Court.

The Earl of Malmesbury has returned to town from visiting the Right Hon. Benjamin Disraeli, M.P., at Hughenden. The noble Earl, having given a dinner to the Tory Association at Hughenden, on behalf of the Foreign Office, has taken a mansion in Stratford-place for his future residence.

Viscount Palmerston gave a dinner on Wednesday evening to the Colonial Ministers in Piccadilly.

Lord and Lady John Russell arrived at their residence in Richmond Park, on Wednesday, from Windsor Castle.

A marriage is arranged to take place between Lady Victoria Howard, eldest daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, and Mr. J. R. Hope-Scott, Q.C., a gentleman whose first wife, it will be remembered, was granddaughter of Sir Walter Scott.

The latest news from Syria is to the effect that the pacification of the country was continuing. Emin Pacha is to be the new Governor of Damascus. Fuad bears an excellent character.

Mr. John Watkins, of Parliament-street, photographer to the Queen, had the honour of attending at Claremont Palace on Monday and Tuesday last to take portraits of the King and Queen of the Belgians and his Royal Highness the Prince de Joinville, which were very successfully accomplished.

The Brazilian war-corvette Donna Isabel, a training-ship, was wrecked on the Moroccan coast on the 19th ult. Out of a crew of seventy-seven officers as boys twenty-three were lost, and more than a hundred marines. The survivors were carried by the Emperor of Morocco to Tangier, and there placed under the protection of Mr. Drummond Hay.

The Chevalier de Chatelain, several of which are believed to have been in their prime when Solomon built his temple, is now exhibiting in a room at the museum, with no other tree near them. Of "all the orders of the vegetable world" the cedars are the most majestic. The Psalmist could not have found an easy task to be found. The bark of the most ancient cedars is smooth, and of a silvery grey. The branches grow in whirls, forming what the Arabs appeal to learn to call "umbrellas." But majesty is protect the Holy Palace it is surprising that the Prince Consort Ritualistic tendencies, as evinced in the establishment of a Chapel Royal, a claim upon the veneration of all readers of the Bible as the shrines and relics of Palestine. The cedars are trees such as were employed by King Psalmist and the Prophets the noblest imagery in the Old Testament. They are, moreover, called the "trees of the Lord," which "He hath planted." Times Correspondent.

GARIBALDI AT HOME.—The Nationalità of Turin states that General Garibaldi has arrived at his island of Caprera, accompanied by Mr. Burnett, Colonel Chambers, and two or three persons, and has resumed his country life with the greatest appearance of satisfaction. The Gazzetta di Torino, given more particulars of Garibaldi's landing in his little island home, without, however, informing us of the source from which the information reached it. "Caprera," it says, "is not situated at Caprera. He appears extremely happy, in the first place, because he is relieved from the management of affairs of Naples into the hands of the King, and secondly, because he is finally free from the numberless petitions with which he was pestered. He speaks with enthusiasm of his agricultural labours. He has been anxious to extend it even to his three war horses, which he with his own hands smoothed down, unbridled, and allowed to run free in the country, the moment he set foot on his own isle. So eager was the Dictator to be free from all the cares of office that he left on board the steamer no knowledge-cake of the vessel which was to wait him away from Naples to Caprera. He was anxious, however, the peasants had time to get rid of their fear in the character of King Victor Emmanuel." The Movimento of Genoa relates the following curious anecdote:—"Garibaldi, on arriving at Caprera he was astonished to find the appearance of the island quite changed. Instead of the stony desert he left it in, he found before him well-cultivated fields and beautiful plantations with shady avenues, and everywhere around as far as the eye could reach, the rocks of the island with his wand, bidding Nature forthwith to lavish her treasures on the spot he trod upon. But the General was not long astonished when, instead of the old hovel of his cottage, an elegant villa stood before him, on entering which the mystery was explained to him by the appearance of a large full of money, the property of his friend Mr. Burnand, who had turned his absence to account in order to provide for the future of his host."

The small island of Caprera, to which Garibaldi has retired, is situated on the northern coast of Sardinia, towards the eastern entrance of the Straits of Bonifacio, by the side of the Isle of la Maddalena, and almost opposite the southern point of the island of Corsica. It is somewhat less than six miles in length from north to south, and about two in breadth. It is very fertile in wheat, and derives its name from the number of goats which are bred there. Caprera must not be confounded with another island, which bears the ancient Capraria, or Capraria, which lies to the east of Cape Corse, to the north-west of the opposite promontory of Piombino. Caprera, though much smaller than the former, is nevertheless more important, from its military and maritime position, than the latter. It lies to the north of it, and from the town and the fort which defends it. The surface is mountainous.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

At the evening meeting of the Royal Geographical Society on Monday, the 26th inst., at Burlington House, the papers to be read are:—Some Remarks on the Physical Geography of the Ocean in Connection with the Antarctic Regions, by Captain M. F. Maury, of the United States.

Among the railway applications for next Session is one for a tubular underground railway, three miles and a half, from Regent-circus to the Metropolitan line at Smithfield, by which a communication to the docks will be established. The cost is estimated at £1,000,000. Ultimately it is intended to extend the line from Regent-circus to Paddington.

Margaret Raymond, a charwoman, who has appeared at the Clerkenwell Police Court over 100 times on charges of drunkenness and assault, was again brought up on Monday before Mr. Barker, charged with being drunk and disorderly in the streets. She was fined 40s., or one month's imprisonment; and she was ordered to pay £2 or be imprisoned two calendar months.

Miss Sinclair, who has for many years enjoyed the rights of legitimacy of her father in the proceedings now before the Court of Probate, has received a letter from Lord Palmerston, congratulating her on the success gained by the lady's petition, and congratulating her on the zeal she has displayed. The letter was accompanied with a cheque for £500 for Miss Sinclair's nurse during the proceedings.

A fatal, exciting tragedy in loss of life and considerable destruction of property, broke out in Ponsydale, Poplar, early on Monday morning. The house was occupied by a family of the name of Donovan, who, with the exception of the father, were all down with scarlet fever, and the whole house was full of new, quilted clothing, &c. Mr. Donovan and his daughter were also terribly burned, as they were in the room when the fire broke out. The house was entirely destroyed.

THE FEMALE SCHOOL OF ART.—An exhibition of paintings, drawings, sculpture, and other works of art, under the special patronage of her Majesty the Queen, was opened yesterday at the Female School of Art. The exhibition and sale of pictures to be appropriated to the fund now raising for a building for the permanent establishment of the Female School of Art." The exhibition will terminate with a bazaar, for which contributions are solicited. The collection will be open to the public on Monday next. The first incident of the Female School of Art, 43, Queen-square, W.C.

The executors to the Marlime Lord Byron, Mrs. Emsley, at Stroney, took place on Monday morning, at the usual spot in front of Newgate, in the presence of a considerable number of persons. The deceased had made a document in which he inconformity assails the leading points of the evidence given by the witnesses for the prosecution, and which he left to be read after by the most false witnesses for the sake of money." In this statement he makes the following assertion:—"I believe Mrs. Donovan to be the murderer of Mrs. Emsley.

The Statistical Society held its first meeting for the season on Tuesday evening in their rooms in St. James's-square—Colonel Sykes in the chair. The meeting was fully attended, and there was present a large number of candidates for admission, which is probably attributed to the important paper to be read—namely, on the Statistics of Prostitution in London last summer. A collection of photographs of fifty-four members of the unspeakable class found in the streets of the metropolis during the period represented, the chairman directed attention to so elaborate survey of the costs of the Royal Commission of 1857, which appointed to inquire into the best to afford an example worthy of imitation by the Government of any country. Mr. T. H. Bayly, Mr. Dent, Mr. Lowe, Lord Stanley, and others took part in the discussion which followed.

The Royal Society.—The first meeting of the session 1860-61 was held on Thursday, the 15th inst., Lord Wrottesley, president, vice-president, in the chair. A numerous list of presents received since the last meeting was laid before the meeting, amongst which were Mr. Darwin, presented by Mr. Gassiot, F.R.S. A paper by General Sabine, R.A., D.C.L., F.R.S., on the Laws of Terrestrial Magnetism, as Illustrated by the Magnetic Declination in the Kew Observatory, with Notices of the Progress of our Knowledge respecting the Secular Variation of the Declination, was read. It was announced that the anniversary meeting would be held on the 30th of November, when the usual list of candidates for election into the Society as Fellows: The Copley medal to Professor Bunsen, of Heidelberg, for his electrical researches and discoveries in spectrum analysis. The Royal medals—F.R.S., and Dr. Augustus Waller, F.R.S.; and the Rumford medal to Professor Stokes, M.A., F.R.S., and to be presented by him.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 997 boys and 931 girls—in all 1928 children—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1850-59 the average number was 1,666. The increase which usually attends the closing months of the year—from 1850 to 1859 the number of births rose from 1,666 to 1,928—was in 1860 little more than half the usual increase. On Saturday, the average number of births, as obtained from corresponding weeks of the years 1850-59, is 1,894. Since it must be remembered that the population of London has increased since 1850, the births in the present return are less by half than the number which would have been registered if the birth-rate of the period of the year had prevailed. A couper aged forty-four years died in consequence of a fall from a swing from one of the trees in Victoria Park. He was tapping a cask; a girl aged two years was fatally scalded by falling backwards into a pail of hot water. A boy was killed by a cart passing over him. Suicide by the mother; and a young man from an overdose of laudanum. Eight manslaughters, and 45 cases, died in the year, the chief of whom was a spinster, who had attended the age of ninety-six years.

SOCIETY FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT AND POSITION OF THE BLIND.—Yesterday se'nnight a concert of classical music was given in the large room of the Society, Milton Mount, Gravesend. The performance attracted a large attendance of blind persons and friends of the institution, and was under the direction of Mr. Wilkinson, the blind organist. The object was the assessment of the blind, and which, while they help to relieve the sad necessity of their position, will also tend to the encouragement of the institution for the benefit of humanity. Messrs. Broadwood sent one of their finest instruments to the Hall, and Mr. Alcock kindly presided at the piano. On Monday evening last at the Eyre Arms Assembly Room, St. John's-wood, in aid of the funds of the London Society for teaching the Blind to Read. The concert is for the purpose of raising a sum to defray the expense of an organ recently built by Mr. Bishop, of Great Portland-street, for the blind congregation of St. John's-wood. Several eminent vocalists have consented to give their services gratuitously.

THE SOCIETY OF ARTS.—The opening meeting of the new session of the Society of Arts took place on Wednesday night, the chair being taken by Sir Thomas Phillips, Chairman of the Council. Mr. Scott Russell, F.R.S., read a paper on the Progress of International Relations, which is to be held in 1862. The guarantee fund amounted, it appears, to the enormous sum of £300,000. The commissioners, in addition to their other duties, have the more intimate relations which subsist between ourselves and foreign nations, to the popular ordinary and social principles, will ensure the new exhibition to be productive of more important results than its great predecessor in 1851. The latter was chiefly valuable as a record of the principal operations of the society, and, having touched upon various objects to which it was desired to direct the attention of the public, such as the fine arts, commerce and galleries in the evening, the formation of libraries for working men, and the establishment of schools of art in connection with the society, Mr. Russell gave an account of the efforts which the society had had to promote the adoption of a uniform system of weights and measures in this country. Lastly, he took the view of receiving a general concurrence in the recommendation of the Decimal Association, that the system of decimal coinage, with a hundredth part-makers, and patterns of music, to a declaration that they will adopt the system. A vote of thanks was then passed to the chairman for his conduct. Another important subject to which attention had specially been given by the society was that of the law of copyright. In the session of 1857-8 a committee was appointed by the council to inquire into this subject, and to report what amendments were desirable in the existing law. The direction of such committee received the sanction of the council, and a bill was introduced into the House of Commons. The object of this bill was to consolidate the law relating to copyright in works of literature and art, and to shall have delayed and executed, whether such work be published or not, and to extend the term of copyright in sculpture. The object of the bill was to secure to the author of a work of art the copyright with the original work by a purchaser, or to reserve such copyright to the author himself. The bill was also intended to relieve persons from the frauds practised on the public by the manufacturer and sale of pictures under the name of the old masters, by requiring the signature and the marvellous advance that the Society of Arts had made during the last few years. The number of members had increased from 1,000 to 3,000, and the income during the last fifteen years, and that evening upwards of ninety new members had been elected. The report was unanimously adopted on the motion of Mr. Bowring, seconded by Mr. Cubitt, and the meeting then adjourned.

THE SOCIETY OF ARTS.—The following meeting of the new session of the Society of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce was held on Wednesday evening, the 21st inst., Sir Thomas Phillips, Chairman of the Council, in the chair. Mr. Scott Russell, F.R.S., read a paper on the Progress of International Relations, which is to be held in 1862. The guarantee fund amounted, it appears, to the enormous sum of £300,000. The commissioners, in addition to their other duties, have the more intimate relations which subsist between ourselves and foreign nations, to the popular ordinary and social principles, will ensure the new exhibition to be productive of more important results than its great predecessor in 1851. THE NEW COURTS OF LAW.—A notice appears in the Gazette of yesterday week that her Majesty's Commissioners of Works and Public Buildings intend to apply to Parliament in the Session of 1861 for an Act to authorise the purchase of compulsory purchase or otherwise, of the land proposed new courts of law. The site will be bounded on the north and north-west by Carey-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields; on the south by Fleet-street, the west and south-west by Temple-gate, Temple-bar; and on the east by the parish of St. Clement Danes, and the western boundary of Chancery-lane.

CHELSEA HOSPITAL REGULATIONS.—Some singular statements were made on Tuesday, before the Assistant Judge, at the Middlesex Sessions, touching the management of Chelsea Hospital. Jane Ryan, 30, was indicted for robbing an old Chelsea pensioner of his dinner, consisting of beef and potatoes. The prisoner was employed in the kitchen of the hospital, the prosecutor's band, emptied the contents into an apron, threw the basin at the prosecutor's head, and struck him a severe blow on the left eye. Several old pensioners having been sworn, Mr. Ryan, the prisoner's counsel, asked by another Chelsea veteran, named Robert Neal, one of the witnesses, whether he had not been fined and sent to the cells at Tothill-fields Bridewell for the offence of taking away from the kitchen on Thursday, the 8th inst., he was on duty as collector of the dinners, a quantity of meat which he had not cooked enough, and which he had rolled up, on getting close to the gate Mr. Jacobson disengaged the chains from the cart, paying that he was not the first who had done so. The defendant then drew the chains through the gate, and made it fast a second time to the pony-cart. Witness then proceeded on his way to the Hospital. The defendant would not be fined, nor would he know the law. The defendant said he did not think he was doing any wrong, or he would not have done it openly. He had a right to the meat, which was in a remnity of 7s. and costs, and also ordered to pay the 6d. toll; so that for the life of low cunning he had to pay 3s.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

Bishop Spencer, formerly of Madras, has been appointed Chancellor of St. Paul's.

A silver tea and coffee service and a pocket communion have been presented to the Rev. Mr. Jackson, the congregation of Regent-square Church, St. Pancras, on resignation of the senior curacy.

The Bishop of Carlisle has formally installed and introduced in his cathedral last Saturday, and on the following morning preached his first sermon. In the commencement of the week the Bishop of Gloucester and Bath will be entertained forthwith to a seat in the House of Lords.

The Bishop of Oxford will be opened for the ordinary services on Advent Sunday, December 2, when the restoration of the choir will be completed, partly from want of time, partly from the want of funds. It is proposed to partly from want of time, partly from the want of funds. It is proposed to open the nave with a service of thanksgiving for the recovery of the Prince of Wales, on the Thursday following, December 6. The restoration of the nave will be commenced in January 1861, and will be carried on without intermission.

At the meeting of the clergy of the united dioceses of Down and Connor and Dromore, held on Tuesday week, the despest disapproval of the late Gorham judgment was expressed, and a petition to the Queen's most gracious intervention to uphold spiritual authority, were unanimously expressed by formal resolutions. In which the regret "that it should be in the power of any one to found or forgotten of his character and station as to stamp by his official act his approval of such a work of blasphemy."

A "GOLDEN WEDDING."—The Danish journals are filled with accounts of the celebration of the Golden Wedding at Copenhagen, on the occasion of the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the marriage of Prince Wilhelm of Hesse and the Princess Charlotte, who is aunt of the present King of Denmark. This "golden pudding," as such an event is called, is not of frequent occurrence either in Royal or in other families, and, as happened in this case, it is usually the cause of a general meeting of all the members of the same connexion together. The King and all the members of the Royal family were present to offer their congratulations to the Prince and Princess, who on the occasion received many valuable presents. Fifty years ago the Prince was a young officer in the Danish service, and from the link in the chain which connects the Oldenburg with the Glucksburg branches of the Royal family, he became a favourite with the late King, by consent of Prince Christian of Denmark, who by the position of London has been elevated to the throne of Denmark, and who is the present King's father.

REMARKABLE LETTER FROM NAPOLEON BONAPARTE TO JOSEPH BONAPARTE.

AMONG the many rare manuscripts purchased for the nation at the sale of Mr. Dawson Turner's collection in 1859, not the least curious is a letter of the Great Napoleon, to which Mr. Turner has prefixed the account which follows:—"The following interesting letter was given me by my late friend, Mr. John Wright, for many years a bookseller in Piccadilly, where his house was the regular place of meeting for Canning, Heckham Frere, Gifford, and other authors of the Anti-Jacobin, which was principally written in Wright's parlour, from his notes, together with many other of the leading political publications of the day. Among them, in 1798, was published a translation of Lavallette's Correspondence, consisting of three volumes addressed to friends in France by Bonaparte's aide-de-camp, during the first year of his career in Egypt. The vessel charged with these was captured by a vessel of Lord Nelson's fleet, and among them was the letter here preserved, which, in the hurry of the moment, was overlooked. It is curious, on account of its containing much private matter, was not among the rest, but was probably sent home some other way, or else, what is not his own person. Lord Nelson's testimony to this effect in his own autograph I did not obtain from him.

"July 25, 1798.—Written shortly before the Battle of the Nile, and curious as proving Nap's intention even then of soon returning to France—Mr. Dawson Turner's writing is here considerably modified, but proceeds:—above all, testifying his dissatisfaction (?) by reason of his jealousy of Kleber, Desaix, and Menou, who had been left in charge of Bonaparte, p. 115, where a portion of the letter is printed. The first part of it is published in the 'Correspondance,' but this last, the rest is omitted by reason of its being a private letter.

"Le Caire, le 7 Thermidor, an 6.

"Tu vairs dans les papiers publics la relation de la bataille, de la conquête de l'Egipte, qui a été assez disputé pour ajouter une feuille à la gloire nationale. Je t'envoie quelques détails sur cette expédition. Elle m'a, toujours, vivadu, qui existe sur la terre : la barbarie est à son comble, il n'y a point d'argent, tous sont pauvres, malheureux. Je ne trouve ici en France dans 2 mois. Je te recommande mes intérêts. J'ai beaucoup beaucoup de chagrins domestiques ; car le voile est entièrement déchiré such a mixing. This needs applying when warm, and the chaff to be well turned as applied. Bean, pea, or barley meal would answer admirably in making this food available; and a slight dusting over steamed chaff would suffice. In this way much of the inferior fodder of this winter may be profitably consumed."

During the past season the Devon sales have been few, but the 42s. 3d. average, which was made by Flower, Pease, and Plenty, Pictor, in Dairy Maid at the Champion one, shows how firmly the original Quartly stock holds its ground in the country. The lots sold at Mr. Turner's did not by any means include his best things, and, therefore, the average was no test. The sales of Herefords have been only middling. The highest price realized with one of this breed was followed by Lord Bateman's. The highest-priced animal at the Lowdham's was a bull-calf, sold for 60gs., purchased by Mr. Gilbert of Gisborne, and old Carlisle for 50gs. The Monaughty sale average was the crack one. The shave belle Diadem, winner of the first prize at Canterbury, was sold by Mr. Dale's son for 50gs., and she has since been sent into the Raynham Court herd for 35gs. Mr. Wigmore gave 41gs. for a cow, and also got her calf, a bull, for 17gs. A two-year-old heifer, by Mr. Jay, and the best-sold bullock by "Sir Benjamin" almost reached the 100gs., at which figure he was bought in. The Shorthorn sale at Mr. Price's sale lots, achieved this price on the Hereford Show day, and he has just sailed for Sydney. The shortness of keeping cattle for full fattening and keeping prices down, but still the useful mottles and palefaces are quietly and surely gaining ground, both at home and abroad.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Form days at Shrewsbury, which were attended by nearly 150 horses (albeit the yearling race has been abandoned), wound up the season of racing and Pendham's wanderings were ended yesterday, by concluding two dead heats. The Sporting Life furnishes some valuable statistics as to the amounts, exclusive of cups won by the most successful horses during the same period, as follow:—Mr. Merry's score was with 48 races, amounting to £20,775; Lord Aldesbury second with 37, and £10,040; Lord Zetland third with 24, and £7,125; Lord Eglinton fourth with 12, and £6496. Next in order are Mr. Eastwood with 9, and £6459; Mr. A. Nichol with 7, and £5,150; Lord Glasgow with 17, and £5883; and Mr. Saxon with 39, and £5301. Old Trick has changed hands at the humane sum of 220 gs., and Wild Will, by Wild Bayrell, who is dead—at Mr. Eastwood's sale at Eastfield and Stakes, for 16½ gs.

The Earl of Stamford's hounds had a satisfactory day's sport from Willoughby Gorse on Friday. A snowstorm quite stopped the hunting on Saturday, and on Monday a meet was held at Ashby, the hounds in the Vale of Belvoir. Luckily a change set in on Monday night, and Mr. Tailby's next sport day at Lye Lodge, found a capital fox at Marston Gorse, ran by the hounds, which were joined by Hirst, Wood, pulled him round it, and killed him just as he was entering Owston Wood, after a run of an hour and a half, which was the best the day could wish. We understand that a wide Rod who owns some imported cattle, and Mr. Tailby's opinion was asked concerning them as master of the Quorn regarding the unwelcome hunting visitor we alluded to last week. In consequence of the unfavourable report of his Lordship's hounds have not been out yet, but we believe that they will advertise shortly, and that Lord Euston will act as fold-master. Baron Rothschild has only just commenced to hunt the Tring fixtures and been too third previously. His meets hitherto have been at the Rose and Crown, Tring, Chiltern, which divide Herts, Beds, and Bucks. There was a very merry gallop over them the other morning, and one of the Aylesbury coaches met the hunt-market over the field. Goddard Morgan's riding and efforts to show sport (with the Duke of Rutland's late first whip to aid him) are much appreciated in the land of Lonsdale's hounds, and Morgan is a first scenting-day than Tuesday week.

The Newmarket Stakes were divided between Mr. Reed's pair of the Mechanic blood. Rebel, son of Rot, also divided the Alfriston Stakes with Mr. Nicholls; and to Mr. Gretton's Grey de Witton got back 440 out of the 450 he lately gave for Cotherstone's son the Scarborough Meeting the last Wakenico Cup winner, Maid of the Mill, was beaten in a canter for the Ascot Stakes, borough Chanpion Stakes, but won the Beaten Dog Stakes given for the Cotherstone's son. The Congress Stakes, run for on Tuesday, was divided between Mr. Walter Selby's Biddleston estate, went off with great eclat. Lord Zetland's pair were four days, and a hard-working four hunts. The meetings next week are as follows:—Tyneside Club, on Monday; Mr. Newton's, on Tuesday and Wednesday; Lord Zetland's, on Hordley, on Wednesday; Crosby, on Thursday; Tattershall, on Thursday, &c, and West Herefordshire and Chiltern, on Thursday and Friday.

The following register refers to the season commencing on this day, regards batting, we find that G. Anderson, Hayward, R. Rusley, Caffyn, T. Davis, Diamond, Daft, Grundy, and Jupp were the aggregate order of merit of the first nine. Hayward's (132) is the most brilliant single innings, and Grundy's average (36 runs, 1,051). Grundy (77), G. Anderson (75), E. Wilsher (73), T. Davis (72), J. Lillywhite (69), and R. Walker, Jeg. (69). Tinley, Carpenter, Wisden, and Caffyn. J. Lillywhite, Grundy, and Jupp Syms in the order of bowling merit; and the wondrously-minute record extends to the very minor matches. Will delivered by Caffyn, Grundy, and some under this head in 3886; Jackson's, 5197; and Caffyn's, 5060. The latter missed several matches at the end of the season owing to his fine injury, which is gradually coming right again. Two "colts" are spoken for The United from the county of Durham; but, as is nearly always the case now, they are both batsmen. Somehow or other, bowlers do not come out as they once did.

THE RIGHT HON. T. MILNER GIBSON, M.P., President of the Board of Trade, addressed his constituents, at the Townhall, Attleborough, on Saturday evening. The Right Hon. Gentleman was warmly received. Mr. Milner Gibson was received with great applause. In glancing at the past session, the right hon. gentleman took credit to himself and colleagues in the Government for their earnest endeavour to do something for the country," adding, "that they (the Administration) have not succeeded in passing many useful measures of reform—though I believe they have succeeded in passing some—of any size they have inclosed the path that they would have pursued, and it is been carried on law." He drew farcical upon the Parliament have not been of commercial distress is coming upon us, and the prediction that a period of distress is coming upon us, and the prediction that a period of distress is coming upon us, and the prediction that a period of PROCLAMATION OF THE PLEBISCITE AT NAPLES.

THE result of the voting on the annexation question in the kingdom of the Two Sicilies was officially made known on Saturday, the 3rd inst., before the Royal Palace at Naples; and the correspondent of the Daily News in that city writes as follows of the ceremony:—"In order to get a better view of the whole scene I went to the balcony of the Foresteria, which is now occupied by the Pro-Dictator and his family, and General Türr and his staff. The coup d'œil was brilliant enough, but a very small eye, or half an eye, could have taken it all in, so few were the people on the ground. Three sides of the square were occupied by the National Guard, and the fourth by a booth, on the top of which floated three or four national flags. Up and down the hollow square were scattered a few hundreds of persons, waiting for the long-deferred proclamation, and many appeared thoroughly tired out, when at last a flourish of trumpets announced that the Judges of the Supreme Court were coming. There were about eleven carriages in the sombre procession, which was relieved only by the white bibs and tuckers of the Judges. It is curious to mark from a height a mass of persons sweeping over the ground to one common centre, and as the big wigs took their places one might have imagined that a heavy wind had taken them and swept them forward. Then, as the President took off his hat, a singular change came over the surface of black hats, which were raised, and disclosed an extended file of round white somethings, they might be potatoes or bald heads. The Garibaldi red dress was an immense relief, and, indeed, we are much indebted to it for the additional interest which it imparts to every spectacle. The President made a speech, which was received with occasional cheers. At last the number of the voters was proclaimed amidst the usual Neapolitan demonstrations. The comparative want of enthusiasm on the occasion may be explained by the fact that all high and generous feeling has been crushed out of the people; they have to be raised like those sunk in the mire; carefully tended like the sick, reared and developed like plants of great promise which have been placed out under the worst possible influences. If all that be done, they will become a people, and a fine people; but at present the looker-on must not be disappointed if he finds noise instead of hearty enthusiasm."

THE ARRIVAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES IN PLYMOUTH HARBOUR.—H.M.S. "IMPREGNABLE" FIRING A SALUTE.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

PORTION OF THE FAÇADE OF LUCCA CATHEDRAL.

THE VOYAGE OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

In our last number we announced the return of the Prince of Wales to this country from America, after a voyage which had been lengthened, by reason of adverse winds, as much beyond the usual time taken in crossing the Atlantic as to give additional zest to the fine welcome it received. We give two Engravings in connection with the Royal Highness's voyage—one, the departure of the Ingerogatz, to from Portland, United States; and the other the Ingerogatz, to Plymouth harbour, "baying deep-mouthed welcome" from its many from thrones as the Prince reached his native land.

The Times correspondent, who joined the Prince in America in the train of the Prince of Wales, on board her Majesty's ship Ariadne, gives an interesting account of the protracted voyage of the Royal squadron, from which we make extracts:—

DEPARTURE OF THE PRINCE FROM PORTLAND FOR ENGLAND.

Ninety-two days previous to the last moment the Prince of Wales stepped on board the Ariadne from Portland at 3 p.m. on the 20th of October. "The day on which the Prince came, with his own suite, to embark on board the Royal frigate was ushered in by a dull, cheerless morning, which, however, did not prevent every movement of the long progress, this last appointment was kept. Crowds thronged the streets of Portland, from the earliest hour, and by eight o'clock the quays, the ships in the bay were dressed with colours. There was a great shouting, cheering, and waving of handkerchiefs, as the Prince left the hotel with the chief members of his suite, stepped into the Hero's barge, and was followed by the second barge containing the rest of the suite. Another cutter manned yards and sheets, and the Hero was under way. Just as the barge with the Prince's standard went up to the Ariadne, the Royal squadron was steaming out of the harbour, and before the 21-gun salute given as the Prince passed the Hero's harbour. One last salute was fired, the hills with smoke, till the crowds were returned our gun salute, and the Hero gradually sank lower and lower, hidden and the land lay in a dim blue haze.

INCIDENTS OF THE VOYAGE.

For the first two or three days out both the Hero and Ariadne were under steam—the former at full speed, the latter at a slower rate, in order to keep her place behind the flag-ship. In short to keep her place behind the flag-ship. In spite of all, however, this latter vessel seemed to be no keeping her great speed within bounds, and between the two vessels there was a kind of race, which, as the wind freshened, became exciting. Even as it was, the Ariadne was not to be restrained, and with an incorrigible zeal among the sailors, with the cheers of the Prince. There were "challing" signals, too, going on between the two ships, as to the state of progress, and the distance between them, and much assistance in case they were very bad. In those, however, the Royal Highness was at the head of the Admiralty, and could not be expected to send one or two others, the boat of passengers on the poop of the Hero and immediately sent off to the Ariadne, and in one or two hours the boat of the Ariadne ranged up to close alongside that both parties could converse from their respective quarter-decks by means of speaking trumpets on their heads, and holding them up. Once, indeed, the Ariadne came close enough to both could speak without trumpets. This experiment was only attempted for one, for a heavy swell was running, and the two ships were within a few feet of each other, a collision against which, as the consequences might have been serious. Their yards actually touched, and Captain Vansittart saved the Ariadne from a broadside concussion by the promptest manœuvre, and from second collision. Even as it was, the Ariadne received a severe shock, which carried away one of her fore-yards. After this slight escape there was no more attempt to sail so close together, and the two ships were kept as far apart as the voyage would allow. Signals were as frequent as on the voyage, something for Prince's suite, and something for the ships to do, and were a source of perpetual interest. Sometimes they could make out what might, not part company with the Ariadne during the voyage, but sailing at a distance of from two to three miles. Yet the danger was not slight, imperceptible to light, and almost to sound—can only be understood by sailors.

THE "HERO" TAKEN IN TOW.

On Friday, 26th, signal was made to the Ariadne to tow. The idea of a 27-gun frigate towing a line-of-battle ship is a novel one, and one which seems almost absurd, but the Ariadne, either under sail or steam, is a powerful ship, and the Hero, out of fresh water, and with her fires out, could not tow the Hero in tow, and actually dragged her along through a fair wind, yielding over 7 knots, and a fine knots an hour. This seems almost incredible, and I must own that, had I not seen it myself, I should have considered it impossible. The Ariadne could not possibly have done this without in lightening that vessel to the utmost. Both vessels were rolling rather heavily, and the Ariadne was in lightening and pitching like a bar-pilot. No one knew the instant it would part, and as it was taken along [illegible] the Ariadne was under sail, and the Hero under steam, the strain of it, it was a constant source of anxiety to all. It went at last when a little more than 200 fathoms of the hawser which it was parted, but providentially it broke. There were plenty of other ships in sight, and the Ariadne was soon towing into the air and would also come to the assistance of the Hero. At the time the wind was perfect for wind had come at last from the north-west. The towing, therefore, was soon resumed, and the Hero was towed into port, and the Ariadne having here very hour to keep with the Hero.

SEVERE SQUALL.

During Saturday the breeze freshened more and more, the sea got up as the gloss went down, and the wind came in fierce squalls, driving rain and hail by and hail before the Hero. Sunday night there was a severe squall. The main-top-mast-staysail was taken in by the Hero, and, of course, the Ariadne was obliged to follow the example. The squall was of short but rather heavily, and strong traps were crashing about—the Ariadne was obliged to keep two very thick, with magnificent and beautiful sails, and the Hero was under bare poles, and the Ariadne was under close-reefed tops

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE BISHOP OF WORCESTER.

The Right Rev. Henry Pepys, D.D., Lord Bishop of Worcester, was the third son of Sir William Weller Pepys, K.C.B., Master in Chancery (who obtained a baronetcy in 1871), by his wife, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the Right Hon. William Dowdeswell, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was father of the well-known Physician-General to the Army, Sir Lucas Pepys, M.D., created a Baronet in 1857. He was also brother of Sir William Weller Pepys, second Baronet, who, after a distinguished career at the bar, married in 1845, and of Sir Charles Christopher Pepys, K.C.B., Master of the Rolls, a learned lawyer, who, after a successful career at the bar, was appointed to the Mastership of the Rolls in 1851, and resigned that office in 1856, when he was created a Peer for life with the title of Baron Cottenham, and appointed Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain and Ireland, which office he held from 1850 to 1851, and again from 1852 to 1858. Lord Cottenham died in 1851. The Bishop of Worcester was born in 1775, and was ordained in 1798. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, at the same college which took the degree of M.A. He preceded—M.A., 1819; B.D., 1824; D.D., 1826. He was successively Rector of Harrington, Lincolnshire; Rector of Morden, near Chipping Quarr, Essex, holding with it that of Aspenden, near Buntingford, Herts. In July, 1826, he was appointed Dean of Durham, and in 1840 he was elevated to the bishopric of Sodor and Man; and early in 1841 was translated to that of Worcester. Bishop Pepys's Private was of liberal policies, but is believed to have never made more than two speeches in the House of Lords. He married, on the 27th of January, 1814, Maria, daughter of the Right Hon. John Sullivan, by whom he has left two daughters: the eldest, Caroline Colonna Pepys, who married Lesley, only daughter of Lesley Grove, Esq., of Tullyallen, Tullamore; and the Rev. Richard Pepys, born 28th of October, 1830, Rector of Grimley-cum-Hallow, Worcestershire, and Chaplain to his father. Rector of Grimley-cum-Hallow, Worcestershire, and Chaplain to his father. The Bishop's wife, Maria Louisa, married to the Rev. Edward Washington Ingram, Rector of Standlake, Oxfordshire, and grandson of the first Earl of Mount Roseleague, Ireland; and finally, married to the Hon. and Rev. William Herbert Lyttelton, Rector of Hagley, Worcestershire, and Canon of Worcester, brother of Lord Lyttelton. The Bishop of Worcester died on the 14th inst., at his residence, Hartlebury Castle, Worcestershire. He was the Prelate who had filled the see of Worcester, which was founded in 679, Bosenus being the first Bishop, and St. Dunstan, Archbishop of Canterbury, the fourteenth. Cardinal Julius de Medicis, afterwards Pope Clement VII., was, in 1801, the forty-sixth Bishop of Worcester. Dr. Pepys's Right filled the see from 1777 to 1663, when he became Archbishop of Canterbury.

GENERAL THE HON. E. P. LYGON, C.B.

General the Hon. Edward Pleydell Lygon was born on the 11th inst., at his town residence, 37, Upper Brook-street, Grosvenor-square, after a very short illness, which set forth on 4th inst. He was the second son of the 1st Earl Beauchamp, by Caroline, daughter of James Dean, Esq., and was brother of William, the present Earl; John, the third Earl; and Mary, married and present Earl Beauchamp. He was born in 1784, and was educated at Eton. He entered the Army as Ensign, Lieutenant in the 2nd Life Guards, and served with distinguished gallantry in the Peninsula during the campaigns of 1813 and 1814, having joined the Army in Spain in November, 1812. He was at the battle of Vittoria, and was with his regiment to the close of the war. In 1815 he accompanied the Army to the Netherlands, and at Major and Lieutenant-Colonel, commanded the 2nd Life Guards at Waterloo, and behaved with distinguished gallantry. For his services on that glorious day he was made a C.B. He was also a Knight of the Order of St. Vladimir of Russia. For many years he commanded the 2nd Life Guards, and finally relinquished that command when he obtained promotion as Major-General. He held the appointment of Inspecting General of Cavalry for some years. He had received a gold war medal and one clasp for services in the Peninsula. He was made Colonel of the 1st Light Dragoons in January, 1837, and Lieutenant-General in January, 1837; a Lieutenant-General in 1846; and a General the 20th of June, 1854. He was never married.

LADY GODSMID.

Dame Isabel Goldsmid, Dowager Baroness de Goldsmid de Palmeira in Portugal, and Baroness in the U.K. 1st, of the family mentioned, 3rd, of Regent's Park, was the second daughter of Abraham Goldsmid, of Morden, Surrey, and was married, on the 29th April, 1804, to Sir Isaac Lyon Goldsmid, K.T.S., who was created a Baronet in 1841, and in 1846 succeeded his brother, John Simon Goldsmid, to the title of Baron, and who died on the 19th of April, 1859. By this marriage her Ladyship had issue six sons and four daughters, seven of whom survive, all of whom are living. Her second surviving son is Sir Francis Henry Goldsmid, the second and present Baronet.

MR. WARRE, M.P. for Bipon, died at his marine residence, West Cliff House, Ramsgate, on Saturday night, in his seventy-fourth year.

SIR DAVID BARCLAY, Bart., of Cameonere, Kirkcudbrightshire, has just died, aged eighty-seven years.

MR. WILLIAM CUNDALL, Q.C., died on Wednesday morning, at his residence, North Bank, St. John's-wood, aged sixty-five.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

BERTHELOT'S "ORGANIC CHEMISTRY FOUNDED ON SYNTHESIS," recently published, is analysed and criticised in the Journal des Savants by the well-known chemist, M. Dumas. The object of the author, he observes to render due justice to his great predecessor, Lavoisier, whom he considers to have been somewhat despondent in his views of the future, considering facts in the history of chemistry are discussed.

THE COTTON PLANT (Bussaceæ Gossypieæ), now of such great importance to French commerce, is the subject of the principal article in the new number of the Annales de Chimie. M. Decaisne gives a botanical history of the plant in all its different parts, as different species of its development, in an exhaustive manner.

THE LIGHT OF DUBOSCQ'S ELECTRIC LAMP has been successfully employed in photography by Foucault, Fizeau, and Breguet, in Paris. His mode of operation is given in the Journal of the Photographic Society. The expense of the process, on account of the powerful battery required, is great, and may only be reduced hereafter.

KEPLER.—Many interesting particulars respecting this great astronomer, and especially concerning his relations towards Wallenstein, the great antagonist of Gustavus Adolphus in the Thirty Years' War, are given by M. Odon Reverey, in a memoir recently published in the Comptes Rendus de l'Academy of St. Petersburg. Several "astrological nativities" cast by Kepler are given.

M. FLUCKER, in a memoir on the magnetic properties of various alloys, when compared with the experimental results of Faraday's theory of Sanmont, that these mixes are merely homogenous mixtures in variable proportions, and not true fundamental bodies, as they have a specific optic and cosmic rectangular positions.—Annales de Chimie.

FORMATION OF GLUCOSE.—M. Boussingault's opinion that starchy matters, before transformation into glucose (grape sugar) by the action of diluted acids, are first converted into dextrine, a gummy substance, from which becomes glucose by taking up four equivalents of water. M. F. Musculus, from starch researches, has arrived at different conclusions, and exposes his conviction that the formation of dextrine and glucose is rather the result of a modification of the molecular arrangement of the starch granules (or taking up water). The experiments upon which he founds their new theory are given in the Annales de Chimie.

CRANIOLOGY.—Macrocephalon (longheaded) is a term applied by the great Swedish Biunesiarch to a race of men who once existed in the inhabitants of some parts of Lower Austria and of the Crimea. M. von Baer has recently published a monograph on the subject in the Memoirs of the Academy of St. Petersburg, illustrated by plates, which exhibit a variety of skulls for comparison. He endeavours to show that the ancient Scythians, which the irruption of the Avars and other Asiatic tribes has left upon the present descendants of the race of Brachycephalon (shortheaded). He gives sixteen plates of the skulls of Chinese, Calmucks, and other Eastern races, with a description on their characteristics. The Scythian skull cannot be aware that in a work entitled "Crania Britannica" Mr. J. B. Davis and Dr. J. Thurnam are now publishing a magnificent description of the skulls of the aboriginal and early inhabitants of the British Islands, with sections of their other remains. The first volume, in quarto, with plates, has appeared lately. The work is printed for subscribers only, who pay one guinea for each volume. This work is of national interest, and the liberal encouragement of the Queen, several of the Sovereigns of Europe, a great number of distinguished nobles, and many of the learned societies of Europe and America.

ARTIFICIAL DEVELOPMENT OF FUNGI.—M. Pasteur lately exhibited to the Imperial Academy some experiments which prove that yeast, its dissolved in pure distilled water some crystallised ammoniacal acid salt, some sugar-candy, and some phosphates obtained from the calcination of yeast or beer. In this liquid he sowed some spores of penicillium, which germinated easily, and in two or three days the liquid abounded with tufts of mycelium, of which a large number displayed themselves on the surface and frectified. Vegetation did not at all languish. The ammoniacal salt hastened the development of infusoria, which would have arrested the progress of the young plants by absorbing the oxygen. All the carbon of the plants was derived from the sugar; their ashes from the ammonia; and their mineral matter from the phosphates. If any of the ingredients in dissolution were omitted the vegetation was suspended. M. Pasteur therefore considers that he has established a complete analogy between fermentg, fungi, and plants of a more complicated organism.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. Mc. Sec. Worcester.—A message in pigeon grass by correspondence for the past is contrary to my conclusion by moving the next move, but in games played by consultation the "touch and move" rule is not strictly enforced.

M. N. S.—The problem is correctly printed, as you will see on referring to the solution in last number.

MEDDLESOME.—Is not tantamount to giving the odds of the Pawn and Two Moves to Count de Casablanca. (Remove Black's K 2 from the Board.)

"DON QUIXOTE IN HIS STUDY," FROM A PICTURE BY ADOLPHE SCHRÖDTER.

ADOLPHE SCHRÖDTER is one of the artists in the highest repute in Germany, and in the full tide of his career, being somewhere about forty years of age. Judging from his works, he appears to avoid the sentimentalism of the revived school, and to supply himself to subjects of poetic history and genre, which he paints in a vigorous and intelligent style, entirely his own. His drawing is both bold and correct; his colour pure, brilliant, and harmonious. He bestows upon every part of his work the utmost finishedness of finish, but with less of art than is ordinarily observable in the German school of landscape painting. His influence upon the arts of his country will, doubtless, be considerable, filling as he does the offices of Professor at the Academy of Frankfort and at the School of Düsseldorf. One of Academy of Frankfort and at the School of Düsseldorf. One of Schröder's most famous pictures in the Royal Collection at Berlin is that of "Don Quixote in his Study," of which we give an Engraving. In the attitude and expression of the knight of the woful countenance, in the intentness with which he devours the visionary romances, in the little book open before him, we discern much more in the old story than the mere ludicrous incidents. Much of that peculiar tendency to mystic and suggestive treatment which we find in Albert Durer, and which, not unnaturally, is still indulged in by his successors in the same school. The study, which is but faintly lighted through a small, deeply-recessed wall, is strewed with other volumes, together with portions of the knight's armour, in "most admired disorder." Close at his hand is his lance, ready for use in the first chivalrous impulse.

The comparison to the above clever work in the Royal collection is an equally admirable presentment of the Shakspearean knight, "Falstaff." M. Schröder, by-the-by, is a great admirer of England's immortal bard, and his portfolio, we understand, is filled with Shakspearean studies, which he one day proposes to produce in oils.

THE BEAUCOUSIN COLLECTION.

THE most recent accession to our National Gallery, at least of those which have been exposed to public scrutiny, is the collection of thirty-one pictures purchased last year from M. Edmond Beaucousin, at Paris, for some £5000 or £6000. We do not recollect the exact amount. These pictures are of various schools, and various degrees of merit; and importance; and considerable conversation has been expressed by those who interest themselves in these matters upon the mode of purchase adopted in this and some other cases, miscellaneous lots being taken for the sake of one or two works which happen to be comprised in them, the rest being sold off or transferred to other public collections as occasion may serve. Without entering into this dispute at present, it must admit that, although the Beaucousin collection contains some specimens which we are glad to see in the National Gallery, particularly one or two of masters not hitherto represented there, they are as a whole of that high quality to warrant their incorporation in a collection of the highest class, and for public educational purposes.

We have selected half a dozen at random from amongst this collection for engraving. A brief description of them will suffice:—

"The Virgin and Child, with two Saints," by Francia, is an example of the simplicity and solemnity with which the earlier artists of the earlier Bolognese school treated devotional subjects; for it must be borne in mind that, although Francia died only two years before Raphael, he never completely emancipated himself from the trammels which at Rome and Florence constituted the revived school what it was; indeed, tradition states that he died of grief and remorse on seeing himself so much surpassed by his young friend Raphael in the "St. Cecilia" painted by the latter for the Church of St. Giovanni in Monte at Bologna.

The "Charity" by Salviati, a Florentine by birth (b. 1510, d. 1563), contrasts remarkably by the boldness displayed in its motive and grouping with the more modest work of Francia, and betrays that studied imitation of Michael Angelo in which the Roman school at this period unscrupulously indulged. This is the only specimen of the master in the National Collection.

The portrait of "Ariosto" by Titian represents the poet-friend of the great painter, in a front view, in a thoughtful mood. He wears a low crimson dress, showing his neck and shirt, with a gold chain on his neck, and fur hanging over his shoulders. He holds a rosary in his hand, which rests on a book. The author of the catalogue states is "apparently the art-friend, and the author of the celebrated lines of Niccolo Reniieri," portait described by Riddolfi as then in the possession of Niccolo Reniieri."

It was transferred to Vienna by Paul Louvert at Paris in 1857.

Giulio Romano, the favourite pupil of Raphael, frequently indulged in extravagance of design, which, whilst his execution, from carelessness and disregard of principles, sometimes degenerated into coarseness. The frieze-like work representing "The Capture of Carthagena, and the Continence of Scipio," though displaying considerable vigour in the composition and grouping, is as a whole by no means a favourable specimen of the master.

Martin Schoen, a German artist of the latter part of the fifteenth century, obtained his knowledge of painting, and particularly in the use of colours, from the elder Roger van de Weyden, called Roger of Bruges. The little picture of "The Death of the Virgin" is a curious example of the peculiar character of German painting at this period.

The scene is a chamber with a window looking out upon a square; the Virgin is represented having received the last offices of the Church, lying in a bed surrounded by the twelve Apostles, whose countenances are full of sorrow, various in degree and mode of expression. Above the head of the bed is the Deity, surrounded by angels, about to receive her soul.

John Mabuse was an important master of the Flemish school; a contemporary of Albert Durer of Germany, who, attracted by his renown, visited him, and expressed marked admiration of his genius. His scriptural and historical works are of the highest class, but they are but little known in this country.

In England are to be found "The Adoration of the Magi," formerly in the Orleans Collection, now at Castle Howard; a "Visitation," at Althorp; and "Adam and Eve," and "Jesus with the Rich Young Man," now or recently at Kensington Palace.

He visited England in the reign of Henry VII., whose portrait he painted, as well as that of Prince Arthur, who died in 1502. There are also several other English portraits by his hand. The portrait before us is a fair average specimen of his works in this line. It represents a man dressed in black fur over his shoulders, and a rosary in his hand—supposed to be judging from the architectural background, to be standing in a church

"DON QUIXOTE IN HIS STUDY."—FROM A PAINTING BY SCHRÖDTER.

LUCCA, TUSCANY.

TUSCANY is ere ably one of the most charming portions of the King of Sardinia's new dominions; and among the many pleasant places in Tuscany is Lucca, situated in the midst of a most fertile and well-cultivated country, and abounding in interesting objects for the lovers of arts and antiquities.

"Lucca Industriosa," as it is called, is a busy, thriving place. It was a city of importance as far back as the rule of the Lombard Kings, and afterwards had Dukes of its own. In the twelfth century it became a free city. Then it fell upon evil days, and was lorded over by the stranger for many years, till, in 1805, the Luccheze purchased a master and their liberty from Charles IV. for the sum of 300,000 florins, and remained independent till 1799, when the French entered upon possession, and after them the city became a portion of the dominions of the Duke of Tuscany. Within the last year, as every one knows, it has cast in its lot with the Re Galantuomo.

Lucca is famous for the large number of remarkable churches it contains, chiefly in the Lombard style. At the head of the list stands the Duomo, or Cathedral, a very remarkable monument. It was founded, in 1060, by Anselmo Badagio, afterwards Pope Alexander II., who presented the consecrated banner to William of Normandy when he invaded England. Little remains, however, of the first building. The fine arcade of three unequal arches—two of very noble dimensions—and the surrounding three tiers of small ones, were erected by the architect Guidetto, in 1204. Both small and large columns, as will be seen from the portion we give in our Engraving, are richly sculptured. The inlaid work on the front, representing hunting subjects, &c., is very curious, and the portico abounds with quaint and elaborate ornaments. "Over the left-hand door is a semicircular alto-relievo of the Deposition, by Nicolo di Pisa. On the architrave below is a very rude mezzo-relievo of the Adoration of the Magi, attributed to Giovanni, his son. Between the doors are four reliefs representing subjects from the life of St. Martin (to whom the cathedral is dedicated). Below are the twelve months of the year, with their attributes—a man sitting over a fire for January, reaping for June, the vintage for September, &c.; and near is an equestrian statue of the patron saint dividing his robe with the naked." On the right-hand side of this façade rises the lofty campanile, or tower.

The columns of the lower arches of the nave are Lombard, the upper portions Gothic of the beginning of the fourteenth century. The triforium, of large dimensions, is filled in its arches with rich Gothic tracery. The stained glass is rich, and the pavement is inlaid with curious Gothic patterns.

From the vaulting of the nave hangs a large iron cresset, connected with which a curious ceremony takes place. Whenever the Archbishop officiates pontifically on high festivals the ceremony of burning fax in this cresset takes place, during which the choristers chant "Sic transit gloria mundi."

This cathedral contains many interesting pictures, marble sculptures, and works in wood and metal. Here is the famous "Volto Santo," a crucifix carved in cedar-wood, said to have been made by Nicodemus, and brought to Lucca in 782. It obtained such a high reputation that one King, William Rufus, swore constantly "per Vultum de Lucca." "The figure is long and meagre, clothed in a pastoral dress, stiff and dark." It is exposed for the devotion of the people three times in the year, crowned with a silver-gilt crown.

San Michele is a fine imposing church, hardly second to the cathedral; the rich façade was built by Guidetto, the same architect who afterwards erected the front of the Duomo. Its exterior character has been wrought by time on one of the churches—San Frediano. It has been completely turned round, the principal entrance occupying the place where stood the original apse. Formerly it stood without the walls, and now is comprised within them. Thus far the changes during the fourteenth century.

Among noteworthy buildings are the Ducal Palace, the Deposito di Mendicità—a building in red brick; in the Italian Gothic style—the Palazzo Pretorio, &c. Some chapels in the neighbourhood are also interesting.

The ramparts extend eastward for a league, and are well planted with fine trees, and, commanding an extensive view of the fertile and well-cultivated plain, backed by a chain of lofty hills, form a delightful promenade. The aqueduct, completed in 1832, is a fine work. The arches, 499 in number, commence from a reservoir at the base of the hills, whence the water is collected, and run for a distance of 380 miles among historical ruins, terminating in a distributing reservoir near the city. Until this aqueduct was completed the city was worse supplied with water than Lucca. The cost was upwards of £45,000.

Lucca retains traces of two monuments of the Romans—namely, a portion of an amphitheatre, built in the beginning of the second century, and some remains of a theatre.

The neighbourhood is famous for chestnut-trees, their cultivation having been continued since the fifteenth century, and their fruit is the principal food of the mountaineers. The chestnuts are dried in an oven, ground to flour, mixed with water, and baked between hot stones into sweet and nutritious cakes. Lucca has the credit of being the first place in Italy where silk was produced and manufactured, having been introduced from Sicily about the fourteenth century.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT PRESENTS AT CALCUTTA.

On the return of the Viceroy and Governor-General of India from his official tours through the country it is usual to sell by public auction the presents he has received, and which the forms of Indian State receptions require to be taken and reciprocated by "nuzzers" presents, quid pro quo, given in exchange. The sale of the valuable presents received during the late tour of his Excellency the Right Honourable the Governor-General and Viceroy of India took place on the 27th of August last and ten following days, on the premises of Messrs. Hamilton and Co., Calcutta, jewellers, &c., to the Viceroy. Messrs. Hamilton and Co., Calcutta, jewellers, &c., to the Viceroy. Messrs. Hamilton and Co., Calcutta, jewellers, &c., to the Viceroy. Our Engraving on page 483 represents the salaroom, and the varied countenances, costumes, and characters of the assembly form a curious variation to what would be seen at a salaroom in England; although the eagerness of bidders for purchasing at these sales, as is the case at home, often outruns their discretion. The presents consisted of articles of native jewellery, arms, armour, shawls from the looms of Cashmere, Umritsir, Delhi, and Lucca; muslins and embroidery of Dacca; articles of furniture and ornaments of which were hung about the salaroom, and formed a truly Oriental background to the dark faces of the purchasers in the company. The ten days were not wholly occupied by the sale of the Government presents. At the same time was disposed of a number of very magnificent jewels taken at the Bellie Guard, Lucknow, and lately handed over to the ex-King of Oude by the British Government, lately handed over to the ex-King of Oude by the British Government, Messrs. Hamilton and Co. selling the same under the orders of the present ex-King for his benefit. Many of these said jewels were of the greatest magnificence and rarity. One of the necklaces, composed of emeralds which were pierced and strung in triple rows, was of the weight of two pounds and a half; one of the rows or four lines of emeralds of great brilliancy weighed over fifty carats. A crown of very brilliant diamonds, another of emeralds, another of cat's-eyes, and one of amethysts, have been sold. Some of the emeralds and rubies were of great antiquity, bearing the names of Indian Monarchs engraved on their surfaces from the time of Timour Shah. Many curious articles of Indian manufacture in precious stones, pearls, jade, &c., were included in the sale.

The auction was numerously attended throughout by the native nobility and gentry, as also by the native jewellers, who were the principal purchasers, although the most valuable lots were sold to the European residents.

These consisted of the celebrated Oude diamond, weighing upwards of fifty-six rattees (one rattee is 1·979 grain), which sold for 35,100 rupees: also two other large diamonds, which were knocked down for 17,500 and 31,700 rupees respectively. The sixth day's sale included a most valuable ornamental gold howdah, which was purchased for about 2500 diamonds of various sizes, and was secured by a wealthy Rajah for 40,250 rupees. The supplementary catalogue comprised a superb diamond crown, purchased for 29,000 rupees. Of the precious stones in this collection the emerald attracted most attention, from their immense size, one of which was of such dimensions as to allow it to be cut in the shape of an eggcup, and weighed upwards of 1600 rutees. There was also a large collection of "Jehire" or "signet rubies," of which a necklace realised 24,000 rupees, and was greatly enhanced by the fact of one of the stones having the name of the first King and great Persian conqueror of Delhi, "Timour Shaw," engraved on it.

Of the Government presents the Cashmere shawls included some of the finest specimens produced; the prices ranged from 400 to 4000 rupees each. Great competition took place for a set of silver elephant trappings, sold for 13,000 rupees.

The total amount of the sale was calculated at upwards of ten lacs of rupees (£100,000).

Our Engraving represents the putting up of a Cashmere shawl. The salesman on the table is displaying the article to a group of gentlemen, one of whom has felt the texture, and examines the edge at the top, instead of at bay. The man to the left of him looks at their backs, at the top, at the bottom, are the descendants of the celebrated Tippoo Saïb. In the right hand is perceived a native of the Punjaub, who has set his old half-case crier, calling out the bids in English and in Hindoostanee. These three are "Mustapha Lyallee," "Ramsay Lyallee," and "Hamilton," conducted for the Messrs. Hamilton. The fat old fellow with the spectacles on, sitting cross-legged on the table, is Hamilton's accountant.

The Hop Duty Payment has been postponed. The collection of the sum due this month is postponed till March next, and the collection of this year's duty is postponed from March to September. Thus the public security must be eaten and insured.

Life-boat Gifts to Scotland.—A benevolent lady resident in Edinburgh has contributed to the National Life-boat Institution a donation of £1000, to be applied in forming a life-boat station on the Scottish coast, to be called after her deceased husband. The gift is to be known as the "Mackenzie Life-boat Fund." It is her wish that the life-boat should be stationed at the nearest point to the spot where the late Mr. Mackenzie was drowned, which is believed to be Lamlash Bay, in the Island of Arran, which is likewise situated on the west coast of Scotland. The donor has also presented sets of the Institution's silver medals to Captain Mackenzie, of Irvine Bar, who every one of late unfortunate events has been the means, by the use of his own life-boat, of saving life. The Institution has now life-boats at the following places on the Scotch coast:—Arbroath, Aye, Banff, Berwick Bar, Buckie, Burntisland, Cockenzie, Dunbar, Eyemouth, Fraserburgh, Girvan, Gourdon, Inverbervie, Kirkcaldy, Montrose, Newhaven, Peterhead, Port Patrick, Portpatrick, Queensferry, Redcastle, Stonehaven, Tarbert, Troon, Wick, and Yarmouth. In a very few years every one of these boats is the gift of private persons, who, with one or two exceptions, have no connection with Scotland. Since 1824, when the Institution was established in Scotland, it is estimated that about £50 a year is required to keep it in an efficient state for the whole coast.

The Great Ocean Survey.—The following letter from Sir Leopold M'Clintock, R.N., to Captain Collinson, C.B., has been received at the Admiralty:—"We have scarcely brought to a close about as tough a job as could well be imagined. The most heartbreaking work was the getting the ship down to (in the ship) in the head of Hamilton Inlet, but South Greenland. Our progress was impeded by almost unremitting gales of wind, and we had to go up to Godthaab (64 deg. north) because I could get into any harbour. On the 9th of September I proceeded in the ship's boats to Cape Farewell, and expected to find the Fox, but could obtain no intelligence respecting her. Our vessel was the object to arrive there with provisions, as the ice was quite impenetrable. The Fox (with Captain Allan Young, Colonel Shaffner, and Dr. Rae on board) left Hamilton Inlet on the 6th of August, 1859, for Cape Farewell, and I fear she has been detained by ice on the east coast of Greenland, although in a letter Young left for me at Godthaab he says he expected to get round to Disco Strait, to obtain an interpreter for the east coast. We have had desperate weather during the progress of October, and the ship was aground (leaking) when we lost two boats, had our bowsprit snapped off by a sea; but, as the gunwale only held it fish, the ship's head was kept to wind, and we got her into Disco in that shape. The iron tiller was also broken, and a vast deal of damage done to the quarters, gunwale, stanchions, bulwarks, &c. Upon the whole, I have no fears for thirty hours, sleet, shift, and sea coming over aft; but I am sorry to say that I have not succeeded in getting the ship home. To accomplish a line of soundings agreeable enough to the Admiralty has proved the most difficult service I have had from Cape Farewell to Holsteinborg, and I have encountered severe weather; yet we have sounded in intervals of every fifty miles, the intervening space being generally smooth water; but at the same time the present is such a bad year that the Danes in Greenland say they have had one of the worst for the last twenty years. The ice has been very favourable in Labrador, and very little ice seen there. In Iceland, also, the summer has been very fine. We have had no ice, and the crops have been all collected, and the ship's have suffered accordingly; paddle-arms bent, extensive chafed away, and a good upper deck standing only in the waist. Upon the whole, it is now quite eager for a good caulking. I think we have done our work well, but at least we have been all we can do. I intend to leave the ship about the end of November, and shall be with you in December, when I hope to receive your commands, and which, I trust, will be to order me home. I am, however, ready to go to Hamilton Inlet, I doubt if forty-five fathoms can be carried inside the outer islands, and would not like to be with the ship in the event of a heavy gale of wind, and there is an exterior bank along that part of the coast having between 30 and 100 and 200 fathoms water on it, so that it is impossible to anchor in safety. I am sorry to trouble you with so long a letter, but I am struggling to get across to Rockall, but they are not favourable circumstances of weather. I do so they would favour me with a sight of the Rockall. The Danish Government has obtained deep water soundings inside of the Holsteinborg Reef, and I have obtained deep water soundings inside of the south-east wind is still blowing which has scarcely ceased since the 18th of October.—Most sincerely yours, F. L. M'Clintock, R.N."

THE GREAT SCHOOLS OF ENGLAND.

No. I.—WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.

"In potiora pugilemque."

The proposition for removing the chief collegiate schools of the metropolis to places remote from the contaminating influences of a great city and from the public night-plague of London, and to erect new ones in a purer atmosphere, is one of the most important domestic questions upon which the public mind has been exercised during the last many years. That sooner or later the rapid increase of population in London will render the removal of the Law Courts, the Custom-house, the Houses of Parliament, and Christ's Hospital—not merely desirable but absolutely necessary, we have no doubt. That the school of Westminster will then be removed with them, is already a two full meetings of Old Westminsters have been held to discuss the subject, and a committee, consisting of some of the most influential noblemen and gentlemen educated at St. Peter's, has been appointed to consider the present state of the collegiate establishment, the changes which have been advanced for its improvement. Pending the publication of their report, we purpose giving a series of engravings representing the principal features of our great public schools, with brief notices of their rise and progress, and a list of the most celebrated of their scholars.

We have elected to take Westminster first, partly from the number of recollections and ties by these acquired with the ancient establishment which, in after life, enabled them to do meritorious services for their country and mankind, but chiefly because, of all our public schools in connection with the metropolis and with the ancient Palace and Court of Westminster, it seems naturally to claim priority of notice. Westminster in its present form as School of Christ and Church is not so ancient as its two great rivals, Eton and Winchester, whose foundations date, respectively, from the reigns of Henry VI. and William of Wykeham; but there can be no question that there had existed from time immemorial a grammar school attached to the Abbey Monastery of St. Peter's, which, in fact, therefore, while the actual statutes are due to Henry VIII. and Queen Elizabeth, their regal founders were no more than the restorers and reformers of a school which, in likewise situated on the west coast of Scotland, and which, in likewise situated on the west coast of Scotland, and which, in likewise situated on the west coast of Scotland, and

LE SOMMIER ELASTIQUE PORTATIF.—
LE MEAL and SON have patented a method of making a spring mattress portable. This mattress, which is made in three separate parts, and when joined together has all the comfort of a spring mattress, is now made in such a manner that, when packed for travelling, it cannot be more bulky, to which the usual spring mattress is very liable: the price, also, are much below those of the best spring mattresses, viz.:

2 ft. 6 in. by 6 ft.	3 in. long	£1 15 0
3 ft. 0 in.	ditto	2 2 0
3 ft. 6 in.	ditto	2 10 0
4 ft. 6 in. wide by 6 ft. 6 in. long		3 10 0
5 ft. 0 in.		3 19 0
6 ft. 0 in.		4 10 0

The Sommier Elastique Portatif, therefore, combines the advantage of elasticity, durability, cleanliness, portability, and cheapness. An Illustrated Catalogue of Bedsteads, Bedding, and Bedroom Furniture sent free by post on application.—Heal and Son, 196, Tottenham-court-road, W.

memorial was addressed to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster signed by nearly six hundred old Westminsters, in which the memorialists record their "firm and deliberate belief, founded on experience and reflection, that the abolition of the Westminster Play cannot fail to prove prejudicial to the interests and the prosperity of the school." The play has again been suspended for two years, but we are glad to hear that the authorities of the school intend to revive it this winter, and have selected for representation the "Trinummus" of Plautus. The college hall, a structure about 47 feet long by 27½ feet wide, is an elegant building of the reign of Edward III., erected as a refectory for the Abbot by Abbot Litlington. It adjoins the celebrated Jerusalem Chamber. The pavement is a chequered pattern of Purbeck marble, and on the corbels of the roof are the (traditional) arms of Edward the Confessor, Nicholas Litlington, and other abbots. The tables are believed to have been framed of wood taken from the wreck of the Spanish Armada. At the south end is the usual gallery for musicians, now casemated towards the hall and employed as a pantry, behind which are the batteries and hatches. Westminster has been peculiarly fortunate in the number of celebrated men who at various periods of her history have dedicated their best days to the instruction of her sons. Among the most notable of these were Alexander Nowell, W. Camden, and Dr. Busby in earlier times, and, more recently, Archbishop Markham and Dean Vincent. Nowell in his day was as renowned a fisher as Izaak Walton became a century later, and is, accordingly, represented in his picture at Brazenose with the hooks, tackle, and other emblems of his favourite sport. Fuller in his quaint way says of him, "Whilst Nowell was a catching of fishes, Bonner was a catching of Nowell, and, understanding where he was, designed him for the shambles." The danger he was in, indeed, was so urgent that he dared not return to his own house to make preparation for flight; so, "like an honest angler, he had taken provision for the day, and, when, in the first year of England's deliverance, he returned to his country with his old haunts, he remembered that on the day of his flight he had left a bottle of beer in a safe place on the bank." There he searched for it, "but found no bottle, but a tun, such was the sound at the opening thereof;" and "this," adds Fuller, "is believed (casually is the mother of more inventions than industry) the original of bottled ale in England." To William Camden, the immortal author of "The Britannia," Westminster owes the compilation of her first Greek grammar, "Institutio Græcæ Grammaticæ compendiaria in usum Scholæ Regi Westmonasteriensis"—a work which, published originally in 1597, has since passed through more than a hundred editions. In Oxford he founded the Professorship of History which bears his name. Anthony à Wood says of Camden that he "was an exact critic and philologist, an excellent Grecian, Latinist, and historian, and, above all, a profound antiquary, as his elaborate works do testify."

Of Richard Busby we have already spoken. He earned his sobriquet of unswerving dignity for the unparalleled length of fifty-seven years, and during all the vicissitudes of the period he maintained the ancient loyalty of the school.

Of those who under such masters have rendered their names illustrious our space will permit us to mention but a few. Among the earlier of these we may particularise Bishops Overall and Ravis, the translators of the Bible; Richard Hakluyt, who records that his love of maritime enterprise commenced when a Queen's scholar in that fruitful nursery, Westminster School; "rare Ben Jonson," the pupil of Camden, to whom he dedicated his first play, "Every Man in his Humour;" Dudley, inventor of the scale named after him, and the discoverer of the variation of the magnetic needle; Heminge, one of the editors of the first folio edition of Shakespeare; Sir Dudley Carleton; Sir Richard Lane, who conducted the defence of Lord Strafford; Lord Keeper Williams; George Herbert, "the sweet singer of the Temple;" Abraham Cowley—deliciæ, decus et desiderium sui—whose genius was so precocious that he wrote his "Pyramus and Thisbe" when only ten years of age, and his "Constantia and Philetus" when only twelve. To these we may add the still greater poet John Dryden; the celebrated Locke, Dean Prideaux, Lord Chancellors Finch and Macclesfield, Lord Halifax, Bishop Atterbury, Matthew Prior, Nicholas Rowe, the rival physicians Mead and Friend; Christopher Wren, "hujus ecclesiæ atque urbis conditor," as his monument at St. Paul's justly designates him; Browne Willis and Peck, the antiquaries; William Cowper, the poet; Sir Roger Newdegate, founder of the prize for English verse at Oxford; Pulteney Earl of Bath; Bishop Newton, the author of the famous work on "The Prophecies;" and, to more modern times, Warren Hastings; Churchill the satirist; Bonnel Thornton, and the two Colmans, Lord Thurlow, Horne Tooke; Edward Gibbon, the historian; Robert Southey, Sir George Rose; Fynes Clinton, the accomplished author of the "Fasti Hellenici;" the Marquis of Anglesey and all the Pagets, Lord Raglan, Lord Combermere, Sir James Graham, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Archbishop Longley, and Sir David Dundas.

THE CURRENT OF LIBERALISM.

If at this moment a thoughtful philosopher was to survey mankind, if not exactly to Pera, yet from China to a great many parts of the world, he would perhaps feel that there is a strange movement towards what, for want of a more expressive word, we must call Liberalism. The Princes of the earth appear to have arrived at some notion that the foundations of the old system of despotism are no longer based upon a rock. Turn to almost every nation of Europe, and we find that there are signs and symptoms of the working of a spirit which, unless it is acknowledged and dealt with wisely and politically, will eventuate in an outbreak like, but wider and stronger, than that of 1848. The course just adopted by the Emperor of the French, who, by a simple decree, has created a change in the governmental plan of his empire which rises almost to the height of a revolution, bears with it a significancy and an importance which are not confined to the immediate fact or its direct results. It is not now to be questioned that the ruler of that great nation is gifted with remarkable prescience. No one looks with a better understanding at the signs of the times, or is more careful to anticipate them. The circumstance that Louis Napoleon has undertaken to constitutionalise—so to speak—his Government at this present juncture will mark an epoch in the progress of free institutions on the Continent. Of course, we have already had some sneers and some slighting remarks on the nature and extent of the changes just promulgated by the Emperor from a class of writers and thinkers who, taking their stand on the British Constitution, confine themselves to looking forward without condescending to glance backward at the history of English rights and privileges. These guides of public opinion always deliver themselves of their criticisms on the conduct of foreign statesmanship as if they believed that we happy Anglo-Saxon islanders enjoyed the blessings of constitutional government in all its fulness and immunity from the time when our ancestors painted their parts of their persons blue which were not covered with the skins of wild beasts. They are too ready to forget that, despite of the stereotyped laudation of Magna Charta, it is hardly more than a hundred and seventy years since even the actual struggle for our liberties began, and that, if those liberties have been really perfected, the date of that era may be almost ascertained by counting on our fingers. It is not by such a narrow standard that the difficulties and trials by which our forefathers attained to the exercise of their rights as men and citizens are to be judged.

In our own case, our great end has no doubt been attained by the people as contradistinguished from the Sovereign. But that is no reason that we should set our faces against any idea of concessions to popular privileges emanating from absolute rulers. It is not an unwarranted nor an unreasonable thing to suppose that the time is coming when absolutism must pass away as an institution; and not among the least of those indications of such an event is the movement of despotic Sovereigns towards the inauguration of a new state of things. It may be a mistake, but it is quite possible that existing Monarchs may have that by timely adaptation to the exigencies of the age they may render their own personal interests secure in the midst of inevitable change and reorganisation; they may think that it will be in their power to realise the suggestion of Richard II, to this effect—"Let us become the leaders of their peoples in the race of progress. Whether they would be likely to be successful in such a scheme it is not necessary at present to consider; but what we desire to do is to point out that the examples of Kings and Potentates in their concessions to their subjects are at least born from a belief of the expediency of the moment. We are not prepared to assert that the Emperor of the French has issued a programme of a full-grown constitution, and that he has left the regulations for the conduct of his Ministry and Legislature are to be taken as reproductions of such a system as our own. It may very well be that the Senate and Legislative Corps of France are so organised that little actual opposition to the wishes of the Emperor is to be anticipated under the new regime. But on the face of it the important privilege of freedom of debate is granted to that body. The permission to present an address in answer to the speech of the Emperor at the opening of the Chambers is an invitation to criticism, even if it is not at once accepted. The reporting and publication of the debates, if not coincident with our own system—which after all is permitted here only by a fiction of Parliament—is an immense step in advance of the old system of absolute secrecy in this point gained. The immediate results may be rendered comparatively worthless, but the principle may be rendered comparatively worthless, but the principle may be rendered comparatively worthless by the modus operandi; but it is a fact, and may grow into a great fact. The position and the character of the Emperor may enable him to act upon the present state of things according to his own ideas, and he may have the power to mould his Legislature and its records in consonance with his own will, but, supposing a new reign in France, how much would be gained towards the assertion of popular rights by the fact of such a machinery being in existence? The suggestion is obvious.

While considering this decree of the Emperor, it is proper to connect it with other changes which rumour tells us are in contemplation. It is said that a Minister will properly be appointed to that department of the State which has the newspaper press under its control whose opinions and tendencies are known to be opposed to violent measures and undue restrictions. Such an appointment would of itself speak volumes in favour of a progressive relaxation of a rule which if carried outwardly progressive relaxation of a rule which if carried outwardly with vehemence is inwardly essentially one of iron. Then, too, with votes we cannot but observe the stand which the Emperor is making against priestly domination and the Papal power in his empire, and it would not be very surprising if, ere long, we were to hear of another Sovereign besides Queen Victoria the head of the Church as well as of the realm. Neither, in this Journal, should we fail to associate the recent proceedings of his Imperial Majesty with those commercial and fiscal alterations which the Chamber of Commerce have completed by the signature of the Treaty of Commerce between this country and France: and which places the customs tariff of our nearest neighbour the nearest to our own in its liberal provisions. With every sense of the modified nature of the alterations in his plan of Government which have been proclaimed by the Emperor, and without expounding upon them any extravagant notions of the immediate advent of constitutional rule, pure and simple, we yet venture to assert that the first and by no means a short step has been made in that direction.

Supposing, as we have hazarded the supposition, that this act of Louis Napoleon is a sign of the times, a glance at some of the other nations of the world will go far to justify it. On Italy it is not necessary to dwell. In that case, happily, we are able to speak of the accomplishment of a great and constitutional government, and if anything need now be said of that kingdom it would be only to refer to her as the pioneer in the march of Liberalism all over Europe, the commencement of which we are taking on ourselves to predict as at hand. But look at Austria! Can for a whim or a caprice that an attempt has been made to establish what is called a constitution in Hungary. Has a whisper that has gone about of a contemplated abdication of his crown by Francis Joseph been derived from a mere wish which the father to the thought? Following that as that rumour did on the bootless and unsatisfactory congress of Sovereigns at Warsaw, it may be commenced with an actual meditation in the mind of the Emperor. I so, on what can that be founded but on a conviction that he is unable to maintain his hold on his realm by the means and by acting on the principles of government of which he is known to be a stanch adherent. Again, was there no significancy in that ominous reception of the Czar of all the Russias in his progress through Poland? In his own hereditary dominions there are many circumstances, and a great ideal going on, which would have startled Nicholas and maddened Peter the Great. And still more significant was the fact that even the United States of America, the land of liberty par excellence are trembling on the verge of disruption, on a question in which is involved the very essence of the personal and political freedom of man. Then, too, we are informed that China into the area of that which we have to do civilisation, and we have taught a large section of the subjects of that realm to rise in insurrection against a despotism which they are beginning to understand.

We have endeavoured to make out something like a case for a belief we entertain, that the world is on the eve, if not of a great mutation, at least of a struggle of principles of government. It is far from our design to assert that there are immediately prospects of rebellion and bloodshed, and armed contests between the many and the few. On the contrary, all the ideas we entertain on this subject are based on a confidence that any great revolution which may be coming to pass will be worked out by the influences which flow from sound principles and by the irresistible advance of truth and justice. Intercourse and community between free nations and the rest of the world is spreading further and wider every day; and that civilisation, which is rounded and completed by the blessings of freedom is gradually but surely making its way, and that in a manner which none of the artificial bulwarks behind which the representatives of old-world dominion have been accustomed to maintain themselves can eventually resist.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Napoleon met with an enthusiastic reception on Monday night at the Opera. No sooner was his Majesty perceived in the Imperial box than the crowded audience broke out into demonstrations of the sympathy of the felt by the intelligent classes respecting the new decree.

Count Thalstad is definitely appointed French Ambassador to the Court of Spain, vice M. Mercy having declined the appointment.

Count Walewski has been appointed Minister of State, in place of M. Fould, whose resignation has been accepted.

An Imperial decree confers upon M. Vintry the rank of Commander of the Legion of Honour.

The Moniteur of Tuesday contains the following appointments:—Count Persigny, Minister of the Interior; M. Rouher, Minister without portfolio; M. Forcade Laroquette, as Minister of Finance; M. Magne, as Minister without portfolio; M. Benedetti, as Councillor of State for extraordinary service.

The Moniteur of yesterday week published a convention concluded between the Emperor Napoleon and Francis and Prince, arranging several questions in reference to the annexation of Savoy and Nice. It is to determine the future position of the neutralised territories in Savoy determined on the future position of the neutralised territories in Savoy and Nice shall be 44 millions of Rentes, which the French Government shall remit to Sardinia. The charge incurred by Sardinia on account of Savoy and Nice will be transferred to France.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORMS.

Last Sunday's Moniteur contained some of the most important decrees which the official journal of France has registered since the creation of the second Empire. The Emperor has decided that the Senate and the Legislative Body shall participate in the responsibility of Legislative Body shall participate in the responsibility of Government. Henceforward the Chambers will have to discuss the domestic and foreign policy of the Government, whose acts and speeches will be reported in the newspapers. The following is the Imperial decree, which was promulgated in charging the whole Government machinery of Imperialism:—

"Napoleon, by the grace of God and the national will, Emperor of the French: to all whom these presents may concern—Wishing to give to the act which we have performed by convoking the Senate and the Legislative Body a more direct participation in the exercise of the supreme power, and to assure the independence of our resolutions, we have decreed, and do hereby decree, as follows:—

ART. 1. The Senate and the Legislative Body shall vote every year, at the opening of the Session, an address in answer to the speech of the Government Councillors.

2. The address shall be discussed in presence of the Government Councillors, who shall give to the Chambers all necessary explanations as to the state and the interests of the empire.

3. In order to facilitate the discussion of the opinions of the Legislative Body in the matter of the address and the exercise of the right of amendment, Arts. 54 to the number of the Senatus Consultum of the 25th December, 1852, and Art. 29 of our decree of the 24th November, 1852, shall be modified in the following manner:—"Senators and members of the Legislative Body may, on the day after the address is delivered, lay before the Senate, having its committee, shall hold a secret sitting, at which a minister will take part. The present clause is not applicable either to bills relating to taxes or to the budget.

4. For the purpose of rendering more prompt and more complete the reports of the discussions of the Senate and of the Legislative Body, the decision of the Senatus Consultum shall be presented to the Senate and the Legislative Body by one of the ministers, who shall be charged with the duty drawn up by the reporters placed under the authority of the President of the Senate and of the Legislative Body. The reports shall be submitted to the examination of the President and the members of the Council of State, before being printed.

5. The functions of Minister of State, Vice-President of the Council of Ministers, and Minister of Public Instruction and Worship, are suppressed, and the attributions are given to the Ministers without portfolios have the same rank and salary as Ministers exercising functions. They form part of the Council of Ministers, and have reference specially to the Emperor.

6. The service of the Civil List is suppressed, and its attributions are given to the Ministers without portfolio, under the superintendence of the Minister of Public Instruction and Worship.

7. The service of the university, are removed from the Ministry of Public Instruction and Worship to the superintendence of the Minister of State.

8. The service of the breeding studs is removed from the Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce to the Ministry of the Household of the Emperor.

9. The Grand de Chancelour-Lauret, ex-Minister of Algeria and the Colonies, is named Minister of the Marine and Colonies, in the room of Admiral Hamelin, appointed to other functions.

11. Admiral Hamelin is named Grand Chancellor of the Legion of Honour, in the room of Marshal Pelissier, who de Malakoff, appointed to other functions.

Marshal Pelissier, Duke de Malakoff, is named Governor-General of Algeria.

The Ministers without portfolios have the same rank and salary as Ministers exercising functions. They form part of the Council of Ministers, and have reference specially to the Emperor.

The service of the University, are removed from the Ministry of Public Instruction and Worship to the superintendence of the Minister of State.

The service of the breeding studs is removed from the Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce to the Ministry of the Household of the Emperor.

SPAIN.

The marriage of the Infante Don Sebastian and the Infanta Donna Antonia of Portugal took place on the 14th with considerable pomp in the Royal Palace, in presence of the Queen and King, the Patriarch of the Indies officiating. The Queen Mother and the Infanta Donna Isabella, the Queen, on the occasion of her fête, gave 50,000 reals to the poor.

ITALY.

The Ministerial journal of Turin declares that the delay in the formal recognition of the Kingdom of Italy by Victor Emmanuel is not attributable to diplomatic considerations. His Ministers are ready to admit that the title of Emperor is guaranteed without Parliamentary authority, but shall be conferred by the vote of the Italian Parliament. Victor Emmanuel, however, does not seem to have any objection to contribute to expense the irritation of Garibaldi's followers and gratify the wishes of the Neapolitan populace. Accordingly, a Royal Decree appointed the generality of Garibaldi's officers. Another decree has abolished the Italian Legion, and by its rules and regulations the Legion is not to be separate from the regular army, and shall be liable to serve in any part of the kingdom. Other decrees regulate the rank and salary of Garibaldi's officers. Another decree has abolished the Neapolitan Order of St. Januarius, and has given the Legion a proper name. It has been given that the Government will undertake great public works. The custody of the forts of Naples has been confided to the officers and soldiers of the Southern army to whom the defence of the capital is confided.

The siege of Gaeta seems to languish. It was reported that Prendi II. had broken a bloodvessel; according to another rumour he would leave Gaeta in a few days.

On Tuesday week Victor Emmanuel was on the Campo reviewing a body of men consisting of 15,000 National Guards and of 16,000 regular troops. The crowd was immense, and gave Victor Emmanuel a most hearty reception. His Majesty first reviewed the National Guards, a proper compliment to the newly annexed provinces, and afterwards the regulars. The review lasted from 9 o'clock in the morning to 3 o'clock in the afternoon, on Montebello and Solferino. After the review, in which his Majesty was accompanied by a brilliant staff, the troops defiled before the King.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegram was received at Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday):—

COMMERCIAL TREATY BETWEEN SARDINIA AND THE HANSE TOWNS.—BREMEN, NOV. 29.—A convention was concluded between the Hanse Towns and Sardinia on the 20th of September for the extension of their mutual commercial relations. The treaty has been ratified within the last few days.

BELGIUM.

The Belgian Budget of Ways and Means for 1861, which has just been presented to the Chamber, is as favourable as that of 1860. The Minister of Finances is perfectly justified in stated that the consolidating the moderation which has been observed in estimating the receipts, and deducting from the general revenue of a sum of five centimes for the public utility, and four millions from the Customs and Post Office for the communal funds, instituted by the law of July and Post Office for the communal funds, instituted by the law of July 1860, the balance between the receipts and expenses has been well maintained, and that a surplus for unforeseen expenses would be obtained. The receipts for 1861 are estimated at 149,029,190f., and the expenses at 145,948,085f.

AUSTRIA.

Thursday's official Wiener Zeitung contains the following appointments:—Count Apponyi, Austrian Envoy Extraordinary at London, to be Ambassador at the same Court. Count Leopold Wickinburg, Councillor of the Empire, to be Landeshauptmann of the Tyrol. Count Forgach, Governor of Moravia, has been appointed Governor of Bohemia. Count Johann Czirdy, Obergespan of the Comitats of Neutra, Barsch, has been appointed Judex Curiæ of Hungary. Demonstrations, with military music, and arrests continue upon these appointments, which please in Hungary. An ovation given to Count Czirdy, on account of his having been appointed Judex Curiæ of Hungary, led the Obergespan of the Comitats of Pesth, on his passage to Buda-Pesth, to call in conflict on Monday. Twenty-nine persons were wounded, the loss of life, at Debreczin and Eperies on Monday evening. The Emperor of Austria has declared against the wishes of those deputies for their restored dignity. The new Municipal Constitution, drawn up for the German provinces of the Empire, is in course to be put into operation. The municipal elections to be proceeded with, notwithstanding the opposition of the Hungarian press, now forbidden. To judge from the language of the Vienna journals, the Austrian Government is aware of a very pronounced liberal character will proceed from these elections in most of the Austrian cities. Count Thun, formerly Governor of Bohemia, and Count Auersperg, Minister of Justice, probably assume from the Austrian police, declare that the Hungarian Administration has been reorganised and with the concurrence of the most eminent men of the country, and with the concurrence of the most eminent men of the country, and that a conference over which the Cardinal Primate of Hungary will preside, will assemble at Gran on the 1st of January, for the purpose of settling the affairs of the Hungarian Diet. A conference was to meet in Agram on Saturday last, in order to discuss the question of the relations of Croatia and Slavonia with its stand to Hungary.

The preparations of Austria in Venetia are of the most formidable nature. Besides the 200,000 men already in garrison, she has 50,000 men divided into four corps, placed on the most formidable strategic points in Upper Italy; besides another army of 100,000 men in reserve in the provinces along the Adriatic. In all, Austria has stationed in and around Italy and the Adriatic an army of 300,000 men, for the defence of Upper Italy and the Adriatic an army of 300,000 men.

THE WAR IN CHINA.

We have received correspondence and papers from Hong-Kong to the 13th of October, and from Shanghai to Oct. 4, giving details of the advance of the allied army on Pekin, the double defeat of the Tartars, and the capture of some of our countrymen. Our Special Artist who dates his communication "Eight miles from Pekin, Sept. 22," has forwarded to us several graphic sketches, some of which will be engraved in our next Number. The following is the summary of the China Mail, 13 :—

"The news which we have to convey by this mail is of great importance. Hostilities have been resumed in the North. Mr. Harry Parkes, Mr. Bowlby, the Times correspondent; Mr. Loch, Lord Elgin's private secretary; Mr. de Norman, Attaché to Mr. Bruce; Mr. Anderson, D.A.Q.G.; and Captain Brabazon, of the Royal Horse, have been taken prisoners. Two engagements or skirmishes have been fought with the Tartar cavalry, which have resulted in the last but to retire with some loss. The allied army is waiting in a hostile attitude within sight of the walls of Pekin; and negotiations have again been opened by the Chinese, but not in the form of any official letter.

"In our last overland we mentioned that negotiations had been broken off by Sang-ko-lin-Tsin, and that the allied army of the north of the enemy were placed here de combat. The next day a flag of truce was sent in from Pekin, bringing proposals which were of an independent manner, to reopen negotiations. On the following day negotiations were met in by the Chinese for the first meeting, which saved Tung-Chow from being looted. The latest news we have is by verbal communication with a Chinese who has entered the Tung-Tse as the mail from Shanghai was leaving. It brought intelligence from the seat of war up to the 17th or 18th of September, when the allied army was still in the position of eight miles from Pekin, and two or three from Tung-Chow. The statement was confirmed that the prisoners were well treated. The Chinese have prisoners, together with the want of more troops and of the siege-guns, would necessitate delay, and thus complicate the question which arose between them and the Imperial commissioners.

"The only news we have to obtain ourselves from the immediate neighbourhood of Shanghai. The object to open the Yang-tse-kiang to be at a port where they could be in contact with foreigners, and obtain foreign ammunition and goods. The Taeping, near Shanghai, it is likely they will try to effect their object by advancing on one of those ports where foreigners reside.

"In the south of China there is nothing starving."

OFFICIAL MILITARY DESPATCHES.

The following official despatches relative to the recent proceedings of the allied army in their march to Pekin have been received at the War Office :—

Lieutenant-General Sir J. Hope Grant, G.C.B., Commanding the Forces in China :—

Head-quarters, Chang-Tsia-Wan, Sept. 20.

Sir,—I have the honour to report that the army left Yang-Tsun last, with 700 infantry, 400 cavalry, and two batteries of artillery; 2000 French troops following in search behind the army, and the remainder of the force marched, with a regiment of cavalry, a 9-pounder battery, and the 2nd Infantry Brigade.

On the 18th inst. I reached Ho-Si-Wu, forty miles from Tien-Tsin, and, as several letters had been received by the Chinese from the Commissioners of high rank, I halted whilst Messrs. Parkes and Wade went on to meet Sang-ko-lin-Tsin, twenty-five miles in front. On the 19th the most gentlemen returned, having made satisfactory arrangements with the Chinese Commissioners, and on the 20th it was agreed that the army should halt at Chang-Tsia-Wan, five miles short of Tung-Chow, to which place the Ambassadors should proceed, with an escort of cavalry, to meet Commissioners. Sir Hope Grant Michel's force arrived, and on the 18th we encamped at Matow, five miles south of Ho-si-Wu. The following day Messrs. Parkes and Loch, Mr. Bowlby, Mr. Anderson, Captain Brabazon's 9-pounders, Captain Stirling's troop of Horse Artillery, and 100 French, with a light battery. From the above, three 9-pounders and 100 French, with a light battery. From the above, three 9-pounders and the 1st Dragoons, with Major Foley, were left to hold that place, whose position I have explained.

Mr. Parkes rode on to Tung-Chow to arrange matters for Lord Elgin's reception, and he made sure of the agreement in writing, which, as the Chinese might not take place by inadvertence, it having been settled that the Chinese army should fall back from Chang-Tsia-Wan, and the allied army encamped by an escort of Fane's Horse, under Lieutenant Anderson, and by Mr. Loch, Private Secretary to Lord Elgin. Mr. Parkes, Mr. Bowlby, and Lieutenant-Walker, A.Q.M.G., to fix the site of our camp with the Chinese authorities, and D.-A.-G. Brigade to superintend the encamping of troops on the 21st.

At daybreak on the 18th I marched, and after going about four miles I came in sight of a very large force of Tartars, both cavalry and infantry, manifestly halting to form up my force. Mr. Loch galloped in with three scouts, and informed me that our guide had been decapitated by the enemy. I then made everything quiet on the road; the Commissioners had agreed to all Mr. Parkes's arrangements; and that accordingly Artillery and Cavalry should advance forward at Tung-Chow. Messrs. Parkes, Loch, Thompson, and Lieutenant-Walker, with an escort, left in front of the Brigade. The enemy's force left the road on the right to our camping-ground, which was a mile and a half south of Tung-Chow.

On arrival at that spot, however, they found it occupied by a large Chinese army, whilst hostilities had been resumed, and the gates of the city shut. On the proposal of Mr. Parkes, from the commanding officer Mr. Parkes could obtain no satisfaction, so he left Mr. Loch and Lieutenant-Walker, Mr. Loch to proceed to return with a flag of truce to the Commissioner and ask the reason of this move. Mr. Loch came on to tell me of the affair, and Mr. Parkes and Deputy Assistant Quartermaster-General Brabazon remained on the ground with four men of the King's Dragoon Guards and one sowar, and were taken prisoners by the Tartar retreat.

It was only now that I learnt that Mr. de Norman, Attaché to Her Majesty's Legation, and Mr. Bowlby, correspondent of the Times, had preceded me to Tung-Chow with Mr. Parkes, and remained there with Lieutenant-Anderson.

Mr. Loch returned to return with a message from the Chinese, and Deputy Assistant Quartermaster-General, R.A., volunteered to accompany him.

They accordingly started, under a flag of truce, for Tung-Chow, with my orders for Mr. Parkes and the whole party to return to the camp at once.

Meanwhile the Chinese cavalry advanced in great numbers on both flanks, and one column moved down on our rear-guard. The 1st Dragoons wheeled up and carefully interdicted. I was extremely anxious not to engage, for fear of the safety of Messrs. Parkes, who were known to be in the enemy's power, and I therefore halted, and ordered the baggage to be hastened on and manned on a village in our rear, to cover the retreat of the rear-guard. The latter operation was carried out expertly two hours, during which time the enemy's cavalry had almost entirely surrounded the rear-guard, and had actually charged the 1st Dragoons, who were ready to receive them. Finding, however, that I would not be induced to advance

SIR JOHN BOWRING.

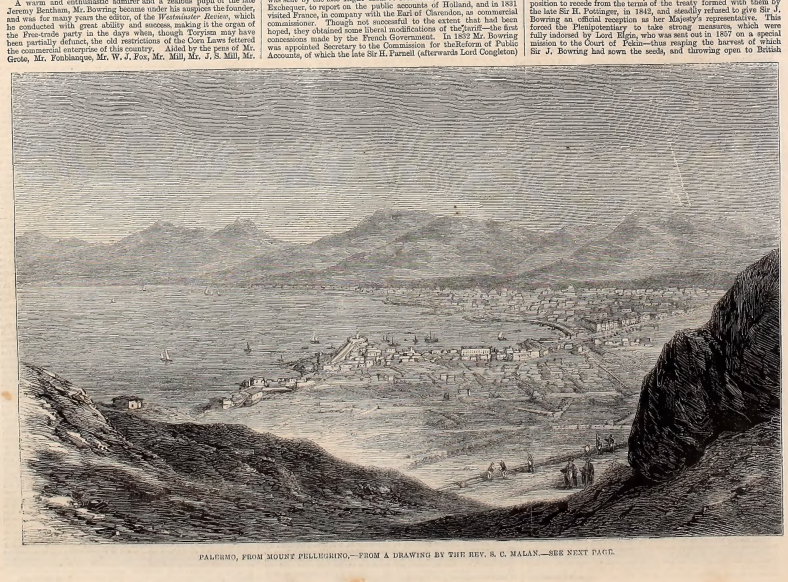
SIR JOHN BOWRING, Governor of Hong-Kong and Superintendent of Trade in China, is a son of the late Charles Bowring, Esq., of Larkbear, near Exeter, who died, full of years, April 4, 1856. His mother was Sarah, daughter of the Rev. T. Lane, of St. Ives, Cornwall, who was descended from the famous lawyer, Sir John Maynard, and through him from William of Wykeham, the pious and munificent founder of the two Colleges of St. Mary at Winchester and New College at Oxford. Sir John Bowring's family is of undoubted Saxon origin, and of great antiquity in Devonshire, in which county the Bowrings have been seated for many centuries. Members of the family are mentioned in the ancient records of the county as occupying important positions as far back as the reign of Henry IV., and even to an earlier date. Among them John Bouring (otherwise Bowryng) filled the office of Rector of the well-known Collegiate Church of Slapton, near Kingsbridge, in the year 1410. The former seat of the family in the neighbourhood of Kingsbridge still retains its ancient name of Bowringsleigh, but passed into other hands several centuries ago. One of Sir J. Bowring's ancestors, however, we learn from a publication, which is a reprint of which forms part of the Harleian miscellany, shared the captivity of Charles I. at Carisbrooke Castle, and received from that Sovereign a patent of baronetcy, which unfortunately was eaten by the rats and mice in a chamber where it was placed for safety during the Great Rebellion. There is a halfpenny coined in the reign of Charles II. by John Bowring, of Chulmleigh, bearing the insignia of woolcombing. The family for several generations were largely engaged in the staple woollen trade at Exeter; and the grandfather of Sir John Bowring, a merchant of that city, was the intimate friend of the celebrated John Adams, one of the first Presidents of the United States.

Sir John Bowring himself was born at Exeter, on the 17th of October, 1792, and was educated at Moreton Hampstead, in his native county. His family being attached to the anti-Episcopal and anti-State Church party, he was not sent to any of the public schools or universities so intimately connected with the established faith.

At an early age he was placed by his parents in a large commercial house at Exeter, by the partners of which he was sent to Spain in 1812 in charge of very large consignments for the use of the army under the Duke of Wellington. Having retired from commercial affairs in 1828, and having devoted much of his spare time to the study of the principles of political economy, he travelled through the various countries of Europe for the purpose of observing the advantages and defects of their fiscal and commercial systems, and published accounts of his researches from time to time in various newspapers and magazines. At the same time he studied carefully the languages of the countries which he visited, and made the songs and poetry of more than one European nation popular amongst us by the means of translations into the English tongue.

A warm and enthusiastic admirer and a zealous pupil of the late Jeremy Bentham, Mr. Bowring became under his auspices the founder, and was for many years the editor, of the Westminster Review, which he conducted with great ability and success, making it the organ of the Free-trade party in the days when, though Toryism may have been partially defunct, the old restrictions of the Corn Laws fettered the commercial enterprise of this country. Aided by the pens of Mr. Grote, Mr. Fonblanque, Mr. W. J. Fox, Mr. Mill, Mr. J. S. Mill, Mr. Roebuck, and other powerful writers, Mr. Bowring was enabled through the pages of that periodical to enlighten the thinking portion of the nation as to the practical results of the restrictive system, and may be said to have contributed as largely as any other individual to the great change which was inaugurated by Sir Robert Peel in 1845-6.

So far back as 1828, on the recommendation of the late Lord Ashburton and the Parliamentary Finance Committee, Mr. Bowring was sent by the late Right Hon. J. C. Herries, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to report on the public accounts of Holland, and in 1831 visited France, in company with the Earl of Clarendon, as commercial commissioner. Though not successful to the extent that had been hoped, they obtained some liberal modifications of the tariff—the first concessions made by the French Government. In 1832 Mr. Bowring was appointed Secretary to the Commission for the Reform of Public Accounts, of which the late Sir H. Parnell (afterwards Lord Congleton) was chairman. He visited and examined in the closest detail the comptabilité of the French Government, and presented two reports which form the groundwork of our present improved system. In conjunction with Sir H. Parnell he wrote the reports on the Exchequer, and prepared those resolutions which have at length become the law of public accountancy in Great Britain and the Colonies. Mr. Bowring also presented reports on the public institutions mentioned above, which have become Parliamentary documents. He has also published for the information of Parliament elaborate reports of his commercial missions undertaken at various times to Egypt, Syria, Lombardy, Tuscany, Rome, and Switzerland. On two occasions he visited Belgium with a view to the modification of the commercial system of that country, and he represented Great Britain at the meeting of the Zollverein at Berlin in 1838; and there is reason to believe that his communications with Sir Robert Peel were not without their influence in bringing about that change in our commercial system which has been proved so beneficial in its results. Mr. Bowring, also, wrote the greater part of the report of Mr. Joseph Hume's Committee on the Import Duties—a report which has been translated into all the European languages, and circulated to the extent of several hundred thousand copies. The Treaty of Siam, peaceably negotiated by Sir J. Bowring, in 1855, after the repeated failures of former Plenipotentiaries, is already showing itself by realised results, one of the most satisfactory that has ever been submitted for ratification, as the trade created by that treaty is already showing a large and progressive increase.



Sir J. Bowring received in 1828 the degree of LL.D. from the University of Groningen; he is also a member of many learned and scientific societies both at home and abroad, and is the author of a very large number of works on foreign languages and literature, politics, political economy, and finance. He was M.P. for Kilmarnock, &c., from 1835 to 1837, when he was an unsuccessful candidate, and sat for Bolton from 1841 to 1849, when he accepted the Chiltern Hundreds on being appointed British Consul at Canton. In the latter part of 1853 he was promoted to the post of Superintendent of Trade in China and Plenipotentiary to that empire, and in 1854 was appointed Governor of Hong-Kong, when he received the honour of knighthood. It is to these joint offices that he is now reappointed.

Sir John Bowring's administration in China, as is well known, has been severely canvassed, and formed the substance of a long discussion in Parliament in February, 1857, which resulted in a practical vote of censure on his proceedings in regard to the Arrow, in the shape of a defeat of Lord Palmerston's Government by a discordant combination of political parties. Lord Palmerston, however, appealed from the House of Commons to the people, who reversed the decision by the results of the general election in that year, which gave that Minister a majority of some sixty or seventy supporters.

The Chinese Government, from the very first, had shown every disposition to recede from the terms of the treaty formed with them by the late Sir H. Pottinger, in 1842, and steadily refused to give Sir J. Bowring an official reception as her Majesty's representative. This forced the Plenipotentiary to take strong measures which were fully indorsed by Lord Elgin, who was sent out in 1857 on a special mission to the Court of Pekin—thus reaping the harvest of which Sir J. Bowring had sown the seeds, and throwing open to British commerce and enterprise the trade not only of China but also Japan.

Since his return to England in August, 1859, Sir J. Bowring has given to the world, through the pleasant pages of Once a Week, a faithful narrative of the wreck of the Adam, where he was himself one of the sufferers, and in which vessel he lost many important MSS. bearing on China and Eastern antiquities. He has also recently published a work of considerable research on the "Philippine Islands," and has contributed a paper on China to the Cornhill Magazine. Unwearied with his thirty years of public life, he at one time desired to resume his old place as a member of Parliament, and his name was mentioned a few months since as a probable candidate in the Liberal interest for the representation of his native city of Exeter; but of course his reappointment to his former post, gratifying as it must be to his feelings, as an authoritative indorsement by her Majesty's adviser of his political conduct in China, must preclude, at all events for some years to come, all chance of his again taking his seat in St. Stephen's.

Sir John Bowring married, first, in 1816, Maria, daughter of the late Samuel Lewin, Esq., of Hackney, a friend and associate of Jeremy Bentham, but became a widower in 1858. By her he has had a family of two daughters and five sons, of whom three survive. His eldest son, Mr. John C. Bowring, is a partner in the house of Matheson and Co. at Hong-Kong. His fourth son, Mr. Edgar A. Bowring, was Secretary to the Commission for the Great Exhibition on Fine Arts, and is Registrar of the Privy Council in the Board of Trade. His third son, Mr. Lewin B. Bowring, a distinguished member of the Civil Service in India, who has been Private Secretary to Earl Canning since 1857, is married to a daughter of the late Admiral the Hon. Sir John Talbot, G.C.B. Sir John Bowring married, a few weeks since, as his second wife, Deborah, daughter of Thomas Castle, Esq., of Bristol.

PALERMO, FROM MOUNT PELLEGRINO.

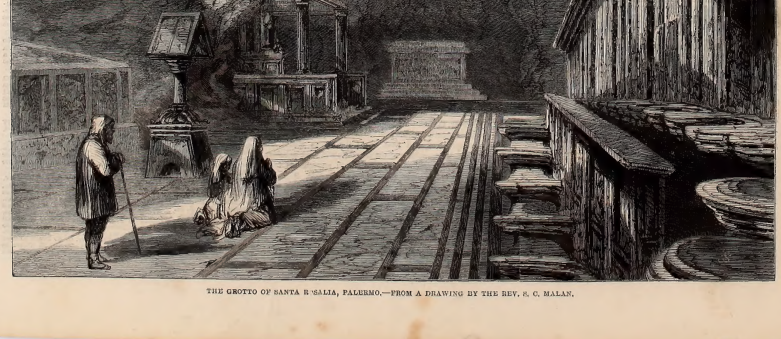
MOUNT PELLEGRINO (Mount Reata of the ancients), from which the View of Palermo in the accompanying Engraving was taken, is remarkable in ancient history as having been the impregnable camp of the Carthaginians in the first Punic War, where for five years Amilcar thwarted every endeavour of the Romans to take it. It is now famed among the Sicilians for a grotto or cave, which is said to have been the voluntary retreat of Santa Rosalia, a Princess of the Norman blood, who in the bloom of her youth and beauty left the Court of King Roger I. in order to lead a contemplative and ascetic life. The view from Mount Pellegrino is exceedingly fine, and the Bay of Palermo, as seen from it, much surpasses that of Naples, especially in the graceful sweep of the shore.

LEAON, THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF KWANG-TUNG AND KWANG-SI, CHINA.

THE GROTTO OF SANTA ROSALIA, PALERMO.



THE Convent and Grotto of Santa Rosalia are situated near the summit of Monte Pellegrino. So great is the veneration in which this saint is held by the inhabitants of Palermo that, at all hours, pilgrims and devotees are to be seen ascending the steep road of La Scala, which leads to the rocky shrine. From the thickly-crowded city beneath rises many an aspiration to the sainted patroness of Palermo. The fishermen toiling in the distant bay regard with reverence the white convent on its rocky eminence, and when the gilded figure of the saint is glittering in the rays of the setting sun the mariner far out at sea deems its light to be a star of hope and guidance. The history of Santa Rosalia is connected with the history of Palermo. The sanctity of her character has been the subject of the most romantic legends. It is said that her saintly influence has more than once mitigated the horrors of the plague in the city which she has deigned to protect. The fête held in her honour is one of the most magnificent of the Roman Catholic Church. Her supposed remains are borne through the city in a coffin of silver. A colossal figure of the saint, and the car on which it is placed, are of such dimensions as to reach the upper stories of the houses. It is a place of favour and a labour of love to be one of the mass who are required to draw the towering pageant through the streets. Not many years ago the mothers of Palermo vied with each other for the privilege of attaching their young children to the spokes of the enormous wheels, where, in dress and attitude, they were placed to represent cherubs. The favour of the saint was more than compensation for injury, or even death, consequent on their perilous exposure. In the evening of this remarkable festival Palermo and its beautiful bay are bright with illuminations. The sacred remains of Santa Rosalia have been borne again to the convent, and, during the remainder of the year, they are deposited in the rocky shrine which forms the subject of our illustration.

THE VICEROY OF CANTON.

WE present our readers with a Portrait of LEAON, the Governor-General of the two provinces of Kwang-Tung and Kwang-Si, commonly known as Viceroy of Canton. This is one of the highest offices in the Chinese empire, and attached to it was formerly the office of Foreign Commissioner. This office was filled by YEH, under whom was PEH-KWEI, as Governor of Canton. The Governors-General since YEH have been PEH-KWEI (ad interim), HWANG, and LEAON, the present one, whose portrait is here given. This officer appears to have been the chief of the three members of the Cessionate who, although without any formal office, maintained and directed the military efforts of the Chinese against us in the neighbourhood of Canton. Acting in the name of the SIN KUNG, or resident gentry, they set at nought the orders of disarmament given by the Viceroy HWANG, and kept our troops in a constant state of uneasiness and alarm from Sir G. van Straubenzee's unfortunate expedition to the White Cloud mountains until their troops were finally disorganized by the capture of Shek-Tseng. During the interval rockets were thrown nightly into the allied lines, and on two or three separate occasions attempts were made at night to retake the city by assault. Since he has been named Governor-General he has taken most energetic measures for the suppression of coolie-kidnapping in the Canton River; and it is in a great measure owing to his exertions and policy, supported by the allied Commissioners, that the free emigration of Chinese labourers to the English and French West Indian Colonies has been rendered possible and put on a sound footing.

PETERWARDEIN,

PETERWARDEIN, or PETERVAR, the principal and frontier fortress of Austrian Slavonia, the Gibraltar of Hungary, is situated in 45 deg. 15 min. N. lat. and 19 deg. 55 min. E. long., in the neighbourhood of some mountains and fruitful hills, on the right bank of the Danube, near the angle formed by the sudden change in the course of that river from due south to east. On a rock isolated on three sides stands the upper fortress and the horework; on the northern foot of the rock lies the lower fortress, which includes what is properly the town, and is partly on a gentle slope. It commands the Danube, whose waters bathe the walls on the west and south sides. It is a place of extraordinary strength both by nature and art. As a precaution in case of a very close siege, a well has been excavated in the rock to a depth below the surface of the Danube. The lower fortress has very broad and deep moats, which may be filled with water from the Danube; lofty walls, and many bastions and ravelins; by which it is separated on the south side from the two suburbs Ladwigsthal and Rochusthal. One principal street, and two others parallel to it, with a pretty extensive parade, form the whole town, which consists of only fourteen public buildings and forty-eight houses, most of the latter being only one story high. The principal buildings are the Arsenal, the residence of the Commandant, and the Roman Catholic parish church, formerly belonging to the Jesuits. Besides the two above-mentioned suburbs, some writers reckon the village of Bukowitz, about a league distant, as belonging to Peterwardein. The population of the town, the two suburbs, and Bukowitz, including the garrison, is stated at 6500. The fortress is capable of containing a garrison of 10,000 men. Peterwardein is connected by a bridge of boats over the Danube (here 700 feet wide, and from 50 to 60 feet deep), with the town of Neusatz on the opposite bank. It derives its name from Peter the Hermit, who here marshalled the soldiers of the first Crusade. In 1716 the Austrians, under Prince Eugene, here defeated the Turks, who then lost their last footing in Central Europe.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1860.

THE election of Mr. Abraham Lincoln as the new President of the great American Republic is causing an unequalled sensation in a land where "sensation" is so avowedly the normal rather than the exceptional feature of society. South Carolina proclaims her intention of separating from that Union and of forming an independent State, and hopes to be joined by Georgia and other districts whose interests are thought to be menaced by the election of a President opposed to the extension of slavery. It is to be hoped, however, that all the threats, speeches, and formidable outbreaks of indignation with which the Southern journals abound are but safety-valves, and that, when the extra steam has blown off, the noble machinery of the Republic will work as before. For, on calm reflection, what is it the South apprehends from President Lincoln? He utterly disapproves of slavery. So, as has been shown, do a large majority in numbers, and an overwhelming majority in education and intellect, of the people of America. But he expressly declares that he does not hold the South guilty of the origin of slavery in America, nor does he contemplate a single harsh or hasty measure, or, indeed, any measure at all, against the "Constitution," beyond taking care that it shall not spread, and that no new Slave States shall be created. He seems fully to realise the fact that he is not elected President for Pennsylvania or Virginia, north or south, but for the Union, and, while he has definite views of his own, he appears to be far too shrewd and statesmanlike to expect to force them on others. We cannot but think that the Southern States will come to a sense of this, and will also recollect that the interests of the North are far too closely allied with those of the South to permit the former to urge on the new President to any course that will paralyse trade and prosperity. Still, if violence and anger insist on having their way, and a fraction of the Southern States choose to stand aloof from the Union for a time, it will only be to return, after a period of humiliation, and throw down the black banner upon the steps of the Capitol, and to ask to be reunited. In the mean time, in so far as England has a right to speak on the subject, the most congratulatory fact is that on the election of Mr. Lincoln, who professes the doctrines for which she has made enormous sacrifices. The details of the election are curious, and the fact that, on the morning of the choice, Tuesday, the New York paper came provided with separate appeals to almost every trade and every interest to support Mr. Breckenridge, upon the honest and most mercenary ground, "If you don't, your shoemaking, &c., will be at an end—vote early," makes the desperate character of the struggle. We may as well add that Mr. Lincoln is not, as Mr. Douglas has been called, a little giant, but a great one, being, according to the journals, six feet four in height. He has been farmer, surveyor, soldier, and lawyer, and is described as a hearty, earnest, unaffected man. My his rule be long and easy!—a fortune not the less probable because at this moment grave difficulties, both among the people and in Congress, seem to bar his way.

We have little or no domestic news, except that the Empress of the French is seeing all the best sights in Scotland, and will ultimately, it is understood, become the guest of the Queen at Windsor. The canards about the cause of her leaving France are all pretty well exploded, except that which alleges that the Empress desired to get rid of the duty of electing a consort, set up in opposition to the Emperor's possible Church reformation.

Of the Road case cognisance is at length taken by the highest of the legal tribunals. The Attorney-General, in a most lucid resumé of the matter before the Court, has made application to have the inquiry reopened from the beginning. A curious negligence on the part of the Coroner who held the inquest to have the record written on the material prescribed by the law has afforded technical justification for the new proceedings, and, though the thoughtless act is quite at a question of paper or parchment being regarded as important, it is thoroughly in accordance with the spirit of English law that an irregularity of proceedings rather than any general or sentimental view of a case should be the ground for interference when the preliminary course is to be taken. But the Court did not solely rest its decision upon a technicality, but took into consideration what course would be best for the public advantage. That decision was not that a new inquisition should be at once ordered, but that the blundering Coroner should be called upon to say what excuse he can offer for his having failed to comply with the rules of law. He will appear, and, when justice has been done in his case, the ground will be cleared for ultimate action. A full, practical, and searching investigation will then, it may be made; we wish that we could express as much certainty that it will prove satisfactory; but we fear that the threads of evidence are hopelessly broken and the traces of guilt irreparably effaced. There is just the chance that the inquiry, by trained and unprejudiced minds, may elicit the truth, and therefore we are glad that the attempt is to be made; but we are not very hopeful, and deem it far more probable that at a future time some pen engaged in a record of the day for these columns will announce that a historic wrong or a deathless romance has at last revealed the fate of the poor little martyr to foregone crime.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

The fine new church of Kilburn, at Maida-hill, was on Thursday se'nnight consecrated by the Lord Bishop of London.

The Benchers of Lincoln's Inn have elected the Rev. C. J. D'Oyly, Minister of St. Mark's, Long-acre, to the chaplaincy of their hon. society.

The Bishop of London consecrated, yesterday week, a newly-built chapel, which has recently been added to St. Peter's Church, Kensington, under the superintendence of T. Johnson, Esq., the diocesan surveyor of Lichfield. By this addition about 175 new sittings are provided.

The Bishop of London has conferred the Honorary Canonry in St. Paul's Cathedral, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Benjamin Brown, M.A., preferred to the archdeaconry of Bath, upon the Rev. William J. Irons, D.D., Incumbent of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Brompton.

The effect of the arrangements made through the instrumentality of the Bishop of London for simplifying the service at St. George's-in-the-East has been to reduce the number of the congregation. It went out of the most orderly manner; and it is sincerely to be hoped that the present state of things may be permanent.

The following testimonials have been recently presented to clergymen:—Rev. Thomas Hall, Vicar of Sale, from the boys of the Sale Fetherton Grammar School. Rev. G. Whitlock—a silver tankard and a purse of gold from the parishioners of Hindlesham, on his leaving the Incumbency: and Mr. Whitlock—a handsomely bound Prayer-book.

The Queen has appointed the Rev. Hindley Smith to take place on Wednesday in the Senate House, Cambridge, and the virtual contest was between Mr. Smith and Mr. Bateman, the candidate of Evangelicals and Muhammedans. The poll took place between eleven and one o'clock, and at one the numbers were declared—Smith, 1; Kaboolah, 78. Mr. Kaboolah retires for three years.

The new church erected by the Marchioness of Londonderry for the benefit of the mining population at Seaham Colliery was consecrated, under the title of "Christ Church," by the Bishop of Durham, last week. The church is situated on the high road between Seaham Harbour and Sunderland, and is a neat Irish structure, of stone, with a tower and spire. The building will accommodate 500 persons, and will receive an endowment far beyond what their forefathers ever dreamt of. The sittings, numbering between 400 and 500, are entirely free.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—Rectories: The Rev. G. L. Barker to Wallington, Norfolk; Rev. S. C. Cuffe to St. Martin, Oxford; Rev. R. C. Hales to Woodmancote, Sussex; Rev. R. M. THE COURT.

The Queen on Saturday last received his Grand Ducal Highness Prince Louis of Hesse, attended by Baron von Westerweller, and his Serene Highness Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, attended by Baron de Maltzahn and Count de Bautzan, at the castle, from the Continent, on a visit to her Majesty. The same afternoon the Prince of Wales arrived from Abergeldie. The Royal dinner party in the evening included Prince Alfred, Prince Alice, Prince of Leiningen, Prince and Princess of Hesse and Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, Colonel the Hon. A. K. and Lady Mary Hood and Miss Phipps, Hon. Mrs. T. H. Bidulph, Mr. Jenner Fust, Baron von Westerweller, Baron de Maltzahn, Count de Bautzan, Colonel Ponsonby, the Portuguese Minister, Count de Lavradio, and Captain Allison, of her Majesty's ship Bacchante.

On Sunday the Queen and Prince Consort, the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, Prince Alice, Princess Louis of Hesse, Prince Arthur, and Prince Leopold, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended Divine service. The Princess Louis of Hesse and Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern were also at the service. The Rev. Dr. Macleod, Moderator of the General Assembly, preached.

On Monday the Queen, with Princess Alice, walked in the grounds of the house, and visited the cottages on the estate. The Prince Consort, accompanied by Prince Alfred and Prince Louis of Hesse, and attended by Colonel Ponsonby, attended a battue at Hastrigg and Baron von Westerweller. The Royal dinner party in the evening included Prince Alfred, Prince Alice, Prince and Princess of Hesse, the Princess of Leiningen, the Prince of Leiningen, and Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, Lady Caroline Barrington, Baron de Maltzahn, Baron de Rastatter, Major Cowell, R.E., and the following visitors, who arrived at the castle in the afternoon from the Continent, the Prussian Minister and Countess Bernstorff, Lord and Lady Wodehouse, General Grabau, Mr. Ponsonby, Mr. Theodore Martin, and the Rev. Dr. Robert Lowe. The Prince of Wales had returned to Osborne at an early hour in the morning.

On Tuesday the Queen, with Princess Helena walked in the Home Park, and visited the Duchess of Inverness. The Prince Consort, accompanied by Prince Alfred, Prince Louis of Hesse, and Prince Leiningen, went out shooting, attended by Colonel Ponsonby. Lord Wodehouse had the honour of accompanying the Royal party. Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern took leave of her Majesty and departed for the Royal family, and left Windsor by an early train for Southampton, en route to London. The Royal dinner party included the same guests as on Monday.

On Wednesday the Queen and Prince Consort, accompanied by Prince Alfred, Princess Alice, and Prince Louis of Hesse, rode out on horseback, attended by Lord Ponsonby. Baron Rastatter had the honour of dining with the Duchess of Kent, and the Prince and Princess of Leiningen visited her Majesty from Frogmore. The Royal party took luncheon, at which the Duke Sodring—The Lord Chancellor, Count and Countess Bernstorff, Lord and Lady Wodehouse, Lord Clyde, Sir Charles and Lady Phipps, and the Right Hon. Robert Lowe. The Royal dinner party included the Duke of Inverness, Lord and Lady Wodehouse, Lord Clyde, Sir Charles and Lady Phipps, and the Right Hon. Robert Lowe. The Royal dinner party included the Duke of Inverness, Lord and Lady Wodehouse, Lord Clyde, Sir Charles and Lady Phipps, and the Right Hon. Robert Lowe. The Royal dinner party included the Duke of Inverness, Lord and Lady Wodehouse, Lord Clyde, Sir Charles and Lady Phipps, and the Right Hon. Robert Lowe.

At the Privy Council held by the Queen on Friday se'nnight Lord Stanley of Alderley was presented to the Queen, and kissed hands on being appointed Postmaster-General. Her Majesty having been informed by the Right Hon. Earl of Chichester, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Sussex, his Lordship took the usual oath to that effect.

The Earl of Caithness and Colonel the Hon. A. Liddell have succeeded Lord Harris and Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Bentinck as Lord and Groom in Waiting to her Majesty.

The Court will leave Windsor Castle for Osborne early in the coming week.

THE FRENCH EMBASSY.

The Count de Persigny, having been appointed Minister of the Interior in the French Government, has been put as Ambassador to the Court of Turkey, but Excellency will be succeeded here by the Count de Flahaut, who is married to the Baroness Alderson, the well-known novelist, and has been attached to the London. The Count was formerly Aide-de-Camp to the Emperor Napoleon I. The Count Walewski, the Foreign Minister, and other members of the Count acquired a double popularity in English society, will carry with them a very much larger share of regret than usually accompanies a diplomatic retirement.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, we regret to learn, continues to suffer from severe rheumatic pains. Her Royal Highness is otherwise in good health.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and Princess Mary have returned to Cambridge House, on Thursday last from Brighton.

Their Serene Highnesses the Hereditary Prince and Princess of Holstein-Augustenburg left London on Sunday evening for the Continent.

Their Serene Highnesses Prince Louis and Prince Henry of Hesse-Darmstadt arrived at Marlborough House on Monday.

Viscount and Viscountess Belmore will leave Cambridge House in a few days for Lowndes-square.

Field Marshal Viscount and Viscountess Combermere have arrived at Bath, from Leamington, for the winter.

The Lord Chancellor gave a dinner to the Cabinet Ministers on Wednesday evening, at his residence at Knightsbridge.

A marriage is arranged to take place between Lord George Paget, brother of the Marquess of Anglesey, and Miss Louisa Rimmage, daughter of Mr. and the Hon. Mrs. Rimmage.

THE EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH.—On Thursday week the Empress of the French left Edinburgh on her journey northwards. She arrived at Perth on the same day, and, leaving by the Highland Railway, proceeded on Saturday to Dunkeld. On Saturday the Empress was at Taymouth Castle, visiting the Marquis of Breadalbane. On Monday her Majesty's route attended Divine service at Dunkeld. The Empress arrived at Crieff on Monday, about five o'clock, p.m. and remained there for the night as guest of the Duke of Atholl. The Empress and party, after partaking of luncheon at the Atholl Arms Hotel, Dunkeld, visited the famous Cathedral and Bishop's Palace. A little before five o'clock on Monday afternoon the Empress arrived at Stirling Railway Station, and was received by the Lord Provost of Stirling (accompanied by his Lordship's predecessor in office), and the Provost of Stirling by the usual north mail-train at half-past seven on Monday night, in a saloon carriage, including Glasgow, Perth, and Dundee, and Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, at nine o'clock. She was accompanied by the Duke of Atholl, who, with Lord Elcho, the day forenoon, at eleven o'clock, the Duke of Hamilton presented the Lord Provost and Magistrates, Mr. Turner, Queen's Remembrancer, the Chamberlain, to her Majesty, in the Queen's Hotel. The Lord Provost gave the Empress a congratulatory address on behalf of the community of the city, magistrates and town council. Her Majesty expressed her thanks to the Lord Provost for the cordial manner in which he had welcomed her, and sincerely hoped that the sanity and kindly feeling at present subsisting between Great Britain and France would ever continue. Her Majesty then drove through the principal parts of the city, and visited the cathedral, the military parts of which were under the command of Colonel Sir Lowthy, the Empress and suite proceeded to the Queen's Hotel, which she shortly afterwards left for Edinburgh, en route for Loch Leven Castle, Kinross-shire, the seat of Sir Graham Montgomery, Bart.

THE EMPRESS OF AUSTRIA left Plymouth last Saturday morning in the Victoria and Albert Royal yacht for Madeira, attended by the steam-yacht Osborne. There vessels steamed out of Devonport harbour during after eight o'clock, the Victoria and Albert having the Austrian standard flying at the mizzen-peak. They were saluted on their passage out by her Majesty's ships Impregnable, Resolution, and others. The Empress and her suite consisted of Countess Festetics, Count Hunyadi, Count Wimpffen, Count Mensdorff, Major Edgcumbe Park, attended by Lord Valletort, and Colonel Ponsonby. Her Majesty visited Mount Edgcumbe House, where she was received by Lady Mount Edgcumbe and Lady Catherine Valletort. The Hon. George Edgcumbe, Mrs. George Edgcumbe, and the Misses Edgcumbe were also in the house during her Imperial Majesty's visit. While the Empress was in Devonport harbour she was visited upon the Counts Appongi, the Austrian Ambassador; Admiral Sir Houston Stewart, the Commander-in-Chief at Devonport; and Major-General Hutchinson, the Commander-in-Chief of the western district.

DEATH OF BARON BUNSEN.—We sincerely regret to announce the death of this distinguished man. This melancholy event took place at Bonn on Wednesday morning. Baron Bunsen was in the seventieth year of his age.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The annual course of musketry instruction has just been completed by the forces stationed in the camp at Colchester. The number of men attached to the 9th and 10th battalions who shared in the practice has been 1200.

Rear-Admiral Sir Thomas Sabine Pasley returned to Devonport on Saturday from leave of absence, and relieved his flag as Admiral Superintendent on board the reserve ship Impregnable, which is now in Hamoaze.

THE ARMY.—The Army and Navy Gazette informs us that important changes for the benefit of the soldier are about to be introduced into the Army, and considerably increased advantages are to be given to the non-commissioned officer, as suggested by the authority from which we quote, the men must receive the right pay, and we are sure the extra cost will be willingly defrayed by the country.

On Tuesday week the Lords of the Admiralty inspected, at a factory in the vicinity of Regent's Park, some very ingenious machinery, the invention of a Mr. Bennett, for manufacturing the cartridges to be used in target-practice. By the process in question a cutter of thirty-six feet in length can be supplied with ammunition for a year, for the cost at which the same work performed by the process now in existence could not be finished under eight months.

The screw steam-ship St. George, 50, Captain the Hon. Francis Egerton, which has been for some time past undergoing extensive repairs at Rib Royal Highness Prince Alfred has left the Euryalus, 50, to enable him to remain experimentally on board the St. George during the trial trip, which will be, on 30, January, when, having visited Africa in the frigate, he will have an opportunity of testing the improvements made in the ship since the Duke of Sussex and North America. Some of the other midshipmen of the Euryalus will be transferred to the St. George with Royal Highness. The St. George has been honoured with instructions from Buckingham Palace to prepare a standing of Royal Highness Prince Alfred.

One of the cast-iron experimental guns, strengthened accordingly with a principle of hoops, by Mr. Fraser, Chatham, and of great capability of being rifled for service, was on Saturday tested at the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, in the presence of a number of officers. The gun, and contains firing as an eventually to beat the gun, the experiment was carried out at a range of 1000 yards, and resulted most successfully. The chamber of the gun was mildly imbedded in a casting of gun-metal between the hoops, and the latter, which were of wrought iron, resisted to the greatest amount of shock from the explosion, and extended over the imbedded gun-metal casting, which was also perfectly sound. Several rounds were fired with excessively heavy charges, and at length the gun itself gave way, and burst into several pieces, the hoops, and the fragments, but the casting of gun-metal remained entire.

MILITARY EDUCATION.—The following circular has been issued by the Council of Military Education :—" The competitive examinations in March next for admission into the Royal Military College and into the Army will cease, and all candidates for the artillery and engineer services appointed by nomination will be required to undergo the examination at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich. The next competitive examination in the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, will commence on the 7th of January, 1867. The number of vacancies to be competed for for twenty cadetships. Candidates for admission must conform in all the regulations, will in this instance be received until the 20th of December next. The candidates for admission into the Royal Military College, and eventually transferred to the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich. The Council of Military Education will submit nomination to Additional Commissions in the Army, and to the Royal Military College, on the acknowledgment and surveying instruments, there will be examined in the subjects of examination, namely 1,000 marks will be allotted to this examination. Each date, however, it will not be included among the subjects of examination in relation to Woolwich : 750 marks will be allotted to this subject, as hereafter."

THE NAVY.—Last Saturday the Times presented, in a very prominent manner, a letter from a correspondent on "The Navy and the Service," in which some severe statements were made as to the state of our Navy. Immediately on the appearance of the letter, the Admiralty issued an idea of the way in which the men now risk life and limb to escape from the Service. The letter is as follows :—"Sir, I have been in the Royal Navy in constant service—employed in the Channel Squadron—for the last two years, and I have been watching all other means of manning the Navy, and I think you will agree with me that nearly 1,000 men have left the Service in the last two years, and I am told that already nearly half have managed to escape." The Navy Estimates for 1866-7 fix the pay of seamen and boys rated for years continuous service is £2 8s. a month. Very few, however, do enter for two years, and the average pay of seamen and boys in the Navy is only about £2 7s. a month, which, for the calendar month, gives £24 4s., if paid for twelve months. The fact is that the Government rate of pension is said to be a fraud; and the ships, it is asserted, are manned by such men. The letter of the writer in the Times is a severe censure on the management of "One who Knows the Service" are declared to be gross exaggerations. Every Government has its enemies. Sir Edward Ryan writes to the most decided terms, the assertions as to bad pay and bad food. The statement as to the prevalence of mutiny is declared to be "unfounded and exaggerated."

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

The 17th Glamorgan or Vale of Neath Rifle Corps have presented their Captain, Captain Evans, with a handsome sword and sheath.

The Hon. Lieut.-Colonel Rodney, widow of Admiral Sir C. P. Middleton, has presented a silver bugle to the Needham Market, or 12th Suffolk, Corps.

The 41st Middlesex (Civil Service) Rifle Corps has been distributed to the Royal Small-arms Factory, Enfield-lock, mounted on Saturday, at half-past two o'clock, and marched through the principal streets.

The services of a company of mounted rifles having been duly accepted by the Marquis of Bute, the first steps for the formation of the company have been taken for completing its organisation.

Last Saturday evening, at a meeting of the inhabitants of Surrey was held at the White Hart Hotel, Guildford, at which it was agreed to establish a mounted rifle corps in that neighbourhood.

Yesterday week a public meeting was held at Taunton, at which a large number of gentlemen of the town and neighbourhood were present, to form a mounted rifle corps to be called the East Somerset Yeomanry Cavalry.

The Ipswich or 1st Suffolk Rifle Corps was inspected on Thursday week by Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Edward Kerrison, Bart., commanding, and expressed himself highly satisfied, and complimented the corps upon their great steadiness and soldierly appearance.

The 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Pembrokeshire Rifle Corps, with the 1st Haverfordwest Rifles, have been formed into a battalion, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel, a Major and Adjutant. A range up to 300 yards for ball practice has been obtained, and the use of the Government ranges at Pembroke Dock.

Active steps are now being taken for the formation of a Yorkshire Rifle Battalion, to be called the Yorkshire Hallamshire Rifles. From what we have received, there is every reason to believe that the object in view will be successfully carried out. The Hallamshire Rifle Volunteers have already been converted for the 12th inst. at the Station Hotel on York.

The 41st Middlesex (Civil Service) Rifle Corps, or 37th Middlesex, commenced on Saturday last, at the butts of the Harrow Rifles, kindly lent for the purpose, their annual rifle competition, which, we are glad to say, a success was made. The first class shoot-shot, the prize being a gold challenge medal, which was won by Sergeant Hunt, with a score of 48.

The first North York Rifle competition, left incomplete on Tuesday week, was resumed on Thursday, when the weather was fine, and the shooting was surprisingly good. The Lord Mayor of York was expected to shoot for the Thrivellum Challenge Cup and the Ladies' Medal, two of the winners of which were present at the competition.

On Monday evening a meeting was held at Tilbury's Hotel, Aldershott, with the view to establish a rifle corps in connection with the 1st Hampshire at Aldershott and Farnham. Resolutions were proposed and carried declaring that corps should be established, and that the services of Captain Hall, the provisional committee was formed, and Mr. Beatty, solicitor, Farnham, consented to act as honorary secretary.

On Monday afternoon the ceremony of presenting prizes to the 8th Surrey Rifle Corps took place at Kingston. The corps has been in existence ever since at the Epsom Rifle-ground, near the Downs, where there is a range of 150 yards. The prizes were presented by Lieutenant-Colonel Lovell, who also drew the corps for the number of the corps, and the following results were declared :—Ist prize, £3, Sergeant Hunt; 2nd, £2, Sergeant Bayer; second prize, £2, Mr. Tibby; third prize, £1, Mr. W. Keeling. At 200 yards, first prize, £3, Mr. Rasch; second, £2, Mr. Bayer; third prize, £1, Mr. Sawyer. There was also a second-class prize, consisting of a silver cup, which is to be awarded to the person making the greatest number of points at the two above-mentioned ranges. Mr. Strudwick was the winner.

The Wimbledon Rifle Corps held their annual prize competition on the 11th Surrey Volunteers took place at Blackheath. The prizes were presented by Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Robert Alexander, Bart., M.P., and the first prize given by the High Sheriff of the county (W. J. Evelyn, Esq.) : a challenge medal, given by Mr. Evelyn, Esq., M.P., for the best shot, was won by Mr. Wood, Esq.; and various prizes of plate, &c., purchased with the subscription of Major Gill, Ensign Molyneux, and other gentlemen. The firing was from distances of 100, 200, and 300 yards. After some excellent shooting Private Read was the winner of the first prize at the distance of 100 yards, by making 11 points; the second prize falling to Private Wilton; and the third to Private Dart. At 200 yards there were ties for all the prizes, and the winners were finally declared to be—first prize (Mr. Wood's tankard), Private H. Baker; second, Sergeant Harper; third, Private Moore. The twenty-one best shots at the two first distances were entitled to compete for the High Sheriff's Cup, the challenge medal, and the other prizes at 300 yards range; the result being that Mr. Jaffray was the winner of the first prize and the challenge medal, Mr. Stanley Bayer, Private Hook, and Mr. Rasch following. The second and third prizes, Ensign Molyneux and Mr. Wood.

A competition took place on Saturday last, at the practice-ground of the West Middlesex Rifles, Wormwood Scrubbs, for a silver challenge cup, value £5—the competition being open to four winners of the battalion prize each night of the next best shots, each man firing ten rounds at 700 yards range, the cup to be held during the ensuing year by the winner of the best average score. The cup was won by Mr. Charles Hall, of the A company, who made seven hits in the ten rounds.

On Thursday week the Wiltshire or 8th Somerset Volunteer Rifle Corps were inspected by Major Dalton, in the presence of Colonel Graham and Captain Mallet, Adjutant of the 3rd battalion, and a large number of the ladies and friends of the volunteers. The inspection took place on Orchard Field, Bradford, the seat of the Countess of Egremont, after which the gallant Major complimented the corps on their appearance and drill. The volunteers then marched with the band at their head, into the mansion of the Countess of Egremont, and between the hours of two and three o'clock the Countess generously presented the corps with a silver bugle, value twenty-five guineas.

The 13th Somerset (Langport) Rifle Volunteers and the 1st Somerset Volunteers met in Coxhoble Bottom for the purpose of prize shooting. The attendance was numerous, and the weather fine. The 13th Somerset Rifles had first engagement for one of the prizes, which was won by Corporal Hallett and Private Simmonds shot a tie and firing off at 400 yards, the former was the victor. Private Hallett, after this, commanding the corps, and Private Simmonds the first and second classes fell in to shoot for a challenge cup, value £5, presented by Mr. Hallett. The cup was won two years by the same person, then to be his own property. There was also a rifle presented by Mr. Hallett to be competed for annually by the 13th Somerset Goldsmith, after a good contest, won the cup. He also made the greatest number of hits, and was presented with a silver medal. The 1st Somerset Rifles had three prizes, which were presented by Mr. Hallett, the latter winning the first prize. The shooting was very good, and every member of the corps seemed to carry out the evolutions efficiently. He proposes that the battle should be commenced at 8 o'clock in the morning, and that the rifle be fired at Glastonbury.

RETURNS TO THE WAR OFFICE.—The following communication has been received by the commanding officers of the several volunteer corps :—" Sir, I am directed by the Lords of the Committee of Council on Education to inform you that any form of diary to be strictly kept by the Adjutant of the corps under your command, and transmitted to the Inspector-General of Volunteers at the close of each year of every month, for the information of the Secretary of State for War. You have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant, H. Reid." Such is one of the elaborate character, and includes the following monthly returns—viz., the principal state of the corps, the number of volunteers, their names, and rank of battalion, establishment companies, subdivisions, sections, enrolled strength, field officers, staff, captains, sergeants, buglers, rank and file, not total.

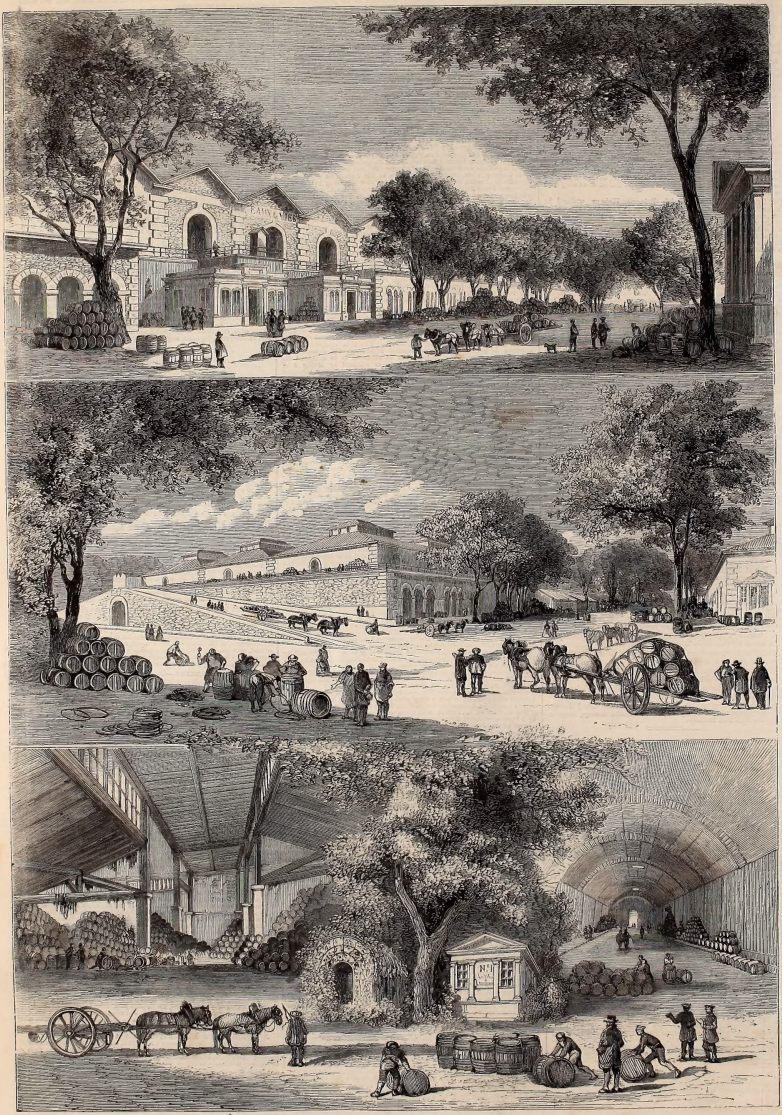
COUNTRY NEWS.

Among the deaths in Scotland specially noted by the Registrar-General are those of a little girl from the effect of wasps' stings, and another from the bite of a mad dog.

Mr. Alderman Sidney, M.P., has placed two hundred guineas in the hands of four gentlemen of stafford, to be distributed by them, irrespective of political or religious opinions, among the poor and aged persons of the borough, during the approaching inclement season.

Mr. Alderman Salomons, M.P., was entertained by the Jewish community of Brighton on Monday, at the Music Hall, Queen's-road, to celebrate the completion of the first year of his mayoralty. Upwards of 200 persons sat down to dinner, which was served in the best style by Mr. Kemp, of the Old Ship Hotel.

THE PEOPLE'S PARK AT HULL.—On Monday, at a meeting of the Hull Town Council, it was announced that the cost of the park would not exceeding £60, exclusive of planting the trees. Mr. Pearson (ex-Mayor of Hull) announced that, in accordance arrangements with Mr. Alderman Wilkinson, the eminent sculptor of London, for a marble statue of her Majesty the Queen to be erected in the park, the corporation had agreed to pay the sum of £300 for a statue to Mr. Pearse, the noble donor of the park to Hull.



A statute for hiring will be held in the Market-place, Anglesey, the month of next month subscription, was on Saturday last raised on the common already erected on a commanding site in the town. The common itself, 100 feet high, was erected by the Corporation of Hull, at a cost of £1,000. The object of the statue is to commemorate the courageous conduct of the late Sir Joseph Hebert, in which he achievements, and is on the summit of a rock 250 feet above the level of the sea; on that, while the statue is surrounded by a railing, the rock is enclosed by a wall above the sea level, and is now a conspicuous object for many miles around. The statue is the work of Mr. Thomas Earle, and stands 14 feet, 3 inches, in height.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.—In the case of the inquest on the bodies of the unfortunate men killed by the railway accident at Atherstone, on the North Western Railway, which occasioned a verdict of "Accidental death," but suggested certain improvements by which a similar catastrophe might therefore be prevented, the coroner's jury, after a lengthy inquiry into the circumstances, concurred on Monday afternoon near the Leigh station of a branch line of the London and North Western Railway, by which the down mail train of the last week's accident. The jury, after a long deliberation, returned a verdict of "Accidental death," but suggested certain improvements by which a similar catastrophe might therefore be prevented. The result was that seven of forty waggons and two engines were thrown off the line, and the driver killed, but no one seriously injured.—A few days ago a collision took place on the Midland Railway near Glenfield, by which a luggage train was run into the rear of a goods train, but happily no loss of life ensued.—An accident to a cattle-train occurred last night on the Great Western Railway, by which the line was blocked through the breaking of the engine-axle. Twenty cattle were killed, besides considerable damage to railway property, and the line was blocked with the traffic for several hours; but, fortunately, no personal injury was sustained.

THE LOSS OF THE "LONDON."—A meeting of the Underwriters, and other extraordinary magistrate, T. H. Travis, Esq., announced that he had received a letter from the Secretary of State for the Home Department, stating that he had received a letter from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, stating that he had received a letter from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that medals should also be given by her Majesty's Government to those letter-carriers, Mr. Lee, Mr. Bennett, and Mr. Parker. The Mayor said, in his report he very strongly appealed on behalf of the widow of Mr. Bailie.—We are glad to see that a subscription has been opened for the benefit of Bailie's family on behalf of the widow of the late Mr. Travis. To the noble exertions of the gallant fellow we have already referred the noble conduct of the Mr. Lee. Subscriptions and crew of the Arctic. It is impossible to read the narrative of the disaster without feeling the deepest sympathy with the brave men. The Mansion-house list in his devoted and successful attempt, or without feeling sympathy with the widow and family of the gallant fellow who perished in the attempt. We are the treasurers of the fund, and subscriptions are received at Messrs. Glyn's, at the Union Bank, or by the secretary of the Times.

CRYSTAL PALACE WINTER POULTRY SHOW.—The great annual show of poultry at the Crystal Palace will be held on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday week, commencing on Wednesday, the 12th, and continuing until Thursday, the 20th inst. The entries are very numerous, comprising nearly 1000 pens of poultry of all kinds, with gold, silver, and other varieties of pheasants, ducks, geese, and Guinea pigeons, and 100 pens of rabbits. A novel feature is added in the shape of a sweepstakes for guinea-cocks, for which a large number of entries have been made.

A QUESTION OF ETIQUETTE.—In the Belgian Chamber of Representatives last Saturday Count Vilain XIIII. asked the Ministry whether the Government would publish a translation of a statement given in the Belgian Moniteur would publish a translation of a statement given in the Belgian Moniteur which stated that the reception of the Emperor of Austria, on the occasion of his visit to Paris, had really true that the Duchess de Brabant and the Count de Flandre had knelt when they kissed Queen Charlotte's hand. Mr. Frere, Minister of Foreign Affairs, without either affirming or denying the fact, said that the question was purely a matter of Austrian etiquette, and could not in any way affect the dignity of the Belgian People. (The Duchess de Brabant is an Austrian Princess.)

"RICHARD III. AND THE CHILDREN OF EDWARD IV."—FROM A PAINTING BY RICHARD STILKE.

M. STILKE is a German artist, of the historical school, whose works have earned for him considerable renown. Like many of his countrymen, he has paid especial attention to the writings of our immortal Shakspeare; and his most recent work drawn from that source is the fine picture representing Richard III. and the young Princes his nephews previous to their incarceration in the Tower, which is at present in the gallery of the Swedish Ambassador at Berlin, and of which we have of much pleasure in giving an Engraving. The subject is treated with considerable latitude, allowable in the poetry of art; but the character of the principal personages is remarkably truthful, and conformable to the original conception of the dramatist. We are struck in the first place by the wily, cunning, and malicious expression of the Duke of Gloucester, contrasting strongly with the agony depicted in the noble features of the Queen, who kneels before the tyrant. The elder Prince, by his face and action, announces the terror and abhorrence which fill his whole frame, while his younger brother clings inexplicably yet hopelessly to the hope of his safety. Each in his way betrays a fearful knowledge of the terrible fate which awaits those hapless innocents. There is something particularly striking in the action of Richard's right hand, which is instinctively put like the token of a vulture ready to grasp its prey. The group in the background keeps up the interest of the scene, which, as a whole, is powerfully and artistically represented.

FINE ARTS.

SOCIETY OF FINE ARTS.

The Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts seems to us to proceeding steadily towards the realisation of the somewhat extensive scheme of operations which it proposed at its outset. The public are, in addition to conversazioni and other proceedings, inaugurates a lecture course, which is to include all the various branches of art, namely, fine art—painting, sculpture, architecture, music, &c. The first lecture was given on Thursday evening, the 22nd of November, in the society's rooms in Conduit-street, W. Mr. J. Orrock, R.S.A., presided ably and learnedly "On Character in Art;" and a discussion followed in which various were commented upon. On Tuesday last the same gentleman followed up his subject with a lecture "On Character in Ornament." The lecture was illustrated by a large number prepared for the purpose. These remarks, leading to an agreeable interchange of experiences and opinions in matters of art, are promised to the most eminent artists. The prize medals awarded by the society in autumn are announced to be presented on the 16th of January.

O'NEIL'S PICTURE OF MOZART AND THE CELEBRATED REQUIEM.

The wonderful success acquired by some of Mr. O'Neil's recent paintings, more especially the "Eastward, Ho!" and "Home Again" has conferred considerable importance upon the artist's works, which at the time of their production, were comparatively but little noticed. Amongst these is a very beautiful picture on the wall of the Suffolk-street Gallery, painted in 1840, the property of Mr. Edmund Simpson, of Leeds, and which is now being exhibited at the New Fine Art Gallery, Bond-street, previous to its removal into the hands of the engraver. It is related of Mozart that but a few weeks before his death a mysterious stranger, unknown to any one, commissioned him to compose, intended to be performed annually in a solemn service for the repose of departed friends. Mozart, engrossed and fascinated with his subject, worked night and day at it; till his health, already dilapidated, fairly broke down under the double anxiety of composition and fear that he himself should object to keep his chamber, but the "Requiem" and haunted him, and the impression that he was destined to be murdered ere he was doubtful. Accordingly, with his wife and sister-in-law, and his pupil Süssmayer, he shut himself up in a solitary and distant part of the house, called for the all-engrossing score, and it was performed by the assembled party, himself taking the alto part. But he could not long touch for his feelings; in the middle of a plaintive passage Mozart was seized with a violent fit of weeping, and the score was put aside, only a few hours before the gifted composer breathed his last.

This is the touching incident which Mr. O'Neil has commemorated in the picture before us, and which will most forcibly strike the beholder. The group is circular in arrangement, commanding interest being given to the fine, sad head of Mozart, which is turned over his shoulder, as he is following to Georgette. Her remonstrances are followed by a quarrel; she leaves him, and his betrothed takes to his consolation, which by way of drowning all feelings of self-reproach, he gets tolerably tipsy, in which state he returns home. Georgette reappears, and a reconciliation takes to his bosom. She forgives him with the information that her father, as old soldier, is delighted with jollyish locks, he did not mind waiting a length gets him to sign a paper, which she tells him is the marriage contract, assuring him that she will not sign it, but intends to keep it, to show to her that it is she who has refused him. Having got it, she tells him that she has changed her mind, that she is his wife, and will stay with him. The lovers get into a chaise, and drive off, when, and at last betaken himself into the hayloft, where he falls asleep. Georgette, however, has not been so married, and has only forgiven brought in by her friends, and lays the table neatly for supper. When Jacques, having slept himself sober, comes down, he chides her for the comfortable aspect of his house, captivated by Georgette, and ashamed of his own behaviour—and so, of course, they make it up again; it is natural for the reconciled, the obvious remark would be that Master Jacques is a foolish, selfish lout, and that the girl is a great deal too good for him; but, then, it is very natural, and, as we have said, the moral Victor Massé is one of the numerous tribe of Parisian composers who take Amber Heart for their model follow him as far as they can, although not a great distance. But Massé's music, in that as well as his other pieces (which have been considerable popular), is full of melody and fun, though not original, has an air of freshness which is very agreeable. The music belongs to the part of Georgette contains some event and passion, and is therefore tame. "By mamby with your work, my fingers;" but its prevailing character is brilliancy. The overture and introductory music to the second act, between the voice and flute, in imitation of the nightingale, sufficient to rank the name of the most popular composer of the day. The music in the part of Jacques is gay and comic, of the partlante or talking kind, and requires a rapid and voluble utterance, which Mr. Santley in the noted buffo part, is delightfully acted by Louisa Pyne; she is able to assume to the life the piquante manner of the French grisette, and sings with the true spirit of enjoyment. The singing of Santley is also is well seconded by Corri, who acts and sings with great anima-tion. The piece was very well received, and will be a welcome, convenient time, while the public are waiting for the more important novelty—Balfe's new and original opera, now announced under the title of "Bianca; or, The Bandit's Bride."

The MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS are going on prosperously, as they well deserve to do, considering the excellent style in which the treat of the very finest music. The instrumental pieces were selected from the most eminent composers. They opened with a quartet in G minor, op. 18, played by Messrs. Sainton, Ries, Schreurs, and Piatti; the scenes in F for the piano and violoncello, by Mr. Charles Hallé and Piatti; and the trio in C, op. 1, for the piano, violin, and violoncello, by the above performers. Every one of these is a chef-d'œuvre, and their execution was perfect. Mr. Hallé played with Mr. Santley the Miss Gerard. Mr. Santley sang Benedict's fine imaginative song, "The Elf King's Son," and Hatton's "Wreck of the Hesperus." Miss Gerard, who is a young singer of very great merit, sang Macfarren's song, "Over these dear eyes I kneel unchanging," from "Don Quixote," and Beethoven's "Know'st thou the Land." In both she was warmly applauded—a reception due to her beautiful voice, and her taste, intelligence, and feeling. Mr. Benedict, as usual, conducted, accompanying the vocal pieces with the delicacy, spirit, and effect for which he is pre-eminent. At the concert of Monday next the programme selected from the works of Spohr, Dussek, and Weber, which was so favourably received at the first concert of the season, is, we observe, to be repeated.

The Paris Acclimatisation Society has applied to the authorities at Biarritz for its Regis for a supply of the tuber known there as arrancabe, a cross between a carrot and a potato, which grows favourably in very wet soil. The arrancabe is the staff of life in New Granada.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.—Owing to the indisposition of Mr. Webster, the run of Mr. Watts Phillip's new piece has been suddenly brought to a pause, and revivals are again in progress. Mr. Haynes Bailey's comedy of "Forty and Fifty" has accordingly been brought forth out of "the treasury of things new and old," and experienced a cordial reception from the public. This is partly owing to the excellent manner in which Mr. Lambert plays the part of Mr. Lilyvale, mingling the jealousy and fondness, the humour and pathos of the character with equal judgment and force. To Mr. Belford, also, credit is due for the light-hearted delineation of the gay Bernard with which he enchanted the audience. The piece was followed by the new comedy of "The Adventures of Baddeley Boots," which is more or less a sketch, a description that they defy the conveyance of language, and require the evidence of eyesight for the understanding of incidents that are not to be described in words. Mr. Boots is a character somewhat Sheridan's comedy of "The Critic," Mr. Charles Mathews supporting the two parts of Sir Fretful and Puff. Mr. Baddeley's performance is received by a full house.

LYCEUM.—A new version by Mr. Stirling Coyne has been made of Auber's "Crown Diamonds," for the purpose of introducing Mr. John Drew as the delineator of Irish character, to a London audience. The piece was produced on Saturday last, and is found to suit Mr. Drew. Indeed here was not only perfectly successful, but his acting was such as to merit particular praise. Mr. John Drew is a true artist in his vocation, and approaches more nearly to the artistic qualities of the late Mr. Power than the representatives of Hibernian humour who have appeared in the interval. He has the genuine Irishman, with correct exaggeration. Mr. Drew must be accepted as an actor of judgment and taste, true to nature, with an abundance of humour and a vivid imagination.

ST. JAMES'S.—The management is active in the production of novelties. A new vaudeville was produced on Monday, under the curious title of "Smack for Smack," and which it should be stated also bears the name of "Ici on Parle Français." The piece is from the pen of Mr. Oxenford, and is founded on a story of Hans Andersen, describing the graces of a danseuse celebrated in St. Petersburg, Mdlle. Alhinn. It shows, upon the whole, considerable skill in its construction, and supported the part of Fanchette with extraordinary agility, which we remember to have seen in three other pieces—"The Elfin Shoe," "Highland Fling, and La Cracovienne. The part of John Trott, who electrified with surprise at so much activity and versatility, was sustained by Mr. Compton. The piece concludes with a tableau illustrative of "The Loan of a Wife," the drama of "Monsieur Jacques," and the "Loan of a Lover" of Next Door, produced under an elegant evening's amusement.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Last week Mr. Edmund Phelps, a son of the well-known actor, took his debut as Uriel, in Lord Byron's tragedy of "Werner." The house was unusually crowded on the occasion, and the new candidate for histrionic honours was received favourably. Mr. Edmund Phelps has for the last three or four years matriculated in the provinces as Romeo, Hamlet, and Othello, but in the latter he appear as a novice. His having, indeed, on the stage was that of a practised actor—somewhat taller, we think, than his father, but with a voice and style of elocution similar. He looked the character well, and acted it without individual blemish. He manifestly been well trained, but wants that individual fervour which, if he study well, will lead him out of the trammels of imitation into an independent style of his own. He is decidedly a sound actor, and may become a fine one.

STANDARD.—Mr. Barry Sullivan has been re-engaged, and on Monday appeared as Sir Richard Vernon in "The Iron Chest." This is a play now seldom acted; the part, however, suits the actor. On Tuesday "The Lady of Lyons" was performed, when we can better nearly commendations on the Lady Tenale of Miss Marriott.

DUBLIN.—We perceive from the local papers that Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean have been playing to crowded houses at this theatre. Mrs. Kean's Mrs. Beverly appears to have excited great enthusiasm; and both performers in the comedy of "Money" gentleman and lady performance palpably fell in Mr. Lovell's pathetic drama, "The Wife's Secret."

THE FARM.

ANOTHER week of sadly unseasonable weather has operated heavily against the farmer. Rain and boisterous weather more than one-half of his harvest, and a few days more nearly all the beans were out in most of the fields in the North, South, East, and West, and in the wheat and oat crops. With the exception, perhaps, of a part of Scotland, the harvest has been a most disastrous one in every way. On one farm in Yorkshire, rented at 47s., a steam thrashing-machine had fell mark for six days, and the result was fifty-seven quarters of wheat and barley, and 100 of oats. Returns were made from Mark-lane on Monday to Mark-lane was so bad that it was difficult to sell even at a decline of 2s. per quarter. Last week's returns of the sales of grain in the seven Gazette averages show that wheat is 15s. higher; barley, 5s. 9d.; oats, 2s. 1d.; and beans, 1s. 6d.

Rugby inaugurated the fat-show session yesterday, and Birmingham and Oakham will follow in the course of the week. The show next week. From seeing Precious Stone side by side with Beauty's Butterfly in the yard at Barnsley the year, when they pleased the eye between Beauty's sides. They were decided—not in a hole-and-corner style, but publicly in the ring—to fully expected that Mr. Torr's cow would be the first Mr. Bell or Baker-street Bazaar this year; but it seems that Colonel Towneley intends to enter Mr. Bates's Duchess. Mr. Bates's cow is one with which he builds his hopes to Rugby this week, but keeps him fresh, along with his heifer, for Birmingham. The former is a cow that has been the talk wherever she has been, and Mr. Bates's steer, which has been the talk milk-round Bushmoor for some months past, but they are widely different in their points. Mr. Bates's steer is a fine, level, and well-fleshed animal. Prince Albert sends a very good Devon to Birmingham, and Mr. Cartwright takes a Shorthorn between Beauty and Butterfly. We have not seen her for six weeks, but we believe that she will be very much improved. Mr. Torr's Shorthorn heifer is a very fine animal, and it is said that Mr. Tudge's cow of that breed may meet Mr. Pirie's cow at both places. It will be a regular contest of the Lodlow v. the Gunnister pastures, and we shall see which will be the victor this time, as the Lodlow and Hereford decisions gave each a victory. Mr. Pirie is also said to have a Shorthorn steer, which will meet Mr. Torr's, and decided a very high offer at the latter place.

A meeting of the Royal Society of Agriculture for the purpose of taking measures to erect a lasting memorial to the late Duke of Richmond. A committee was appointed to draw up a plan for consideration at the next meeting of subscribers. They seem to be anxious that the memorial should be a national one, but that, whether it takes the shape of a column or a fountain, the money already subscribed for the object should be erected in Sussex.

The late season of drought in which we have heard so much lately, has collapsed at last into its legitimate dimensions. It seems as far as we can see to-day, that the wet harvest will not be a bad one after all. Farmers are in the habit of buying as cows according to a certain received local custom (of which the vendor and vendee were both presumed to be cognizant), and this is the case in many districts even now. The general abstract idea that the warranty contained in the list can be transmitted to the purchaser, is a fallacious one, as regards whatever from the decision in question. According to the select few who are supposed to be in the secret, a large number produced from trying the only means open to him of making his doubtful property look sound and healthy. The consequence is that many who seem wandering to his sale, with 100 guineas more in his pockets than he knows what to do with, should be tempted to give an extravagant price for a lot without inquiring into her antecedents. The sale is not what impression the simple statement in the list produces on such customers, but what a nasty fellow to mean by those people of reasonable caution and intelligence, who never have occasion to go elsewhere, and who find that auctioneers and vendors are rogues, in the hope of drawing off attention from their own silly speculators. If the statement in the list were not a bond fide one, or, owing to circumstances, within (or even not within) the vendor's knowledge, wholly calculated to mislead the vendee, the case is totally altered. Supposing, however, that nothing of the kind could be proved, it would be unjust indeed if the vendor having expressly warranted but one fact should be taken to have warranted two, and thus be exposed to the frauds which, and whose agents, surround every large sale. Nothing can be more fitful and capricious as regards their symptoms than the subjects of these diseases, and we have known the most careful breeders who deceived even in the tenth month. If the law were taken to be as we have heard it proposed and considered, it is evident that "no produce to pay" ought always to have been the order of the day, and that, few amounting to many thousands might be, recovered from the owners of acres of all kinds, as paid on a presumption which failed.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

In the present apathetic state of "The Corner," the sale of seven brood mares belonging to Lord Chesterfield (of whom, by-the-by, a most interesting account appears in the current number of Bell's Magazine) helped to while away a very wet Monday afternoon. Messrs. Tattersall, in Knightsbridge, was the locale selected, and created a very strong competition between Mr. Blenkiron and Colonel Maude, on behalf of Mr. Royal paddocks. Mr. Blenkiron got the 500-guinea bid and eventually carried off, for 540 gs. to join Rilestake and Bunni at Eltham Paddocks, which now contain no less than 60 brood mares. Types and bays, by both of them supposed to be barren, fell to Mr. Blenkiron's nod—the former for 100 gs. and the latter for 105 gs. The sale was concluded after when Mr. Greville arrived with a commission authorising him to go as high as 650 gs. for Queen and 450 gs. for Types. Both were bought by Mr. W. Smith for 140 gs., to go to France; Jacqueline for 370 gs., by Colonel Maude, after a stiffish tussle with Mr. W. Smith; and an Alarm mare (5 gs.) and a blackcoated one (4 gs.) were the remaining lots. The average for the seven was about 262 gs.

Fifty-four greyhounds were put up at Aldridge's on Saturday, but only four or five of our leading courses attended, and the prices were most wretchedly low. Fullerton and Lofty, a brace, realised 16 gs., and Skittles at 10 gs.; but the remaining twenty in Captain Spoor's collection, and the whole of those sold by Mr. Mytton, for 7 gs.; old Spectre, by Mr. Bland, for 21 gs.; and a splendid Sunbeam puppy from her for 16 gs. A hundred guineas was said to be the reserve on Brisbane, but he was withdrawn. The sale is done out with the deepest lots were the six puppies by Skyrockets, from Spectre, which only realised 19 gs. for the lot—or 3 gs. for 1 of the 6. It was a strange contrast to the brilliant greyhound sales we sometimes see here; but it is to be hoped better times are in store. Spectre's second's conditions, ladies were naturally shy.

The Duke of Atholl has had a great year, as his great exhibition, and 43 gs. was all he could get for Sir Hubert and Lily Agnes, the former proving to be exactly one hundred specimens, and the latter to forty-three, including, as we are informed, the best brace of puppies that have been long Kingdoms. Among the hounds there are just enough to satisfy the curious, but not to bring away any M.F.H. from his more arduous duties in the field. Six fine Scotchmen, and twenty greyhounds, will attract the dearstalker and the courser; while the lovers of the field-spaniel will find a drop-one specimen worthy of their attention. Among the foreign dogs in the division are boarhounds, which are very uncommon in England, and a Newfoundland, which is the very model of the lover of the dog, but by the artist and connoisseur. The toy dogs in the collection are also worthy of notice for size; for there is already a fair sprinkling of mastiffs, bulldogs, Newfoundlands, and sheepdogs for their husbands or brothers. The foreign varieties in this division include three Alpine sheepdogs, a Russian mastiff, one Danish, Bernard dog, a Russian terrier, an Italian terrier, and two Maltese dogs."

Our Scotch correspondent writes that a great business is doing in sound during the past week. There have been two capital things, and kills in both instances—one at Lord Breadalbane's, and the Earl of Dalhousie's, at Harry Ayrie, who had broken a rib, is in the saddle once more with the Berkeley, which is hunting the country. Mr. Hall has had two rousing things last week, besides the Manton Gorse day. On Friday the fog drew so dense that the Queen could not draw; but on Monday they found a good fox at Garrow Hill, and lost him after an hour, very fast, at Queeny; and then at Winterfield found their fox. Thorpe Trussells. A meeting, at which the Earl of Wilton attended, to consider what steps are to be taken respecting the future mastership of the Quorn, was held at Leicester on Monday last week, when it was stated that Mr. Fitzwilliam's have had a run of eighteen miles straight from Farest Fen, time some-thing under the hour, and that the hounds in question are being pleased with it as he was with his testimonial. The Cheshire had a capital forty-minutes' gallop from Peckforton on Saturday last, and on Monday. Captain White met with an accident, but was, happily, not hurt.

DEPARTURE OF MR. RAREY.

THE horse-tamer took his departure from Liverpool in the Asia, on Saturday last, for a second visit to the United States in Ohio. He has secured our shores on the 20th of November, 1857, and few can be said to have lived more in the public eye during the past three years. The first visit he indeed was at Liverpool, the day after his arrival, for the amusement of Captain Lamy, of the Asia, who had crossed with him then he has had his troupe on nearly seven hundred of every shade of temperament. An Emerson says "Let a man alone in a room with a horse even a horse that knows found audiences as overflowing and enthusiastic as ever; and the farewell assembly of 1860 will be found as numerous as that of 1857. Mr. Rarey and Mr. Peters furnished a splendid subject in Stafford, and Russia in a Console horse; and Cruiser, King of the Prairies, the Devil's Own, Sultan, Black Diamond, Bonny boy at Alma's riding-school, Mr. Gurney's grey, and an Edinburgh omnibus horse, will serve to illustrate the various phases of equine characteristics of the savages of the United Kingdom. Strange to say, he carries away no Arab, although he has had several in his hands. Mr. Rarey has also taken with him two cruisers' saddles, and a pair of Scotch bridles, and two cruisers' whips. Four or five of them were introduced each day, while the rest looked on, and tickets each day's programme were their spiritual guides. The military system of throwing the horses previously was for five or six men to throw them down together, and then violently hold them, but the Rarey-Burghurst strap has quite done away with this, and saved not a few animals from being turned out of the ranks as hopeless. Some of Rarey's best pupils are in the Army; but one of the most energetic is a civilian, and a Liverpool man, and has had several interviews with Mr. Rarey and his friends' horses, old and young, and with the most signal success.

It is St. Andrew's Day to-day, and the Scots will be in full feasts, and, as he indubitably holds the belt, we may see him over again in a year's time for one of the Caledonian dinners which are to be given in different European cities. Cruiser followed them on Friday, along with a blood mare, Dandy, the Devil's Own, Sultan, Black Diamond, and Bonny boy at Alma's riding-school, Mr. Gurney's grey, and an Edinburgh omnibus horse, will serve to illustrate the various phases of equine characteristics of the savages of the United Kingdom. Cruiser followed them on Friday, along with a blood mare, Dandy, the Wightland pony, and Mr. Rarey himself. The Duke of Atholl's Highland pony, Sir Hubert, and Lily Agnes, the former of Indian origin, have taken up no inconsiderable portion of his village-ground. The old Duke has had a good deal of practice with them for some years, and he began to learn his experience, and Cruiser and the Shetties will be taught many a fresh trick in the Rarey-Burghurst style. Few men know so little spoiled by prosperity, and none ever carried away more complete-ly the respect and affection of those with whom he has been connected during his eventful English career.

A silver dinner and dessert service, weighing 900 ounces, has just been presented to Mr. T. Winterbottom by a numerous body of mercantile friends and workmen, in token of the admiration with which they regard his upright conduct, sincerity, and courtesy, both in public and private life.

Two lads who slept at Swindon Lodge, near Thurlstone, Yorkshire, at which a burglary had recently been committed, were supplied with a gun by their father, a gamekeeper, who lived close by. On Tuesday se'nnight a drunken labourer, who had been engaged to work at the lodge, approached the house about midnight, when one of the boys, not recognising him in the darkness, fired and killed him.

LITERATURE AND ART.

DOCTOR CROLY is dead. He had attained more than the three score years and ten allotted to man, and, at seventy-six, without any stronger premonition than some of the symptoms of decay, stepped down to the prior mountain than some of the symptoms of decay, stepped down to the prior mountain than some of the symptoms of decay, stepped down to the prior mountain

THE CITY OF COBLENTZ.

THE personal relations which unite the Royal families of Prussia and England led to an interview, a few weeks ago, between the Prince Regent of Prussia and Queen Victoria at Coblentz. "This meeting," says the Prussian Gazette, "devoted, in the first place, to the happiness of family life, could not fail, in the present state of Europe, to acquire a more extended signification. It is not only by the happy bond which connects the two dynasties that the States of Prussia and England find themselves brought together. A number of relations calculated to unite nations, similar interests, and an analogous political position invite those two countries to go in accord. The cordial relations which have always subsisted between these two Powers, and which will continue so long as they shall not misunderstand their true interests, can only take stronger root in the serious exchange of ideas which has taken place at Coblentz between the statesmen who direct the affairs of the two countries, and can only gain in safety and extension. The more complicated are the affairs of some European States at the present moment, the more satisfaction is there in being able to state the accord in the views and conceptions of the two Powers on the great and important points which preoccupy public opinion to the highest degree. As to the question of knowing to what point the particular position and the special mission which, in spite of all analogy of interests, remain peculiar to each independent Power, permit, or cause a hope for, a community in detail of views or of execution between Prussia and England, it would be an idle undertaking to enter into any discussion. It suffices to know that, on all essential points of view and on the object to which they ought to tend, there has been the utmost harmony. The happy result of the conferences of Coblentz show, even without any other developments, that Prussia knows how to recognise and cultivate the interests of the first order which unite her to England."

Coblentz is a fortified city of Rhenish Prussia, on the left bank of the Rhine, at the influx of the Moselle, the former river being here crossed by a bridge of boats 485 yards across, and the latter by a stone bridge 536 yards in length. Its population in 1846 was 23,421. It is well built, and has several churches, a palace of the former Electors of Treves, an ancient Jesuits' college, a Roman Catholic seminary, a theatre, manufactures of cotton and woollen fabrics, and an active general trade. Around it are several detached forts. Ehrenbreitstein, on the opposite bank of the Rhine, is one of the strongest outworks. It is defended by about 400 pieces of cannon. The escarped rocks, or steep slopes, on three sides, would bid defiance to almost any assault: its weak point is on the north-west. Here, however, art has done the utmost to repair a natural defect, and three lines of defences present themselves, one within another, which would require to be taken in succession before the enemy could enter in this direction. No town on the Rhine surpasses Coblentz in the beauty of its situation; from whatever side you approach, by land or water, it presents a beautiful picture. The views from the centre of the bridge of boats, from the heights of Ehrenbreitstein, of Pfaffendorf, or of the Chartreuse, are all fine. Coblentz is a free port, and carries on an active commerce up and down the three rivers

Rhine, Moselle, and Lahn, supplying the country around with colonial produce. From its vicinity to the wine districts it forms the natural staple place of the Rhine and Moselle wines, going down the river to Great Britain, Holland, and other parts of the world. About a million jars of seltzers and other mineral waters from the Duchy of Nassau and shipped annually from hence. Corn and the excellent iron of the neighbourhood are exported up Moselle into France. The volcanic productions of this country form very peculiar articles of trade; such are the lava itself, in the shape of millstones, and the ashes ground to form Dutch tiles.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.

In spite of, or rather on account of, the fine weather which has occasionally broken through the monotony of the penultimate month of 1860, the Parisian dressmakers are in a flourishing condition, and busily occupied in the production of dresses for the demi-saison, and, in some cases, already for winter. Woollen textures for robes enjoy a decided preference over all others this autumn. They are, for the most part, so beautifully manufactured at present that they bear off the palm from their rivals, the cheaper descriptions of silks, to which they are undoubtedly superior.

The fashions for the 465th leap year of the Christian era terminate with a quieter tendency. Few bright colours, even for visits of ceremony, are admitted just now; dark shades, black ribbons, black bonnets (or those composed of two tints, black being one), have superseded the gay roses and feathers of another season.

Apropos of bonnets, we are somewhat puzzled, so great has been the spirit of defection in their ranks of late: deserters have adopted so many different styles of chapeaux—à la Garibaldi, à la Diana Vernon, à la Magenta, Spanish, American, Italian, cum multis aliis—that we must clearly state that the few words we have to say on the subject apply only to bonnets proprement dit. White bonnets are altogether out of favour at present. Generally, the bonnets of the legitimate category continue to improve in good taste—that is, in their simplicity; a simple bow, or a flower placed to advantage, is found to be more becoming than a profusion of gaudy floral or gilt ornaments, however costly. As to size and shape, no change has taken place since our last.

For the winter season a charming description of cloth glove has just been adopted by the Parisian ladies for all occasions except those of grand ceremony, when kid gloves are de rigueur; we allude to the gauntlet glove in black or chestnut-coloured cloth, the former embroidered with red silk, and the latter with white, green, or blue. During the cold weather these gloves must certainly be preferred to kid.

VISITING DRESS. WALKING DRESS. EVENING DRESS.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Visiting Dress.—Robe of plain colour, having near the bottom of the jupe a wide band of black velvet, edged with a narrow ruching of rose-coloured taffeta. On the front of the dress there is also a narrow stripe of velvet interlaced with the serpentine ornamentation shown in our Engraving, and similar to but narrower than that on the bottom of the skirt. The long hanging sleeve is bordered to match, and is still further decorated by four velvet macaroons. The bonnet is composed of crape and taffeta, with a lace trimming on the toy and a black and white nigrette on one side.

Fig. 2. Walking Dress.—Our second illustration is of a dark-coloured merino dress, long-waisted. A band of velvet, trimmed with a narrow passpurs, is attached bruce-fashion in front and behind the shoulders. The waistband, fringed out at the long flowing ends, and fastening with two large flat bows, is of the same material as the robe. The bonnet is of mauve-coloured silk; the bavolet is covered with black lace; and the bows seen in front are in mauve velvet, edged with narrow black lace. A total absence of flowers characterises this chapeau.

Fig. 3. Evening Dress.—This dress is of black silk, ornamented with six flounces separated, and surmounted by a silk plaiting of the same colour as the robe, and edged with narrow lace. The corsage is low-necked, descending with a long point in front of the waist; from each shoulder down to the waist-line a graduating trimming of silk plaiting serves as the principal ornament, which a large bow in the centre completes. The sleeves consist of three small flounces, and the under-sleeves are of white tulle. The simple headdress is composed of marguerites attached to the back hair in such a manner as to conceal the comb.

SCENE IN EDW. LODER'S OPERA,
"THE NIGHT DANCERS."

THE accompanying illustration represents the most striking situation in this opera—the scene which forms the conclusion of the first act. The villagers are assembled to celebrate the nuptials of the rustic heroine, Giselle, with her lover Albert. The dance is broken off by the entrance of the Duke of Silezia and his daughter Bertha, followed by huntsmen and attendants; and the Duke discovers that Albert, the seeming peasant, is his nephew, who is betrothed to his daughter. Giselle is struck with horror by this fatal disclosure, and her noble rival, pitying her distress, generously renounces her claim to Albert's hand. But it is too late. The blow has been fatal, and Giselle falls—into some of the female villagers' arms, while the persons present are grouped around in attitudes of astonishment and sorrow. The abbot is begins to toll, the abbot and monks enter in procession, and, at the end of a solemn requiem, the curtain falls.

THE GREAT SEMMERING RAILWAY.

THE BOLLESWAND VIADUCT AND TUNNEL.

THE WEINZETTELWAND TUNNEL.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

RAILWAY THOUGH THE GREAT SEMMERING.

THIS is a great engineering work constructed through a mountain range to Styria, mainly by means of a series of viaducts and tunnels, and forming one of the links of the line between Vienna and Trieste. The distance over which this portion of the work runs is about seventy-three English miles, and is provided with seven stations. The gradient of the line are exceedingly steep: the steepest on Semmering, on the north of the chain, and whence the rise begins, is 1308 feet above the level of the sea; at Payerbach it is 1274 feet, at Eisenberg 1606, at Klamm 2160, at Breitenstein 2454, and at Semmering 2778, in the middle of the principal tunnel through the chain. Here it begins to decline, descending, in the last point, 8 inches to 720 feet. Commencing at the station at Gloggnitz, it passes along the left bank of the Schwarza, and through the valley of Schottwien, and thence along the Eisenberg. On the declivity of the Gullesberg the line crosses to the right and traverses the Schwarzthal; and here is the great Schwarza Viaduct, with an arched span of 90 feet. Eisberg and goes on to Payerbach. There is a viaduct over Kühgruben; and the line then runs to the Semmering. Several bridges and tunnels intervene between this and the station at Klamm; while numerous others, some of the former of great elevation and the latter of great length, occur between that station at Breitenstein is reached. Thence the line descends into the first Styrian valley, which is watered by the Darr, and Frauchnitz, and by the Mürz, down to the former's confluence with the latter. The works of this connecting link with the railway to Trieste terminates. Speculair are the gradients of the line this Semmering is especial Speculair are the gradients of the line this Semmering is especial described in the Times. The next viaduct is that of the Kuntzaberg, and then comes the tunnel of the Wahrbergd, 1200 feet long, which is soon succeeded by the tunnel through the Wolfsberg, 1404 feet long. Crossing the viaduct of Kuntzaberggd, the line passes into a subterranean course through the same mountain, and forming along the declivities of the Mattergraben hills, opposite to which rose the old post-road of Semmering, behind which rise the Semmering and Raxalpe hills, the station at Semmering is reached. Here is situated the great tunnel, the most extensive part of the works, it having been aged 4380 feet. From this point the line descends into the first Styrian valley, which is watered by the Darr, and Frauchnitz, and by Mürz, down to the former's confluence with the latter. LITERATURE.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE GREAT VICTORIA BRIDGE IN CANADA. By JAMES HODDER, Engineer to Messrs. PETO, BRASSEY, and BETTS, Contractors. Imperial folio. Whole.

The gigantic engineering achievement just completed in North America in connection with the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada finds a fitting memorial in the large and handsome volume before us, the production of Mr. James Hodder, the engineer to Messrs. Peto, Brassey, and Betts, the contractors for the work. Mr. Hodges undertakes the task of historian with perfect knowledge of his subject, and a full appreciation of its importance. He treats it with a modesty which could hardly leave the reader to believe that, the first idea and general plan of the Victoria Bridge having been those of the late Mr. Robert Stephenson and Mr. Ross, the responsibility of the conduct of the work, with the introduction of many valuable improvements in its construction, fell exclusively upon his own shoulders. Such, however, was the case; and Mr. Hodges will not injure matters his skill in engineering science, if he may always look back to the construction of the Victoria Bridge as one of the proudest episodes in his professional life.

Mr. Hodges commences with some observations on the importance of that Grand Trunk Railway with the completion of which the whole of the transit connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific coasts of the New World, is closed by no fewer than six months in the year, besides which the restricted proportions of the Welland Canal rendered transhipment into smaller vessels of passengers and goods at Port Colborne necessary to the Upper Lake district. The Grand Trunk Railway at once supplied all these defects, and, by an unbroken length of 1,000 miles, brought the rich western corn-fields—which Mr. Cobden has stated would supply grain enough to feed all Europe, in addition to its own, requisite communication direct and continuous connection with the ocean. Its construction was necessary to the existence of the Province of Canada. But the work was incomplete so long as it was confined to the banks of the St. Lawrence. From the head of Lake Superior to the Atlantic, a distance of more than 1500 miles, there was no bridge across the river, with the exception of that at the city of Montreal. It became a matter of vital importance to the Province of Canada would be in other hands if the railway did not gain the command of the navigation of the St. Lawrence, which connects British North America and the United States. Accordingly, in the summer of 1852, Messrs. Peto, Brassey, and Betts undertook the work, and Mr. A. M. Ross and Mr. Wm. Jackson proceeded to the spot for that purpose. During to double still existing, however, he to the property of the Atlantic and Lake Canals, in the west end of Montreal harbour. A great portion of the bed here is very shallow, and lined in with boulder rock, which would necessitate, considerably to the labour necessarily incidental to such a work—many of these boulders had to be removed before the piers could be built, weighing from one to twenty tons. The bed of the river is of solid rock, called by Sir William Logan "Laurentian." The above stone rock, called by Sir William Logan "Laurentian." The above stone from time to time in a solid bed, or one mile and three quarters.

The most serious difficulty to be contended against in the design and construction of such a work was the ice in the river. This, which occurred twice a year, at spring and fall; and to meet which it was resolved to build the bridge upon piers, constructed of cylinders, of wide intervals, and, wedge-shaped, acting both for the support of the tube, and to break the ice as it came down in the current. The size of the stones of which these piers should be constructed was the first point for consideration, and it was eventually decided that a block of Montreal limestone, of a hard limestone, of a blue colour, but which, on exposure to the air for a number of years, becomes of a light grey colour. Large openings being in the proposed piers, the ice would thus be more necessarily to treat with their chiefs for permission to take the stone, and it was a considerable time before they succeeded for a Sunday after church, this being the only time when a sufficient number of the chiefs could be together. The quarries proved to be of superior quality. On the appointed day the chiefs arrived, twelve in number, and the ceremony commenced. The first stone was put together a certain number of existing dams or ice-shoving commenced, and replaced in the spring on the river becoming clear.

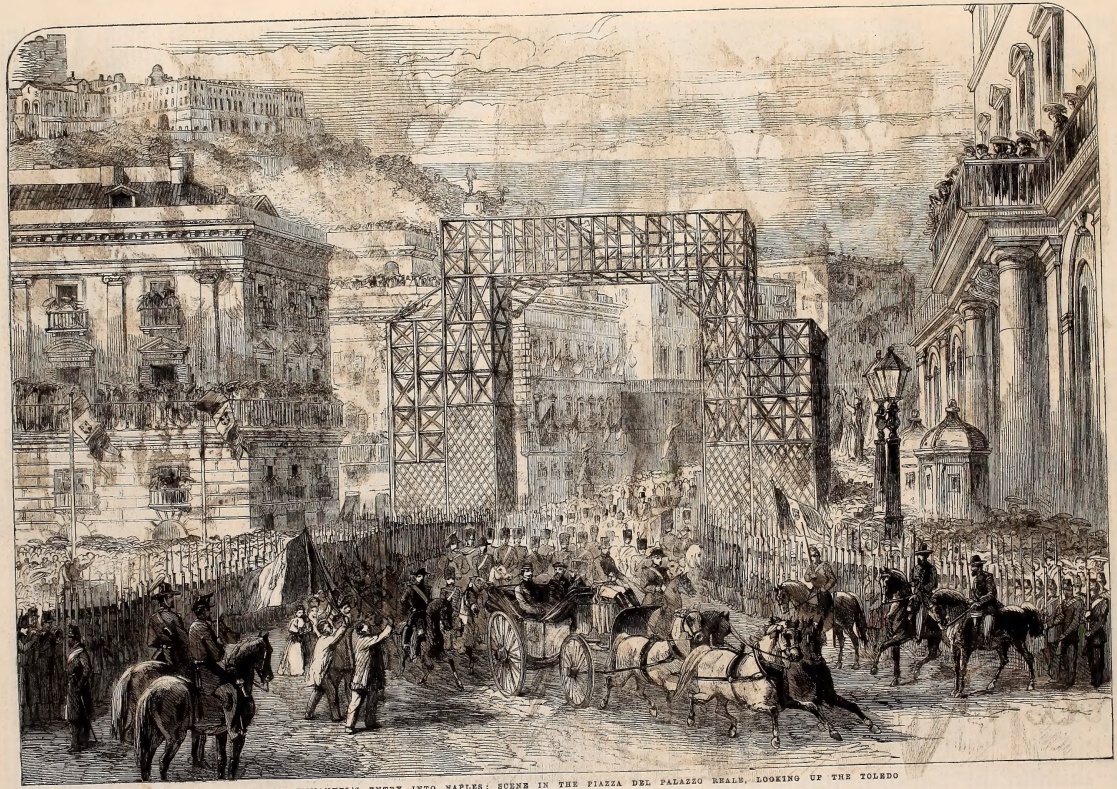
In the year of 1853 the site for the bridge over the St. Lawrence having assumed its ordinary winter level, the staff of the contractors commenced erecting the offices and making the first soundings, and buoying out the most navigable channels for their steam-boats and barges. A level was carried across the river, and roughly-pucked ice in the exact line of the bridge. Holes were then cut in the ice at the points intended for the piers, and more accurate and soundings taken as accurately as possible. In all these works the men suffered acutely from the cold, many of them having their noses, feet, ears, frozen, or reduced to a condition of torpor by the glare of the sun upon the snow.

On the 25th of May, 1854, the first caisson was moored in its place, which may be considered as the commencement of the works of the bridge. The first stone of the bridge was laid on the 6th of June, and the masonry of the north abutment of the first pier was commenced on the 28th of August; and the pier was completed to the level of summer water-level before winter set in. In January, 1855, the usual packing and shoving commenced, and on the 4th twenty square miles, or over 12,000,000 tons of ice passed the site of the bridge. Mr. Hodges confesses to have been not a little anxious for the stability of the solitary pier then finished, although all the piers of the bridge, when finished when, upon looking through the transit instrument, he discovered that the pier had not been disturbed.

Mr. Hodges, in his concluding chapter, attributes the successful accomplishment of the work undertaken by Messrs. Peto, Brassey, and Betts to the spirit and inspiration he derived from the confidence reposed in him by his employers, who stood ready to the task amid every discouragement." He next bears testimony to the zeal and ingenuity displayed by his assistant engineers, subordinates, and workmen, and to the courtesy and perseverance in the bridge which they assisted to construct.

An interesting circumstance must here be mentioned. The years 1856–57 were perhaps the most fatal in point of sickness that Montreal ever experienced, and many hundreds of the inhabitants were carried off by cholera or fever, and some six thousand poor emigrants died of ship fever within that period, and were buried in common in a large pit near the bridge. Towards the close of the work, when the workmen were thinking of leaving Canada, the females of their poor countrymen were not forgotten, and the spot of interment was fenced in, and a large boulder, weighing some thirty tons, erected upon a pedestal some six feet high, with a suitable inscription, as a memorial to the departed.

In conclusion, a few of the statistics of this wonderful work may be interesting:—Total length of bridge, 9144 feet; total length of tubes, 6592 feet; number of bottom arches, 24; number of top arches, 60 feet; weight of iron in tubes, 9044 tons; number of rivets, 1,240,000; number of bolts, 104,000; quantity of masonry in piers and abutments, 2,713,955 cubic feet; quantity of timber in temporary works, 2,280,000 cubic feet; quantity of clay puddle used in dams, 146,000 cubic yards; number of men employed, 3000.



This noble and interesting volume is appropriately dedicated to the Prince of Wales.

WILL ADAMS; THE FIRST ENGLISHMAN IN JAPAN. A Romantic Story of the Days of Old. By WILLIAM DAVIS. A. W. Bennett.

A literature for children and for youth is now an established fact in a sense somewhat different to that which characterised the imperfect efforts of the last generation. There is a certain effort at solidity as combined with amusement, which is not without its acceptable results. Instead of the mere fiction of the past, we have a substratum of this kind, then difficulties do not seem to be considered insuperable. At the time of the very considerations of this description come 1000, and the crop is already somewhat plentiful. Are we of opinion that this class of literary productions calls for special attention for very reasons? Certainly for giving some brief remarks on several volumes which are now before us. We will however, in the first place, commence with the composition, and he enters on very interesting ground in the present volume. We are told in an accredited work on the Japanese Empire that to English skill and courage the Dutch owe their first access to Japan. The Erasmus, the first Dutch ship which ever reached that coast, in April, 1600, was piloted by William Adams, a Kentish man, born in a town called Gillingham, two English miles from Rochester, and one mile from Chatham. Dockyard Creek, Queen's ships of war, were then built. Adams may not inappropriately be called a representative Englishman, for, though little known, he was a man of no common school, little more than a simple shipman—he was one of the fine old stock out of which spring our navies, and, therefore, of which England is proud. He had to undergo many perils, the current of which carries with it much that will interest the readers of longer growth than those for whom the book is designed, the hatred of the Portuguese, in 1610 or 1611 Adams was already in high place in the list of the heroes of naval discovery and enterprise, and entirely to assume the diplomatic management of affairs.

In Mr. Dalton's statement of the facts on which he founds his "romantic biography" we are told that Adams, married a native lady, and was appointed a treaty for this country, married a native lady, had children, and died after twenty years' sojourn in Japan, a land which he may be considered the adopted. DECEMBER.

WILD-goose and wild-fowl shooting may now be had to perfection, and to those who do not object to rough it on a cold frosty evening that former sport is splendid; before, however, we touch upon it a brief account of the birds which come under the description of Natatores, or Swimmers, may not be uninteresting, or rather of those belonging to the order called Anatidæ, which includes geese and ducks. Commencing we with the pre-logged goose period, before the modern system of draining was introduced into the fenny countries, were very common in Lincolnshire, Norfolk, and Cambridgeshire; they are now very rare in England, still more so in Ireland, where they formerly were plentiful. They principally breed in the north of Europe, Northumberland, Durham, Norfolk, and Cambridgeshire. The white-fronted, or "Ore geese" (laughing geese), visits this country, the Emerald Isle, and occasionally the Fen districts, but is not the common goose of England. The bean goose and the lesser goose are the regular winter visitors, but they keep to the shores of northern counties, and remain with us through all the cold months; the first-named species appears to prefer large open meadows and pasture lands, while the last-mentioned ones, being of a maritime species, pass a great portion of their time at sea, and when on land frequent the sandy hills and marshes. The immense number that frequent certain favourable localities are quite extraordinary; and a popular writer, author of "The Wild Sports in the West of Ireland," says—"I have from the window a considerable extent of sand literally black with this 'migratory host.' The pink-footed goose is another visitor to England, although a few have found their way to Norfolk. The barnacle goose is abundant on the west coast of Ireland, more so than on those of the east, where they feed in the marshes, on the grasses, and aquatic plants. The red-breasted goose has been occasionally seen in England, but cannot be included in our "fashionable arrivals" from Asia and Siberia; the same may be said of the Egyptian and pair-winged geese. The former is occasionally to be met common in England, where it breeds freely. The wild stock whence these birds spring is supposed to be the same found in America. When, in the year 1820, we were out in Canada, we forwarded some fine specimens to the wild-fowl collection of the present popular representative of the ancient house of MacCallum More, and they thrived particularly well in Scotland. To the progress of acclimatisation and the extension of the species we have also attributed the decrease of wild ducks in the British Isles; they, however, still continue to breed over the whole country, the first eggs reaching our shores in September, and the ducks, widgeon, dunbirds, shovelers, and pintail ducks during the months of October and the early flight of foreign birds do not arrive until the weather becomes very severe. The wild duck breeds in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and is common throughout Sweden, the Northern parts of Russia, North America, and the United States, in the Pacific, and Behring's Straits. The teal, which is the smallest of our ducks, breeds in Ireland, but is best as an article of food; it breeds all over Lapland, Norway, Sweden, Egypt, Scotland, and Ireland, and is to be found in the northern parts of Scandinavia, North Africa, Smyrna, Trebizond, the Caucasian Range, India, China, and Japan. The teal of North America is quite distinct from those of Europe and Asia. While upon the subject of wild-fowl we cannot refrain from noticing some excellent pieces, called "Modern landscape and Sporting Subjects," which are also interesting to the wildfowlers, yachtsmen, and sportsmen. They give a wide field with perfect exercise of definition, even on a large scale, without any magnifying power, do not fatigue the eyes.

The wild-goose shooting season is in country from about Michaelmas Day until the weather becomes severe, and—unlike the mallard, the teal, and the pochard—proceeds, to which is grass, during the daytime, instead of feeding at the night.

The pochard, or dunbird, is remarkable for the excellence of its flesh, as to our taste, for a species of the type of the canvas-backed duck of the United States, which bird it closely resembles in the colour of its plumage, though differing in size, as our bird being smaller. So great a luxury was this bird formerly esteemed that, to supply the London markets, the same method employed for taking rabbits was adopted. There were in certain fens of the avenues to the decoys, and, after a great number of these birds had collected for some time on the pool, a dog was driven from behind by pulleys to these poles, beneath which a large pit had previously been dug, and the birds, like the rabbits, driven into it. Night is at is dark, and are said always to rise against the wind, a large number were taken by the fowler, for, striking against the net, they never attempted to fly again, but fluttered down into the pit, and reached the pit below.

Although the woodcock is a migratory bird, there can be no doubt that it breeds in almost every county of England, as well as in Scotland, Ireland, Wales, as man authority says such a subject, and who resides about four or five miles from the sea, in the eastern part of Northumberland, says:—"I have found that these birds always come over in the greatest nobles in hazy weather, and with a wind that blowing from the north-east; and it is probable that they then find the whole region of the atmosphere with which they have come from counter-currents of air than in more open weather. After a night of this description I have frequently met with several woodcocks upon the edges of plantations in hedges, and even in turnip-fields, and enjoyed, excellent sport for the day; but on seeking, on the following morning, for a renewal of similar success I have not found a woodcock, the whole flight having proceeded on their course during the intervening night. It is during that time that woodcocks, like most migratory birds perform their journeys; and it seems probable that those which halt upon the eastern coasts of Scotland and the northern counties of England have completed their task from shore to shore between sunset and sunrise, as they appear but little fatigued upon their arrival, provided the weather has been calm. The distance of the coasts of Norway and Sweden, whence these visitors are supposed to come, affords no objection to this supposition, as a moderate flight of eight or ten hours, even at a rate inferior to what I conceive they are capable of accomplishing, would suffice for the transit. The direction present in favour of this supposition is the high state of condition in which the birds generally arrive on our shores, especially in the early period of the season, by no means indicating the wasting effects of very long-continued exertion. It appears that they fly at a considerable altitude, as they rest birds on which they alight with momentary movements. A respectable person who lived upon the coast, and who, being a gunner of wildfowl, was in the habit of frequenting the seashore at an early hour in the morning, assured me he had frequently observed the direct arrival of a flock of woodcocks coming from the north-east just at day dawn. His notice was attracted by a peculiar sound in the air over his head, which, on attending to, he found proceeded from birds descending in a direction almost perpendicular, and which upon approaching the shore separated and flew towards the land, where they pressed and shot, and which proved, as he surmised by the view he had of them as their fear had him, to be woodcocks. The direct descent of a north-east wind their course is probably south and west, which accounts for the number of these birds found in Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Wales, and in Ireland. Few places can exceed the west of Ireland for woodcock-shooting, and we fear we should be accused of shooting with a "long bow" if we described the number we have seen flushed during a morning's walk. Many of the coverts are situated in the centre of the mountains and bogs, and the sport is the greater as every woodcock for miles round quits the open heath for the nearest shelter. The woodcock is a remarkably cautious bird, especially in dry, grassy bottoms of brakes and woods by day, and seldom moving unless disturbed by the dog or the gunner. As the shades of night set in the "longbills" sally forth on silent wing to their feeding grounds, which are open glades near some rippling stream. From the beginning of March to the middle of April these birds keep drawing near the coasts, and avail themselves of the first fair wind to waft them to their native woods. Great interest has been taken by the naturalist as well as the sportsman as to the weight of the woodcock, the average being for a young male bird of the year seven ounces, while an old female will frequently weigh fourteen or fifteen. There are many exceptions to the above rule, for we find that at Scarborough, about 1775 or 1776, one of these birds was shot by a keeper weighing twenty-seven ounces; another was killed at Hadleigh, in Suffolk, the same period, weighed twenty-four ounces. The latter was shot weighing thirteen ounces, and Pennant describes one of twenty killed near Holywell. Many instances are recorded of the care taken by the woodcock towards her young. We read authenticated accounts of old woodcocks carrying their young in their claws, of one taking a weak one by the throat, another conveying its offspring across a river, or, if the young ones cannot fly, of the parent taking them separately between her feet and flying from the sportsmen with a moaning cry. The woodcock's nest is composed of dead leaves, dry fern, and sometimes fern, loosely laid together, without any lining; the eggs are of a pale yellowish white, the larger end spotted with ash grey and two shades of reddish-yellow brown, the length one inch nine lines, by one inch four lines in breadth. The late Sir Charles Taylor best a wager that he and his son in Essex, and a friend offered to make a wager that he could produce one of these birds any day throughout the year.

The common snipe breeds in small numbers in almost all the counties along the eastern line of the English coast, and a still larger number visit us during the winter from various parts of Scandinavia, and leave us again when the lies of March set in. White of Selborne, we quote from Mr. Jesse's book, says:—"In 1783 I was staying with my sons at the bishop of Winchester's tablet at Farnham Castle on this day. They had been out in the morning beside of this neighborhood." They also breed in Norfolk and Cambridgeshire. Snipes are common in Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Lapland, Germany, Holland, France, Canada, and are to be found in Russia, Siberia, Spain, Provence, Italy, Hungary, Illyria; indeed, we can ourselves vouch for the number of these birds in Hungary, France, and Canada, having taken in our earlier days had excellent sport in the above countries, more especially in the latter, where, within a few miles of the Falls of Montmorency, near Quebec, we killed an innumerable number. The jack snipe seldom or ever passes the winter in England, and is more solitary than the common snipe. Although found in pairs they generally get up singly. So sluggish are they that our Continental neighbors call them "the bird of fortune," and assert that they shelter themselves under coarse, long grass, or among strong rushes which are to be found in moist ground, it is difficult to get them on the wing.

VICTOR EMMANUEL'S ENTRY INTO NAPLES.

KING VICTOR EMMANUEL entered Naples on Wednesday, November 7. The popular demonstration was somewhat marred by the rain, but the reception, on the whole, was enthusiastic. We give on pages 522 and 523 two Views, taken at different points, of the triumphal entry, which is thus described by the correspondent of the Daily News:—"I am delighted to say that both King Victor Emmanuel and Garibaldi entered Naples together, for it would have been a grievous thing if, as had been feared, the apostle of Italian liberty, the man of a century, had not been united with the Sovereign on this great occasion. When they left the railway en route for the cathedral there were Victor Emmanuel and Garibaldi on his left hand, and the Pro-Dictators of Sicily and Naples sitting opposite them in the same carriage. The suite followed, and all along the railway to the Duomo there was a perfect ovation. The streets, which are very narrow, were festooned with flowers, and evergreens hung from window to window; pictures, tapestry, banners, and all the other adjuncts of a great fête in Naples were there, but looking as triste and downcast as heavy rains could make them. On arriving at the Duomo or the Cathedral, the piazza of which was beautifully decorated, his Majesty was received by the authorities and conducted to the high altar amidst such a storm of shouts and applause as could only be compared to the storm which was raging outside. 'Viva Victor Emmanuel!' 'Viva Garibaldi!' 'Viva Italia Unita!' Such were the cries which rose, not from one, but from a united body of many thousands, who waved their hats and handkerchiefs and flags as the Royal party advanced to the high altar; and this is the Cathedral Church of San Januarius, the special protector of the Bourbons. There was some attempt to silence the multitude; but you might as well have told the waves of the sea to be silent, and the shouts rose louder and louder. The King did not take his seat on the throne, but stood a little below it, and looked round with a bold, undaunted aspect. Shortly afterward, the ceremony began, and his Majesty knelt at the pris-dieu, whilst Garibaldi, the Pro-Dictators, Farini, and others stood behind him. The Te Deum was sung in magnificent style; and, as soon as over, the Royal party descended from the altar amidst the same long-continued and increasing shouts, and went to visit the treasury and the chapel of San Januarius, where the blood of the saint is kept. As soon as the ceremony was over they came down the aisle, and I had an admirable view of the King and the Liberator face to face, and as a gleam of sun shone out on the Monarch every line was visible. 'Humanity' not fail to strike the most insensible. I looked at Victor Emmanuel's unwrung face and bold glance, and said—he is the Re Galantuomo;' but I looked on Garibaldi, and felt all the moral grandeur of his character."

GUN PRACTICE ON BOARD H.M.S. "BRILLIANT."

REPRESENTATIONS of the system of drill on board her Majesty's training-ships have already appeared in this Journal. The present Engraving shows a scene on board H.M.S. Brilliant—a gun's crew at lever target-practice—in the act of laying the gun for the "bull's-eye" on the target preparatory to its being set in motion. Each volunteer has to fire a certain number of shots at the target during his period of drill, and he undergoes the same instruction as if he were at actual practice at a target afloat. Since our last visit to the Brilliant we are glad to find that the new Naval Reserve is rapidly gaining popularity, and as the advantages of enrolment become better understood by the inexpressible matter so do the number of candidates increase. One good result is already showing itself in the fact of shipowners and masters giving the preference to men of the Reserve when manning their ships.

THE PRESIDENT ELECT OF THE UNITED STATES.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, recently elected by the people of the United States of America to the Presidential chair, is a man whose career in life will furnish one of those richly illustrative chapters of history of which nations may well be proud. That he was born in obscurity; that his baptism was one of poverty; that he was early thrown upon his own resources; that he rapidly stepped from one occupation to another, from the merest manual toil to the highest intellectual pursuits, mastering all with incredible ease; that by sheer force of mind, will, and character, unaided by any great military conflict, or by any revolutionary ferment, he fought his way from one of the lowest positions of life to the very highest to which an American can aspire, reflects glory not merely on the man who has achieved this marvellous success, but upon the country whose social and political institutions made it possible. We do not pretend that President Lincoln owes nothing to opportunity; but America may justly boast that when character and opportunity meet she puts no insuperable barrier in the path of any of her citizens to the topmost place of authority and honour.

It is worthy of note that Mr. Lincoln is a type—a rare one, no doubt—of a considerable class of his countrymen. Self-reliant, observant, keen to discover every opening in the pathway of life, prompt to take advantage of it, believing that his qualifications to enter any sphere constitute a patent right to occupy it, full of energy, of indomitable will, patient, industrious, unswervingly persistent—in all these attributes the new President represents the distinctive character of the best class of his fellow-citizens. There are many cast in the same mould, although, undoubtedly, he is primus inter pares. "Excelsior" is their motto; to toil upwards is the rule of their life. What they become is held to depend upon what they are and what they can do. They look for their resources chiefly within themselves. They know that they must win position—that it will not be made for them. They may often over-estimate their capabilities, mise their footing, mistake their way; but it is of such men that great nations are made. The career of Abraham Lincoln opens up to us a vein of social worth in which lies imbedded the promise of a grand national destiny.

In the rapidity of his ascent from obscurity to greatness the newly-elected President strikingly resembles the country he is called to govern. From the Declaration of Independence to the present day the progress of the United States of America has outrun even the wildest anticipations. The handful of people who, less than a century ago, constituted a neglected and oppressed colony of England have germinated into a great nation—a mighty federation of republics. America owes much of her present eminence to the profound sagacity of her early statesmen. Nothing but a wise combination of State autonomies with federal unity, which their genius devised, and which their successors have faithfully developed, could have given free play to such an endless variety of popular characteristics and, at the same time, welded together into one consistent whole such a multiplicity of different and sometimes conflicting interests. It must be remembered that all the nations of Europe have contributed to swell the population of the United States,—that the States differ widely from each other, not merely in geographical position, climate, and natural productions; but in social structure, industrial interests, and even religious views. To leave to every State its own social and political individuality, and yet to unite the whole in one grand federation, having a common army and navy, a common diplomacy, a common system of customs, a common coinage, and a common Legislature and Executive for federal purposes, was a happy conception, the profound practical wisdom of which has been demonstrated by ample experience.

The one flaw in this arrangement is slavery, a social institution which the statesmen of America did not create, but inherited, and which, they evidently believed, would speedily die out. Unhappily, events have not answered their expectations; and, should a disruption of the Union ensue, we deem unlikely—it will spite of threats—however, we deem unlikely—it will result entirely from the difference of opinion and interests springing out of the existence of this institution.

Upon this difference the late Presidential election almost exclusively turned. Abraham Lincoln is pledged to any recognition of slavery as a normal principle of the Union. He would still leave each State at liberty to deal with it as it may see fit; but he would not have it imposed upon new territories, nor identified in any way with Federal policy. His success as the candidate for the Presidential chair has alarmed and enraged the Slave States, which, defeated for the first time by the aggregate public opinion of the country, loudly threaten secession.

Englishmen would deeply regret to witness a result which appears to most of them so fraught with disaster. Anxious as they may be to see the abolition of slavery, they would grieve, as much for the black as for the white race, to see it effected by a servile war; and to this extremity would probably believe that the dissolution of the Union will fatally conduct. To their view slavery is a blunder, social, economical, political, and religious, and they feel convinced that, if it be not violently interfered with, its very evils in all these aspects will ultimately work out its most effectual cure. It is because they foresee the slavery, isolated from the Union, cut off from all the ameliorating and restraining influences of the free States, and pushed to the furthest limits which the possibilities of a commercial profit will admit, must, at no distant day, lead to a sanguinary collision between the white race and the negroes, which will better the position of neither, but will inflict awful sufferings on both, that Englishmen, for the most part, sincerely and unanimously as they would rejoice over the extinction of slavery, contemplate with a feeling akin to dismay any movement which will break up the Union.

But, apart altogether from the question of slavery, which we regard as accidental, exceptional, and temporary, we deprecate the dissolution of the American Federation on the ground of Mr. Lincoln's election, as being inconceivable damage to those high principles of national policy which we have been accustomed to identify with the progress of mankind. Human beings can only be governed by one of two forces—that of the sword or that of opinion. We hold by the latter. It was to be the glorious destiny of the New World practically to demonstrate to the Old the vast superiority of the latter method over the former, not only in its nature but in its action and results. But governments only exercise necessary powers by the acquiescence of the minority in the expressed will of the majority, at least within the entire range of affairs properly under the cognisance of civil government. Hitherto the Anglo-Saxon family, whether on this or the other side of the Atlantic, have been noted for their ready submission to the public will when once that will has been distinctly and constitutionally ascertained. To this disposition we owe our liberties; and this is the best guarantee we possess for the permanence of our progress. But if every body of men, when fairly defeated, is to hold itself free to refuse acceptance to the will of the majority, government by opinion is at an end, and we are thrown back again upon the old expedient of despotism—namely, government by the sword. It is impossible to exaggerate the evil that, if it recurs, so far as it extends, the natural current of civilisation. It is treason against the prerogatives of the race.

We venture to express our confident hope that the Slave States of America, after the storm of passion raised by Abraham Lincoln's election shall have had time to subside, will hesitate to injure their own position, to destroy an ever-expanding and glorious Federation, and to do outrage to the sentiments of the whole civilised world, by refusing to live under the rule of one of their country. They have been long in the ascendant, and, exacting as their policy has occasionally been, the Free States, certainly not inferior to them in population, in wealth, or in virtue, have invariably submitted to the public decision. It is now the turn of the Slave States to accept the will of the majority. The people of the United States have deliberately chosen to place Mr. Lincoln in the Presidential chair. In so deciding they have but exercised an undoubted political right. They have not gone with nothing beyond sphere—the new President will meddle with nothing beyond it. With a hostile Senate and House of Representatives—with the constitutional right of every State over its own internal policy and institutions secured intact, and with the network of laws and legal decisions which Congress and the Supreme Court of Justice have erected round about the "peculiar domestic institution," it is impossible to discern in the election of a Republican President a single principle for the secession of the Slave States from the Union. Such an act, owing to such a cause, will be regarded by the rest of the world as a monstrous exhibition of selfish passion—an enlightened and self-interest can regard as justifiable. But, we believe, no such deplorable triumph will be given to the foes of human progress. The Southern States will recover their loyalty, the Union will still be maintained, and Abraham Lincoln, as President, will afford to all, Slave States as well as Free, the advantages of a dignified, strong, and impartial Federal Government.

The African Aid Society has addressed a letter to the King of Dahomey urging him to abandon the slave trade, and to engage instead in the cultivation of cotton. The letter endeavours to demonstrate to the King's satisfaction that he will find the cotton trade more profitable than the unjust slave trade.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

An article in the Moniteur of Monday notices, with much satisfaction, the warm reception of the Empress Eugénie in England and Scotland, and expresses its opinion that this manifestation of sympathy on the part of the British nation must draw closer the ties which bind together the two nations.

The Emperor has returned to Paris from Compiègne with the Prince Imperial, and drove up and down the ride in the Bois on Saturday last for nearly two hours in his carriage, seemingly in excellent health, and received marked evidences of increased popularity on every side.

Last Saturday's Moniteur published the supplementary convention between France and England, signed on the 16th of November, the general usage of which has been already published.

Marshal Vaillant has had conferred upon him the title of Minister of the Emperor's Household.

The Count de Persigny arrived on Tuesday in Paris, and immediately took up his residence at the hotel of the Minister of the Interior. The Journal officiel publishes the decree of M. Haussmann, Prefect of the Department of the Seine, on the budget of the city of Paris. He discusses the question of the loan, which he considers to be unnecessary against its abolition.

M. Barochez, President of the Council of State, having the rank of a Minister, has retired from public office without pension.

UNITED STATES.

The crisis in the Southern States continues, and it is declared that South Carolina will certainly secede from the Union. Some accounts, however, maintain that Georgia and other States will not afford her the support which the Charleston agitators expect; and that anti-secession opinions are entertained and manifested by a majority of the people of Georgia. In many counties of Virginia "mass" meetings have been held in favour of union, though "warlike preparations" are said to be making in the State. Influential newspapers-one in Florida in the South and all suspected persons will be ordered by them to quit the country.

Whatever other result be consequent upon the present agitation, it has been unfavourable to a financial panic. In the Southern States business is said to be almost suspended; and bills on England are offered at a most unprecedented low rate. But the fall in the price of shares and stocks have fallen very heavily, and the banks are conducting their affairs with caution. They have promptly agreed to purchase bills on England to the amount of 2,500,000 dollars for the purpose of relieving the market for exchanges.

A grand Republican jubilee was held at Mr. Lincoln's residence on the 20th ult, of which some particulars are given in our Paris letter.

There is a rumour that dissensions prevail in President Buchanan's Cabinet, the President and a majority holding that they are bound to repress any violence in South Carolina, and the remainder, chiefly the Southern members, maintaining that any State is entitled to secede from the Union if it should think fit.

Captain Montgomery, one of the Free-soil heroes of Kansas, has entered the State of Missouri with a body of 600 men for the purpose of running off slaves.

Advices from San Francisco to the evening of the 8th ult. have been received. The political intelligence is important. The state of California had gone Republican in the Presidential election, Lincoln having received a plurality of 2000 votes.

Mr. Lindsay, M.P., who has returned home, spent the week previous to his departure in Washington, conferring with the American Government on the subject of removing the difficulty in the way of a settlement of the important question now pending between England and the United States. Mr. Lindsay, previous to leaving New York in the Persia, made a parting address before the executive committee of the Chamber of Commerce, expressing in the most hearty terms the result of his observations in the United States and Canada, as connected with the subject of his mission. He said he had been so much struck by the necessity of a modification of international maritime law between Great Britain and the United States, that he felt encouraged to return home very pleased with the results of his mission thus far, and, after relating the substance of his conversations with the President and Secretary of State, with the changes thereof in feeling and appropriate terms; the committee, in turn, passed a complimentary resolution.

CANADA.

A correspondent of the Canadian News writes as follows respecting the reviving prosperity of Canada, which, he says, is observable on every hand: "The towns, instead of being deserted, as in the case of most of the country's requirements; and farming lands, which a short time ago were either unsaleable altogether or could be had only at a low price, now bring as much, I verily believe, when sold for cash, as they ever would have brought in the flush times before the crisis of 1857. The difference is, that those up-country people who have cash in hand now sell are purchased by parties who intend at once to enter upon them with the view to their immediate improvement. The present demand for farming land is a real and not a fictitious one. In this respect the country is in a healthy position, such as it has not been for years. Land held by private individuals can still be bought for reasonable prices, though the business is said to be dull. As a proof of this I may mention that the fact of a farm of wild land having been sold a few days ago, in Adelaide, fifty miles north of this city, for forty dollars an acre."

The Canadian Government has appointed three Commissioners to make an inquiry into the affairs of the Grand Trunk Railway.

The Hon. John A. Macdonald, the Upper Canada Premier, was entertained at a banquet at Brantford last week, and in a long speech on the "explanations" on the subject of the anti-Orange policy adopted by the Government during the visit of the Prince of Wales.

The Rev. J. G. P. Twining, Chaplain to the Forces in Nova Scotia, is dead. He was formerly Rector of Bishop's College, Lennoxville, Canada.

Robert Gillespie, Esq., of London, England, partner in the firm of Gillespie, Moffat, and Co., of Montreal, has presented to the new English Cathedral in that city a splendid font, richly carved in stone.

The Rev. Dr. Leitch, who lately arrived from Scotland, has been inaugurated as Principal of Queen's College, Kingston. This institution belongs to the Presbyterian body in connexion with the Established Church of Scotland.

Some idea may be formed of the immense consumption of tobacco in France from an advertisement that the Minister of Finance will, on the 15th of January, receive tenders for supplies for the year 1861 of 30,000 tonneaux (6000 tons) of foreign tobacco in leaf, exclusively for the imperial manufactories in Belgium, Spain, the Netherlands, Germany, and Italy, comprising being Virginian, 15 Kentucky, and 14 Maryland tobacco.

COUNT PERSIGNY.—The Pays records the following tribute of praise to Count Persigny for the important services he has rendered during his sojourn in London:—"The representative of the Emperor Napoleon, for the last seven years, has won our sympathy," has been the one idea of his diplomatic life to maintain the most cordial relations with the Government of Italy, by consistently and perseveringly rejecting the doctrine of nonintervention, which has been the ruin for the second time of unfortunate Italy, and France by perpetually insisting on the necessity of it."

LOCUSTS.—The Société Entomologique of Paris has received a curious account of the ravages of locusts which occurred in Poland last summer. They were in such numbers that, according to an official statement sent in to the Government at Warsaw, they formed a column full of their wriggling bodies two miles in length, and of a breadth sufficient to cover the whole surface of the ground. Not a single tree was left standing, and the locusts were collected in six days. The Austrian Government having imposed an export duty of 10 florins per waggon load, the influence of one thirtieth in case of its not producing a horse of these insects, the poor people, not knowing what to do with so large a quantity, applied to the Russian Poland to satisfy the demand of their Government.

A VISIT TO THE ISLE OF MAN.—Mr. Johnson.—Mr. E. B. De Fonblanque, who has been a long succession of visits paid by Mr. Alcock (the British Envoy in Japan), himself and the other English gentlemen at that place. The number of foreigners in Yedo is about 1000, of whom 17,000 are Japanese. The journey of the Ambassadors to Yedo was a kind of triumphal progress everywhere with courtesy and respect. The country is described as beautiful and well cultivated, and the people not unhappy, though poor, and of a peaceful purity. We quote some passages with regard to the ceremony of the mountain:—"At first we had only the Dutch flag on the mainmast, as we could not procure here and there, and on reaching the summit, after four hours' toil, the tribe of water-spirits came on board from into a compartment in the after-part of the junks in a most modest, unpretending, little boat, adorned with a few pots of rice and some coarsely-made cakes, which they presented as their offerings upon the altar, and in return have their garments stamped with strange figures and devices as token of their having accomplished the pilgrimage. Great virtue is attached to these stamps, particularly for the cure of rheumatic pains, and the priests are always ready with a fresh pot of pigment and the extent of the fee. I invested an entire unbroken (tr. ed.), and received in return all the gold pieces in the possession of the deceptive of all the devils too, of Fuji-san. Having raised the standard of Admiralty on the main, and the Union Jack at the fore, and the standard of the Ambassador at the fore, which was the proper position of honour, his Excellency setting the example by discharging the five barrels of his revolver into the air, the rest following his example, and the salute has been fired. We then gave three cheers, sang 'God Save the Queen,' and finished the day with a dinner on board the Ambassador's steamer, assembled in the crown of Fuji-yama, to the utter amazement of the Japanese, who had never before seen such startling religious ceremonies. The view from the mountain is between two and three miles in circumference, and about 600 yards in depth, and it resulted from observations made by Mr. Robertson that the highest point is something more than 14,000 feet above the sea. The Japanese have generally allowed 17,000. There has been no eruption for three centuries. We were fortunate enough to have a fine, clear, sunny day for the ascent, and, as we looked below and around us, there lay the fair land of Japan, like a highly-coloured map, the police of its headlands jutting sharply into the blue sea, sandy spots here and there standing out in strong across the full length of the mountain, and we could perceive, as it were, a winding through green valleys, gradually increasing in size till they emptied themselves into the sea. The scenery here is so magnificent that it is not surprising that no one would have ventured to climb the mountain, and that the Japanese have a belief that Fuji-yama."

The following telegrams were received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday)

FRANCE.—Paris, Tuesday.—M. Fould, President of one of the Chambers of the Imperial Court of Paris, has been assassinated.

THE TWO SICILIES.—Paris, Dec. 4.—The Patrie says:—"It is expected that a force of 150,000 men will be made in Southern Italy." The same paper reports that, on account of the discussion existing between the inhabitants of Caserta and the English Legion, the latter will be removed. The Patrie adds:—"The Hungarian Legion is being actively organised."

Paris, Dec. 5.—The Teatro Nuovo was closed by the authorities yesterday evening. It was, however, reopened and illuminated by the people, who sang Garibaldian songs. The crowd afterwards dispersed without disorder. Yesterday a reactionary movement took place at Penna, in the Abruzzi, but was suppressed by the troops and the National Guards.

THE PAPAL STATES.—Paris, Thursday.—Messrs. Rothschild have given notice that from this date they will pay the coupons of the Roman loan at the rate of 5 francs 60 centimes. The council had previously announced that the Pontifical Government had not put them in a position to pay the dividend on the Roman loan.]

TURKEY.—Constantinople, Dec. 1.—The French Ambassador continues to urge the extension of the French occupation of Syria. Fuad has had no effect on being got up by the French agitators among the Christians of Damascus and Beyrout. The Greek and Armenian Patriarchs have been deposed by the Turkish Government. Several Greek newspapers have been forbidden. The Asoff ports are closed by ice.

Dec. 4.—Vessels laden with ammunition have been seized on the Danube. The last two sections of the loan, raised by a Finance Committee, has been dispatched to Paris for M. Mirès.

The Greek Chambers were dissolved by King Otho on Wednesday, and a proclamation issued to the people declaring that peace still prevails in Athens.

The Berlin Gazette of the 30th ult. states that Professor Dahlmann had on the previous day an attack of apoplexy, but hopes were entertained of his recovery from the present illness.

It is stated that the Lords of the Admiralty have resolved not to receive in future memorials from naval officers containing more than one signature.

MONTENEGRO.—Somewhat threatening news reaches us from Montenegro. The Vladika has addressed his Grands, and informed them that Austria and Turkey are about to make war against the Turks; and a rumour was floating at Cattaro that Austria had entered Montenegro, and had occupied Cetinje. Prince Danilo is a candidate for the cession of Zodrige, in the district of Grahova, to the latter.

THE BALTIC.—Admiralty Office.—Advices from Vigo state that the Colossus had arrived there on the 27th ult. to take in coal, after a very long passage from the Baltic. The Colossus and the Gorgon were in company, and the Colossus encountered a terrific gale with a very heavy sea. Both ships sustained damage. The Gorgon has proceeded to Lisbon, and the Colossus, with the Empress on board, kept her course for Madeira, while the Odin-ter, the Ardent, and the Cruiser proceeded to Gibraltar. The Odin has received a good deal of damage, but would be ready to start for Madeira on the 7th inst.

HESSE CASSEL.—The Committee of the Second Chamber appointed to discuss the Budget has come to a unanimous decision, and presented to the Chamber the following proposals to the Chamber:—1. That the meeting of the Chambers shall be annual. 2. That the Budget shall be voted for two years, and cannot, therefore, transact any public business. 3. That the Government shall not levy any taxes which have not been voted by the wishes of the country; and that the Elector should be requested to establish the law of the press which was promised in the year 1848. 4. That the law of 1850 had been recognised as valid. Should any changes be found necessary they cannot be made except by the Chambers, except in representative assembly, to be convoked on the basis of the electoral law of 1849.

THE DANUBIAN PRINCIPALITIES.—Intelligence from the Principalities states that the Hospodar has appointed a successor to the throne, in which treaty of the principal merchants of the town had been killed by the natives. The Turkish Consul had been to Galatz, however, to demand satisfaction. Cognizance of the murder of the Greek merchants, and of the murder of the Prefect of the town, had been taken by the Government, and the guilty parties would be made to answer for their deeds. Jassy Prince Couza had caused the assassination of the Prefect of Police, who had been murdered by the populace, to be interred, where he is considered a martyr. UNDER THE WALLS OF PEKIN.—The following letter in the Times, which is interesting from the circumstance that it supplies an account of the action of the 18th ult. not contained in the official despatch, is from Captain Carrington, of the Marine battalion now serving in China. This battalion was formed out of the Royal Marine Light Infantry. The writer received a lingual ball, which passed transversely through the lower lip, and, notwithstanding the severity of the wound, he was able to join the remnant of the battalion, he with great gallantry kept his place with the stormers. He was carried from the field on a litter. The following extracts from his letter to his friends will be found interesting in the front:—"Under the walls of Pekin, Sept. 22.—We have encountered immense fatigue, and fears are entertained of a general attack, which would be a most serious affair for us. CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

The reopening of the Church of the Holy Trinity at Watermouth, Gwernesk, took place on Tuesday week.

The Rev. Dr. Vaughan, of Doncaster, the newly-elected Chancellor and Canon, read himself in at York Cathedral on Sunday, after which he preached a sermon.

Arrangements are in progress for the erection of an additional transept to the North Wales, the seat of which will probably be at Caernarvon.

A new church (dedicated to St. John) was consecrated by the Archbishop of York, in the populous mining districts between Sheffield and Barnsley, on Chapeltown, on Thursday.

The parish church of Rockfield, Monmouthshire, having been rebuilt and fitted with appropriate furniture by the exertions of the Vicar, the Rev. Ellis Evans, was consecrated by the Bishop of Llandaff and reopened on Wednesday week.

Last Saturday the Bishop of Sierra Leone sailed for his diocese in the Bishop, from Liverpool. He is to stop at Madeira and hold a confirmation and consecrate a burial-ground by commission from the Bishop of London.

A beautiful church has been raised to the memory of George Herbert, in the parish of Bemerton, within one mile of Salisbury. It is arranged that the ceremony of consecration shall take place on the 11th, the Bishop of Oxford officiating. A second service will take place in the afternoon, at which the Bishop of Salisbury will preach.

The parish church of Cheltenham was extended meeting at the Assembly-street Parochial Schools, Clerkenwell, on Wednesday evening, on the subject of church extension, in a lengthened and eloquent speech. The meeting was held upon the occasion of the site for a new church in Clerkenwell having been granted by the Charterhouse Corporation. The chairman stated that, out of a population of 29,000 souls, church accommodation at present existed only for 3000 souls.

The Bishop of Oxford on Thursday consecrated Stantonbury Church, which has been erected under the auspices of the clergymen and directors of the London and North-Western Railway, within a mile of the Wolverton station, and has formed the nucleus of the ecclesiastical movement to enable the shareholders to attend the ceremony. The cost of the church, so far as it is now completed, has been £4000. Of this there has been contributed by shareholders of the London and North-Western Company about £2000; and contributions from the directors and other sources, £400. To complete the erection of the spire and upper part of the tower, it is estimated that £600 more will be required.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—Rectories: The Rev. G. L. Barkworth to Wallington, Norfolk. The Rev. Godfrey Clerke to Fenstanton, Hunts. The Rev. Thomas Dewdney; Rev. F. Shipton, to Bashton, Co. Flint. The Rev. Thomas Hill, M.A. Under to Chelmarsh, Salop. The Rev. Samuel Burke, and to be a Surrogate: Rev. C. H. Leacroft to Debtside. Chaplaincy: The Rev. T. Lewis, Vicar of Llanwenog, appointed by the Lord Chancellor to Mynthorn, Bassa: Rev. C. J. Slatere to North Pickenham, near Swaffham, Norfolk; Rev. W. C. Lake, Vicar of Lanlas, Lancashire; Rev. E. B. De Robiano to Framington, North Devon. The Rev. L. J. Stephens has been appointed to the chaplaincy of Lincoln's Inn, vice Hildyard, C.J. Lately Canon of Lenbury, Northumberland.—Guardian.

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE.—Oxford: Mr. W. S. Church, B.A., of University College, has been elected to the Lee's Readership in Anatomy, vacant by the resignation of Mr. G. Rolleston. Mr. Johnson, of Pembroke College, has been elected to the Radcliffe Travelling Fellowship, which has been for the last two years held by Mr. Bywater, of Exeter College, and has been founded for the purpose of enabling a graduate to travel for a year in the Turkish Empire, Greece, Italy, and Germany. The Radcliffe Travelling Fellowship is of the value of £400, to be paid by quarterly instalments, and is tenable for three years. Mr. Bywater has been appointed to the Lee's Readership in Classical Literature, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Hill Grove, B.A., Commoner of Balliol College, has been elected Fellow of the same, and Mr. Grenfell, Scholar of the same, has been elected Scholar in the Exeter Examination, 1859.—There will be an election at Lincoln College on the 17th inst. to two open exhibitions of the value of £70 and two of £40 a year each; also to a Blake Exhibition of about £70 a year. On the 18th inst. there will be an election to exhibitions taken this summer the provisions of the statute for the appointment of Boards of Studies, which was sanctioned by the Queen in Council on the 29th ult., have been issued. The statute regulates the constitution of the Boards, which the following is the substance:—That there be twelve of the following Boards, viz., Theology, legal, medical, mathematical, classical, moral sciences, natural sciences, and Oriental. Each of those boards to consist of not more than seven nor less than three of the professors of the respective sciences, and, when it appears to them advisable, by the Vice-Chancellor, with the consent of the Board, be attached to the University. Power to confirm these resolutions of the Council until he has laid them before Convocation, as revised by the Rev. Henry Arthur Morgan, M.A., of Jesus College, has been elected Craven Scholar.—Cambridge: The Rev. Joseph Power, M.A., Fellow of Queens', has been appointed to the Professorship of Anatomy, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Paget, who has now played from a seat on the same level. Beneath the dome as organ is being erected by Messrs. Gray and Davison, and the front part of the beautiful which are to be resumed towards the end of January. The stonemasons have already begun to work at the restoration of the chancel. A choral service was performed on Sunday, and an anthem appropriate to Advent Sunday, composed by Mr. Gauntlett, was sung. The preacher was the Rev. Canon Champneys.—The clergymen selected to preach on the following Sunday afternoon are the Rev. Dr. Jeune, Master of Pembroke; the Rev. C. Perse, M.A., of Worcester College, Oxford, Vicar of Ruislip, Middlesex; Rev. Dr. Pusey, Canon of Christ Church, Regius Professor of Hebrew, Oxford, Incumbent of St. John's Church, Paddington; December 23, the Rev. W. A. Scarnes, M.A., Vicar of St. Mary's, Nottingham; Vicar of St. Mary's, Nottingham; December 30, the Rev. Dr. J. A. Heney, of St. John's College, Oxford, Head Master of Marlborough College; January 6, the Rev. Dr. Goulburn, Dean of Norwich, Dean of St. Paul's will preach on the morning of Christmas Day, and the Rev. Canon Champneys in the afternoon.

THE MISSION TO BRITISH COLUMBIA.—The first anniversary meeting of the establishment of the British Columbia Mission (founded by Miss Burdett Coutts) was held at the Mansion House on Wednesday week. Owing to the peculiar circumstances which led to the formation of that mission going out to the Rev. R. J. Lundy, as the first missionary, he, therefore, very unanimously attended. The Lord Mayor occupied the chair. The report of the Bishop of Columbia stated that the Bishop of Oxford's establishment appointments was of a most encouraging character—English-Church principles were being established. The Bishop of Columbia had participated in the advantages of missionary labour. The Bishop of London and Archbishop of Canterbury addressed the meeting. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Mr. Chichester Fortescue, M.P., Secretary for the Colonies, observed that the mission filled an important link in the undertaking, and urged strongly the claims which the mission had upon the meeting, as the work was entirely dependent upon the voluntary principle. That principle, we may add, has proved to be of immense importance in the early days of this and other missions. A special fund was made of the discouragement which the Bishop appears to have met with in the first instance, and which was owing to the local institutions immediately resulting from the meeting at the Mansion House amounted to £1000.

DESTRUCTION OF TWO SHIPS BY FIRE.—The intelligence of the total loss of the ship Clyde, belonging to Glasgow, homeward bound from Australia for that port, with a cargo of wool, and the consequent relief which was made known on Saturday at Lloyd's underwriters' room. The ship appears to have been abandoned on the 18th ult. in consequence of a fire which broke out from the cargo on the 15th, and which could not be subdued. The crew were picked up by a series of fortunate circumstances, and were carried away, and speaking a dangerous leak through her heavily straining. In this state, with the pumps constantly at work, she kept afloat for several days, when the American ship Sea Queen, Captain Nute master, from China, hove to and took off the crew, and brought them down to the port of the crew of the Clyde, when they took on board, and in order to prevent the wreck causing injury by collision, to other ships, she was set on fire. The Sea Queen then left the burning ship and proceeded to St. Helena, where the crew of the Clyde were safely landed. The Clyde and her cargo were insured.—The ship British Merchant, a London Australian trader, nearly 1000 tons register, was totally destroyed by fire on Sunday, the 16th of September, while loading for London at Sydney. Captain Dutton was on board at the time, with his wife, and no sooner was the outbreak of the fire than he had great difficulty in escaping from the ship. The cause of the fire was a mystery; it originated in the main hold, and was beyond control. The vessel was a fine remarkable character viewed every except thirty-five tons of cocoa-oil, bales and tallow forming the bulk of the cargo. But a portion only of the ship and cargo is said to be insured.

Relics of the Past.

PORTRAITS OF QUEEN ANNE AND PRINCE GEORGE OF DENMARK COMPOSED ENTIRELY OF MINUTE WRITING.

THE fancy for minute writing in a capriccio of considerable antiquity. Callicrates is related to have written an elegant distich on a sesamum-seed; Junius speaks of an individual who wrote the Apostles' Creed and the beginning of St. John's Gospel within the limits of a farthing. In later times we have of performances in this line by Peter Bales, who, in 1575, contrived to inscribe the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, and two short Latin prayers—not forgetting his name, the month, the day of the month, the year of our Lord and of the reign of the Queen—all in the compass of a silver penny, inclosed in a ring and border of gold, and covered with crystal; "the whole so accurately wrought as to be perfectly legible." An example of the same description, but of more recent date, will be found in the British Museum (Add. MSS. 4828). It was written by one William Isaac Blanchard, in 1768, "with a good gull pen," and contains the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments—in all 1900 letters—within a space not larger than a silver penny. In the same collection, also, may be seen the unique MS., supposed to be of the tenth century, containing Cicero's translation of the astronomical poem of Aratus, with figures of the constellations, in the outlines of which are written their descriptions; the marvellous folio by Le Clabart, "Epreuves des Caractères;" the marvellous folio by Le Clabart, "Epreuves des Caractères;" and the copies of "Les Quatrains de Guy de Faur;" though these hardly come within the category of microscopic writing. There, too, we find some examples of Matthew Buckinger's achievements with the pen, which, for remarkable neither for extreme beauty nor minuteness, are so curious in connection with the writer's physical deficiencies as to deserve a word or two in passing. This unfortunate, it as to deserve a word or two in passing. This unfortunate, it appears, was born without limbs, and came to London as an exhibition in the early part of the last century. One specimen exhibition in the early part of the last century. One specimen of the poor fellow's aptitude and industry, now before us, is the card on which he sets forth his exploits. This is executed with considerable skill. It is embellished with the Royal arms and a pretty framelike border, and might easily be mistaken for a modaly-engraved affiche of that period. After taken for a modaly-engraved affiche of that period. After announcing that the performances are "by authority," it proceeds to inscribe them, as follows:—

"Lately arriv'd, and to be seen at the Globe and the Duke of Marlborough's H [sic in original] in Fleet-Street. A German born without Hands, Feet, or Thighs (that never was in this Kingdom before), who does such miraculous Actions as in the case

Mosambi, having cleared for Hong-Kong. Her slave-deck is seven feet high, and, although there were 846 slaves on board, she was not at all crowded in comparison with other vessels so employed. In addition, she carried a crew of 40 in all, including a captain, mates, 1604, and a doctor. Her dimensions are—length, 154 feet 8 inches; breadth, 34 feet 4 inches; depth, 16 feet 6 inches. She was intended originally as a New York and Rio packet.

THE LATE DR. CROLY.

THE Rev. George Croly, LL.D., an eminent poet, writer, and divine (whose Portrait we engrave), was the son of a physician practising in Dublin, and was born in that city in August, 1780. He entered at Trinity College, Dublin, at the age of fourteen, and proceeded B.A. and M.A. in the ordinary course. He was ordained by O'Byrne Bishop of Meath, and immediately entered on a small curacy in Ireland, but soon proceeded to London, where he obtained the situation of dramatic critic on the New Times. He subsequently was a contributor to the Britannia, Standard, and Herald newspapers. He was at one time editor of the Universal Review, and was a frequent writer in Blackwood's and other magazines. In Blackwood's Magazine appeared his talented and remarkable tale of "Colonna the Painter," which made a sensation, and led to the production of his first separate and very able poem, entitled "Paris in 1815." His subsequent productions were "Salathiel," "Marston," "Tales of the Great St. Bernard," "The Three Cycles of Revelation," a "Treatise on Divine Providence," "Life of Burke," "Life of George IV.," essays on Pitt and Napoleon I., and the biography of Curran. To these may be added innumerable other publications, especially "Catiline," a tragedy of great power; and "Pride Shall Have a Fall," a comedy, which, although successful at the time, has failed to keep the stage. Among all the most noteworthy are his famous "Salathiel the Immortal," and his excellent political "Life of Edmund Burke." In 1835 he was appointed by the Lord Chancellor to the rectory of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, and in that parish at one time the part he took in contest with the late Alderman Gibbs was a subject of much public attention. In 1847 Dr. Croly was appointed Afternoon Preacher at the Foundling Hospital. As a pulpit orator Dr. Croly displayed very high powers, and was extremely popular. Dr. Croly, in fine, earned a solid and wide-spread reputation not only as an essayist, biographer, and poet, but as a clergyman of active industry and fervid eloquence. The rev. doctor married, in 1819, Miss Margaret Eliza Begbie, and by her (who died on the 25th of January, 1851) had issue five sons and a daughter. His eldest son, a gallant young officer, was cut short in a career of much promise on the 25th of December, 1845, when he was killed in the Sutlej campaign. The lamented death of Dr. Croly occurred in a sudden manner on the 24th ult. He was at the time walking in Holborn, when he fell down and shortly afterwards expired, the cause being disease of the heart.

On Saturday last the remains of the late Dr. Croly were consigned to the grave in the Church of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, of which the rev. gentleman had been Rector for upwards of a quarter of a century. It is the intention of the parishioners to erect a marble bust of the late deceased gentleman on the south side of the church. It was presented to him a few years since, and he bequeathed it to the parish for the purpose mentioned.

THE HAMPTON PARK COURSING MEETING.

HAMPTON COURT is a spot which may be said to have a triple wreath of charms in visitors' eyes. The Londoner with his trim basket of provisions on one arm, and the married or betrothed object of his affections on the other, marches thither from the terminus, with a truly British determination to enjoy his day out, and sleeps or breathes his vows beneath the chestnut shade, when he has feasted to the full or is tired of walking through its maze, its gardens, its terraces, and its picture-galleries. The lover of blood stock slips down quietly once a year in the leafy month of June to have a peep at the Royal and Greville yearlings. Orlando (late Sandwich) is the hero of that day, and year after year do visitors return with the well-founded belief that for quality and beauty there is hardly such horse in the world. Marvellous prices have been given when the Four-in-hand Club and the first owners and trainers in England muster round Mr. Tattersall in those paddocks and on the green. It was here that there used to be such glorious rivalry between the Johns of Whitewall and Dunsbury. Here, too, it was the yearling filly Adriata headed the poll at 1100 gs., and that a noble Earl gave 3700 gs. for seven with as much nonchalance as if he had only bought a few pairs of gloves. Still he found a Walloon and a Dephantas among them, as buyers in other years had a Yellow Jack, an Imprimeur, and a Eurydice.

The park too, through which the four-in-hands wend their shady way back to town on those anniversaries, has its delights for the lovers of the leash, and many a merry party has met at the Greyhound each evening to discuss the chequered fortunes of the day. In fact, the Hampton Meeting is the great rendezvous for Cockney coursers, who must, however, have been attached to the club for three months before their entries can be taken. This year the coursing at the Chambers Meeting was above the average on the first day, and extremely good on the second; but the hares are unusually scarce, and it will be difficult to find enough of them to last through the season. The grass, too, is unusually long, which, coupled with the wet season, has caused them to run rather weak.

The subject of our Engraving, which is from a sketch by Mr. Elstob Marshall, represents deciding the course for the Victoria Stakes between Mr. Purser's Pride of the Village, by Black Cloud, and Mr. Allison's Afternoon, by Judge. The first time they were slipped neither of them got sighted, but Afternoon caught a view at last, and had a bugish single-handed course, which materially interfered with her chance. At the next attempt Pride of the Village was last out of the slips, but soon passed her opponent, and won a nice trial on all points. Mr. Warwick is always the judge, and Mr. Mills has just been appointed slipper. He has, therefore, still to acquire his knowledge of the ground, for, as our greatest greyhound-writer, "Scrutineer," observes, "Nowhere is experience more wanted than at Hampton Court, as a straight slip is most difficult to get."

FAREWELL VISIT OF GARIBALDI TO ADMIRAL MUNDY.

THE Liberator of the Two Sicilies left Naples for his island home, Caprera, on the morning of the 9th ult., never grander than in this last act of self-abnegation. Although Garibaldi embarked before daybreak, and everything had been done to avoid demonstration, numbers of people were there to see him depart. Garibaldi was greatly moved when he took leave of his friends. The Daily News' correspondent thus describes Garibaldi's departure:—"For three days the Washington had been lying off with the baggage of Garibaldi on board, though many,

THE COURT.

The Queen has received a succession of distinguished company at Windsor Castle during the past week. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales came from Oxford University on Saturday, and, after passing Sunday with his illustrious parents, returned to his studies early on Monday. In the afternoon of the latter day Count Persigny had an audience of her Majesty to present his letter of recall, and Count De Flahaut had an audience to deliver his credentials as Ambassador from the Emperor of the French.

The Empress of the French arrived with the Queen on Tuesday. Her Imperial Majesty arrived by a special train on the Great Western Railway at a quarter past one o'clock, at the Windsor station, where the Prince Consort was waiting, attended by Lord Charles Fitzroy and Major De Post, to accompany the Empress from the station to the castle in one of the royal carriages. On the castle the Queen, with Princess Alice and Prince Alfred, attended by the Ladies and Gentlemen in waiting, received her Majesty on the steps of the principal entrance. The Imperial Majesty took the arm of the Duke of Cambridge, Prince Louis of Hesse, Earl Granville, and Count Persigny followed. The Princesses Louise, Marie Sophie, and Mathilde, Prince de Metternich, Madame de Sancy, the Marquis Lagrange, and Colonel Ponsonby remained in waiting with the Queen. The Empress wore a dress of black silk. Princess of Leiningen arrived from Frogmore about half-past two o'clock. At a little after three the Empress took leave of the Queen and Royal family, and returned to London. His Royal Highness the Prince Consort accompanied the Empress to the railway station on her departure.

Whilst the Empress was in Scotland she visited Abbotsford, and her Majesty took great interest in the relics of Sir Walter Scott, which are carefully preserved and consecrated by his genius. We give on the next page an illustration of the Empress with her suite in the study at Abbotsford. The library is the home of all the sagaciously, and is cozy but by fitty. The collection of books in thirteen thousand or so, 900 volumes, many of them rare and curious, and valuable. From this room there is a communication with the study, which is, perhaps, the most interesting room in the establishment, as it is filled with the author's mementoes with the great author. It contains a small writing-table, a plain mahogany desk, and a high stool, on which Scott used to sit when writing. A few books, chiefly for reference; and a collection of a gallery of trophies, such as three rifles, while a single window admits light to the apartment. Attached to it is a closet containing a rifle, pistols, and other weapons, which belonged to Sir Walter as a yeoman, and as a member of the Celtic Society; the blue-and-red and Border uniform which he wore; and the old armory in his strolls through his woods; and the dark trousers, striped with blue cloth, and white belt, which he wore shortly before his death.

In the case of Newall v. Elliott, Vice-Chancellor Wood on Wednesday granted an injunction restraining the defendant from using an apparatus for paying out telegraphic cables, the apparatus being held to be an infringement of the plaintiff's patent.

FRANCIS BACON.—In this bright passage of England's life, lying between the dark turbulence of the feudal centuries and the generations of faithful struggle that succeeded, Bacon stands alone, the great herald and leader of the new conquerors. The statement and lawyers with whom he acted for centuries had been the chief depositaries of learning. Even through the mists of history is discernible nebulous. Raleigh, indeed, still fires the blood, and Essex draws tears; but Bacon is the great man of the age. He only knows it. His own contemporaries see not very clear to our imaginations, beautiful in face and form, by turns grave and gay, and with a mind fitted for the highest flights of poetry and philosophy, the wisest and gardens of Grey's inn, where he nurses his dark brother Anthony, writes letters minutely with plans dictated to his brother, and meditates his great work "good Christian and maid of God," staves off pestering duns, and through the bland fancy of which muses on those immortal essays which are unsurpassed in his writings—at Court threading the maze of quibbles, richly flash, gracious, stately, timid, and courageous, but never losing sight of the great and single definite fatherless to his sovereign—and yet the only one of all the glittering band who dares to tell her the truth when it is unpalatable—in the House of Commons the greatest orator of his or any other day, too great to serve a party, although he be the ablest of all who have adorned the art of faction, taking a position not between but above the cliques, by turns cherishing and chastising each, and yet always commanding the confidence of the classes, consolidating the land, at all times looking only to the permanent interests of his country.—From "People of the Past."

RULES FOR READING.—Read much, but not many works. For what purpose you wish intent, or to what end you are to be the art of reading, but we read to the end that we may think. Reading is valuable only as it may apply to the mind—nourishment to the digestive organs. As it is not the largest quantity of any kind of food taken into the stomach that nourishes the body best, but only a proper quantity of the best of its kind, digested; so it is not the greatest complement of any kind of information that may be crammed into the mind, but such a quantity of such a kind as determines the intellect to most vigorous energy. The only profitable kind of reading is that in which we are compelled to think for ourselves; and think intensely; whereas that reading which serves only to dissipate and divert our thoughts is either positively hurtful, or useful only as a means of relaxation from more severe exertion. But the amount of vigorous thinking is usually in the inverse ratio of multitudinous reading. Multitudinous reading is agreeable; but it is weak, and tends to make us destructive to the mental or brain-drinking to the bodily health.—"Gay Sage," says Hector, "a happy age," and he adds, "It would have been better, to my estate, for the world and for science, if, instead of the multitude of books which now overlay us, we possessed but a few works good and strong, and which, also, would be therefore more diligently and prudently studied."—Sir William Hamilton.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

On Wednesday the men Poole, Cooke, Chapman, Bellingham, and Vestris, connected with the bankruptcy of Poole and Bryce, of Northampton, were again placed at the bar of the Guildhall Police Court, before Sir D. W. Carden, to answer charges of wilful and corrupt perjury in their examinations in the Court of Bankruptcy. His worship expressed his intention of sending Vestris for trial, and committed all for trial at the next Central Criminal Court.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS IN LONDON.—During the births of 870 boys and 828 girls—in all 1698 children—were registered in London. In the corresponding weeks of the years 1850-59 the average number was 1618. The weekly return issued by the Registrar-General states that the mortality of London has continued to increase for the last five weeks, and that the deaths last ended last Saturday the deaths were 1275. The average number of deaths registered in the same week in the corresponding weeks of the last ten years 1850-59, and for the purpose of comparison, corrected for increase of population, is 1076. The deaths in the week ending the 24th ult. in the county of Middlesex are recorded the weekly list, the deaths in the present return are still less by 1 than the number in the preceding week, and the mortality still prevailed.

EDINBURGH.—Exeter Hall has been taken for Sunday-evening preaching by the Revivalists. Messrs. Reginald Radcliffe, Richard Weaver, and Henry Varley, the latter a butcher's boy, have been preaching when, according to reports in the morning papers, the hall was densely crowded. The meetings commenced on Sunday last, and on Monday Mr. Radcliffe read part of Mark vi., and then gave account of the work in which he and Mr. Weaver had been engaged in Edinburgh. He said that many of the work of characters there had been thoroughly reformed, and he spoke very encouragingly of the future. A great change had come over a few of the prisoners in the gaol of Edinburgh; fifty soldiers had been "converted," and a "considerable number" of policemen had also been led to "found peace in believing"; a multitude of the converts were at that very hour assembled in the Music Hall, the smaller Exeter Hall, engaged in like meetings in London. After another prayer, Mr. Weaver stood up and began by saying a hymn, which was sung by the whole of the audience of which was taken up by some hundreds of the congregation, and repeated loudly. He then presented himself to the people, taking for his text, "Repent, for I love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and gave his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." He said that he was a "poor sinner" who had been rescued by divine power from the depths of sin, and from the most resisting stirring anecdotes, and alternately inviting sinners to accept the saving offers, and to come to the cross for life. He next related an incident in the course of his impassioned address he called upon his hearers who had found Christ to rise. Many hands, chiefly those of females, were immediately so; and subsequently there were a few who responded to the invitation to "surrender to the Lord" on the platform and in the vestry-room. Other meetings for "inquiries" were held at the close in the anterooms of the hall.

AN INOFFENSIVE YOUNG MAN.—A burglar, who gave the name of George Thompson, and who described himself as a "traveller" in a mealsave-looking young man," was charged at the Westminster Police Court on Wednesday with breaking into the premises of Mr. Edmund Beckett, was entirely unable to be discovered, at an early hour last Saturday morning, in the act of forcing a chisel-shaped instrument into the lock of the door of the residence of Mr. Beckett, in Great George-street. The servant-girl alarmed a high wild and discreet Thompson behind the door of an omnibus. The "inoffensive young man" immediately took to his heels in front of the first person who attempted to capture him, and, being evidently a man of great activity, succeeded in getting out of sight in a very few minutes. A desperate struggle ensued. The constable succeeded in striking the pistol on one side, but the prisoner, with extraordinary agility, got his right hand with which the other hand of the "inoffensive young man" was furnished. Ultimately, although not without considerable difficulty, the constable secured and on his way to the station he observed, with soothing candour, that he had not been labouring under the slightest misapprehension as to the way the prisoner came into his back yard in quest of a ladder wherewith to make an irruption into the next house. Mr. Arnold said that the prisoner had been given into custody and called there had naturally excited George Thompson's utmost attention. Thompson, in reply to Mr. Arnold, said that he had been unconscious in the dock of the Police Court some little kaleidoscope which ever he looked at it presented a variety of colours. The whole of the scene was varied and interesting as the charms to a lady's chatelaine. There was now a pause in the proceedings, occasioned by the absence of the constable who had been in personal charge of the prisoner; next came the pistol, still loaded, but somewhat to the spoil-sport, which had been taken from the prisoner's pocket; and then the constable himself, who, in addition to the wounds inflicted by the prisoner's dentitions, have been painfully affected by remaining bent), two bullets, a box of tinder-matches, a screw-driver, a pair of pincers, a chisel, a dark lantern, and crape. In reply to a question from Mr. Arnold the police stated that the chisel was that which had been used in attempting to force the door of Mr. Beckett, with the utmost sangfroid, said that the policeman was in such a hurry to get into that, finding the door open, he had entered the house by the front door, but he the accused) pulled the trigger at that moment he might have blown the brains out. Mr. Arnold remanded the prisoner for a week, in order that he might be sent to the sessions. Mr. Arnold said the constable Williams but exhibited great presence of mind.

EXTRAORDINARY WILL CASE.—On Tuesday a will case—in which Mrs. Dennison, widow of the late Mr. Dennison, was opposed by the plaintiff, and Mr. Edmund Beckett Denison, Q.C., of equal fame in connection with clocks and Parliamentary reform, was the leading counsel—was heard in the Court of Probate. The plaintiff affirmed, and the defendant denied, that the late Mr. Dennison died on the 6th of January, 1860, and that his last will was revoked on the 1st of April, 1859, by being torn by his direction and in his presence. Mrs. Dennison, the widow, stated that her husband died on the 6th of January, 1860, at the age of 71. He had been ailing for some time, and had undergone a surgical operation. On the 1st of April, 1859, he was in a state of delirium, determined, or was induced, to make a will. He had previously made a will, which was in the possession of Mr. Denison executor and residuary legatee; the effect being to give Mr. Edmund Beckett Denison, one of the plaintiffs, £1000 per annum. Mr. Denison had no reason executed the will then, according to the plaintiff's case, and he was present at the time, and when the will was signed. He said he had put too much power in Mr. Denison's hands, and he desired to have it back again. Mr. Denison refused to give it up, and he (Mr. Denison) told Mr. Dobbins, who had prepared the will, that he would not destroy it. He accordingly gave it up in his presence, and in the presence of Mr. Dobbins, who destroyed it. Mr. Dobbins, the solicitor of Watts, on his friend of the deceased's wife, who died before him, said Mr. Denison, "Now you have destroyed your power, and I will make you a new will." Mr. Dent frequently said, "Denison hunts me up so about the will." He said he had destroyed the will, and he would make a new one. Mr. Denison died on the Monday Mr. Denison asked me to show him the paper. I gave it to him, and he looked at it, and said, 'I am satisfied with it.' I had no doubt at the time I had but nothing to do with putting his name down. He got it into an envelope, and I sealed it up, and he sealed on the envelope. Mr. Denison—private.' He told me to send it to Coutts's, but I refused. Mr. Denison then said he would take it himself. He accordingly took it away. About an hour afterwards Mr. Dent told me to dismiss it. He said he felt very much annoyed at what had occurred, and that he had not had a very kind letter from Mr. Denison had too much power into his own hands. I said I would write to Mr. Denison and ask him to send it back to me. I did so. Mr. Dent's body is not in Mr. Denison's hands. He said several things showing his desire to have the power back. I wrote to Mr. Denison. He sent the will by Mr. Dent's messenger. He said this to many times that I asked him if he wished to see it. He said, 'No, I am satisfied with it.' I asked him if he wished to see it, and he said, 'Yes.' I then said I would send it to him, and he said he should hardly sleep at night. On the following Monday morning I went to Mr. Dent's house, and found Mr. Dent dead. I went into the room where the will was, and found it in the drawer and gave it. He then desired me and Miss O'Brien to witness it. I did so. Mr. Dent told me to take it to Mr. Dent's room, and treat it in my own room. He was sitting on the bed, and I put it on the bed. He said, 'Put it in the drawer.' I put it in the drawer still. I did not see Mr. Denison there after the will was burnt. I once asked Mr. Dent whether Mr. Denison had seen the will, and he said, 'No, I am sure he has not.' Mr. Dent frequently said his death." These circumstances were confirmed by Miss O'Brien, who added that Mr. Dent had said, "Denison has too much power." Mr. Dent's housekeeper, said Mr. Denison insisted on the order for the family not to be disturbed. Mr. Denison said, "I will be responsible for everything." He said he would take all the responsibility on himself. Mr. Denison said to witness, "I have got the will, and I will take care of it." He said that it was a serious matter to tamper with a will; but he supposed that the will was destroyed. Witness said, "Yes, I think." Mrs. Dent said that Mr. Denison was sure to stand by. Then he said that in the eye of the law any man who destroyed a will would be liable to be transported for life. Mr. Denison said, "Mr. Dent has destroyed the will, and I have destroyed the will. Mr. Denison was called, and debated the circumstances of his interview with Mr. Dent. He said that he had no doubt that the mind of the deceased was not a Dent at all, but an assistant in the shop named Bloom, to whom Mr. Dent had left £1000. He said that Mr. Dent was constantly in the habit of changing his mind. Mr. Denison's intimacy continued with this person, the will was destroyed, and he had executed the will of Mr. Dent to Mr. Denison's intercession and suggestion. There was, according to Mr. Denison's evidence, every reason why deceased should be grateful to him; and he was moreover, under no cordial terms with his relations. There was a violent trade rivalry between him and his younger brother, Richard, in Cockspur-street. During the deceased's illness he acted Mr. Dent frequently if he would see his brother, and he said, "Not at present." Other witnesses deposed to the ill-feeling which existed between deceased and the other members of his family. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, considering that the will in Mr. Denison's favour was cancelled by direction of the deceased, and that he was not a party to the destruction; but they added that Mr. Denison had "exercised reasonable ground for disputing the cancelling of the will, and did so." Deceased had no right to spread with the jury.

DRAMATIC COLLEGE BALL.—On Wednesday the annual ball in aid of the funds of the Dramatic College took place at St. James's Hall, the company on the occasion, as on the previous occasions, being a miscellaneous of the profession were present. The committee were untiring in their exertions to promote the success of the ball. About 600 persons were present.

THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER was occupied on Monday and Tuesday with an action for compensation for services rendered brought by Mr. Sidney Stanley against the Duke of Newcastle, Mr. Lever, M.P. The plaintiff had for both acting engaged by the defendant to promote in various ways the formation of the Newark Public Cemetery, and the Public Cemeteries Act, and to carry the same through several journeys to and from England, Ireland, and Paris, and had incurred a debt of £1000. The defendant, who had promised to remunerate him in an abrupt manner, the plaintiff electing to be nonsuited.

PRIVATE BILLS.—On Monday night Mr. Pulling read a report from the Standing Orders Committee, which recommended that a private bill system. He suggested that commissioners should be appointed to go down to the localities where railways were affected by private bills, and report upon the merits of the proposed legislation. Lord Stanley expressed a strong opinion that the House should retain the control over private bills which it at present exercised, and delegate its exercise to others. It might, however, be desirable to refer the bills to a committee of persons who would be able to form a judgment on the merits of the bills submitted. Under the present system of dealing with private bills the interests of the public are often thrown into the background, and the interests of the parties concerned only considered.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

After an investigation extending over several days the Royal Dockyard Commissioners terminated their inquiries at Chatham Dockyard on Saturday last.

The Government has decided on dispatching another company of Royal Engineers to St. Helena to assist in erecting additional fortifications and barracks for the garrison of that island.

The seamen of the north of England have just issued an address appealing to the public for contributions to a fund for supporting the Admiralty scheme of forming a naval reserve.

A large and handsome monument to those of the gallant 32nd Light Infantry who perished at Lucknow has been erected in the cemetery by non-commissioned officers and men, four bullets, and 86 soldiers' wives and children—being the number of the regiment who fell during the siege.

SIR BALDWIN WALKER, who has for many years held the responsible office of Surveyor of the Navy, has resigned, after more than forty years' service in the Royal Dockyards.

HER MAJESTY'S new screw-sloop Rapid, of 11 guns and 150-horse power, was launched in a most successful manner at Deptford Dockyard on Thursday week, in the presence of a large number of spectators. The ceremony of christening was performed by Miss S. Goodenough, daughter of Commodore Goodenough, C.B., Captain Superintendent of Sheerness, precisely at 11 o'clock, when the vessel glided majestically into the water, amidst the shouts of the assembled crowd, and the plaudits of the band, which played the National Anthem. The Rapid is to be commanded by Captain Hon. Arthur Duncombe, C.B., A.D.C. to the Queen.

According to a private letter, received by an officer of the Dockyard at Woolwich, it appears that the smallpox is raging on board the Chinese fleet. Out of 1000 men on board the Kien Chang about a fourth part of the crew were already suffering from the disease, and, with the exception of the officers, not one of the crew had been vaccinated. The vessel proceeded to the island of Saddo for treatment.

MAIL-CLAD VESSELS.—At the eleventh hour (says the Army and Navy Gazette) the Government has decided upon commencing building the gigantic armour-plated ship Warrior, the Lords of the Admiralty having determined to have a vessel of greater capacity than will combine stability with invulnerability; but, after sleeping the works for two months, they have now come to the conclusion that, in order to expedite the subject, the following decision was arrived at:—"She is not the vessel we want, but we will have her, and then we shall have some one to set to work to see what can be made of her." So, in accordance with the resolution, the Warrior is to be built. Her dimensions are to be increased, and the private enterprise to get the ship into the water before the end of the year. Thus, while the Government are constructing vessels of the size and power of the Emperor of the French has tested his La Gloire, the performances of which have been most satisfactory, the Admiralty are pursuing the old system of first constructing several other vessels on a smaller plan.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

A stand of colours was presented, on Wednesday week, to the 1st Corps formed in Dorsetshire. The colours were presented by Miss Sturt, of Crichel, on behalf of the honorary commandant, Lieutenant-Colonel Sturt.

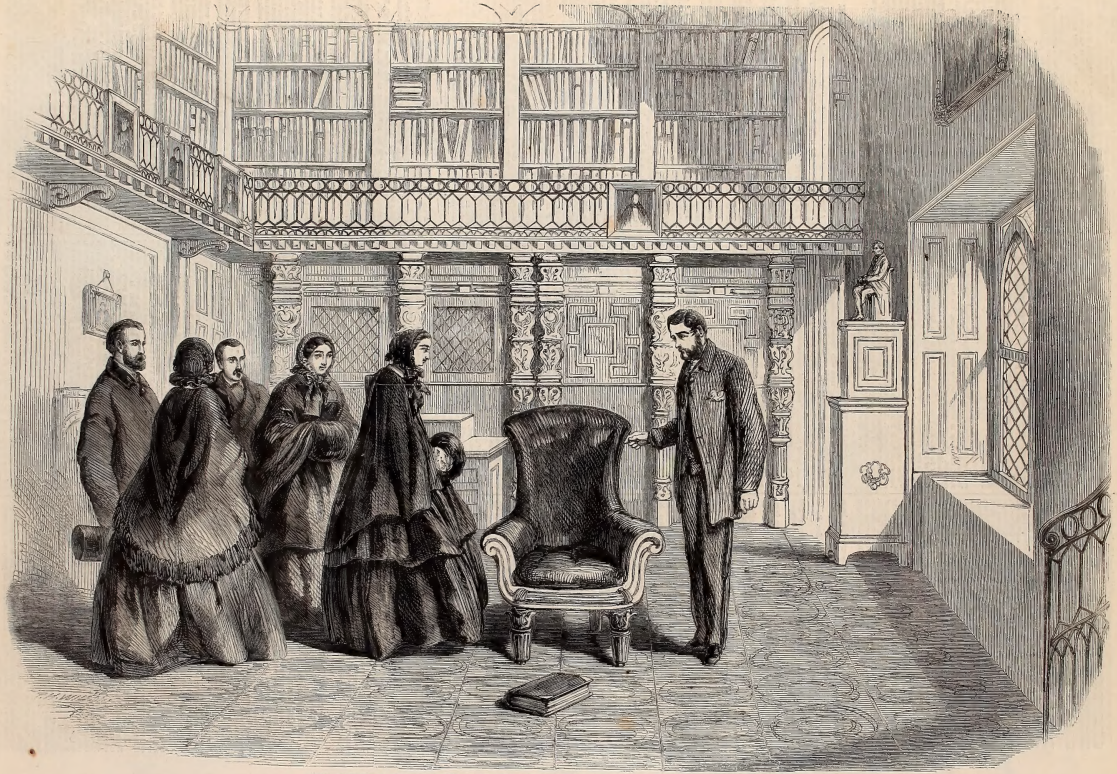
Colonel Sir Thomas Troubridge, Bart., of Bristol, resigns, in the event of the Government not accepting his offer, the adoption of two position—one holding forty and the other twenty rounds.

The Liverpool Free Guard of Volunteers now numbers upwards of 500 men, and the formation of a fourth company is in progress. Lieutenant-Colonel of the corps has been unanimously carried by the members.

The annual meeting of the 2nd company of the 1st battalion of volunteers met as the practice-ground, Wards Meadow, to contend for an elegant silver cup, presented by W. L. Rathbone, Esq., M.P. In the contest, the prize was won by Private W. F. Barnett.

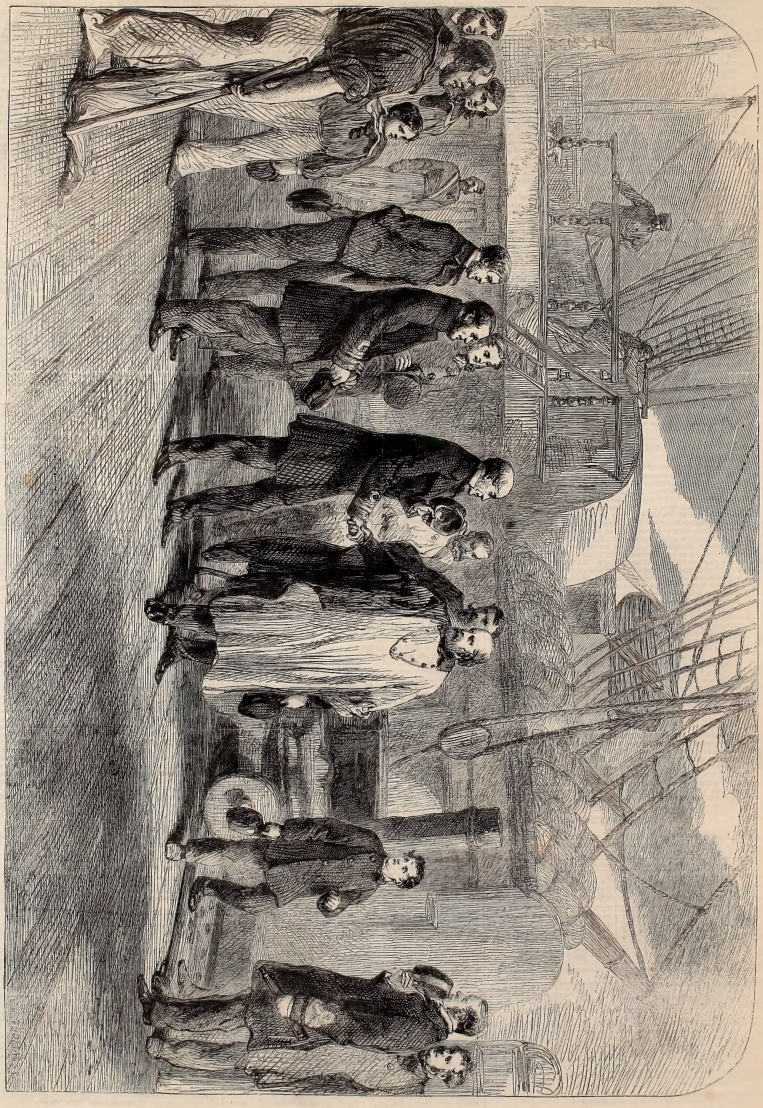
The Volunteer movement in the Penrith peninsula was held at Retford Hall, Mansel-street, Goodman's-fields, on Tuesday night, when readers Lieutenant-Colonel Goodman presided, and a number of officers were present unanimously. The members present went through their drill under the command of Captain Goodman, and Lieutenant Hall and Ensign Hall.

Last Saturday a public meeting of the nobility and gentry of the county of Chester was held at the Grosvenor Museum, for the purpose of establishing a rifle corps in the city of Chester, for the purpose of forming an association for promoting the efficiency of volunteer corps in the county. The meeting was numerously attended, and the object of the meeting were unanimously passed.



The second rifle field-day in connection with the 1st Cheshire rifle volunteers took place yesterday week at Sealand, and Bistchington Battery, and comprised parade of the whole corps, and the march past, and completed the whole of the evolutions of the corps, with the exception of the ball practice. The bugle was presented by Mrs. Simmons.

The 1st Corps of Volunteers assembled under real on Monday evening at Albany-street Barracks before the effectives of the 29th Middlesex assembled for the purpose of presenting the prizes won by the members of the company volunteers at places of public amusement or resort, and expressed a hope that the movement would be carried out in the spirit in which it had originated extensive, by implication at least, to the custom of promoting the streets and other places of public amusement.



There was a rifle shooting-match at Wakefield on Monday, the 1st and 2nd battalions of the West Yorkshire regiment of volunteer militia (one for each corps), which are to be worn for a year by the best shots in the respective companies. The match was won by Private Dixon. In the contest for the silver cup, which was won by Private Drake. In shooting off the tie between Private Drake and Private Gaunt Glover won the medal. The Volunteer Band played during the evening, and the prizes were distributed by Mrs. Hargreaves.

The Oxford University Corps was inspected by Colonel M'Murdo on Monday afternoon in the University Parks, when a force of some 1200 men of the corps mustered nearly 300 strong, and the inspection was witnessed by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The corps was commanded on parade by Major-General the Hon. R. Bruce and Lieutenant-Colonel Keppel. The corps was first put through various movements, all of which they executed with great precision, and at the conclusion of the inspection they were highly complimented by Colonel M'Murdo.

On Wednesday week the members of the 4th company of Essex Volunteers assembled in the Cavalry-square, Canterbury, for the purpose of shooting for prizes offered by the officers of the company. The first prize, consisting of a handsome silver goblet, given by Captain Plummer, was awarded to Colour-Sergeant Norman; the second, an elaborately-gilt timepiece, offered by Lieutenant Smiley, to Corporal Linford; the third, a silver cigar-case, by Captain Plummer, to Corporal Newman; and the fourth, a silver drinking-mug, given by Ensign Fowler, to Private Hayward. The last was also the winner of the previous day by the company, the first being awarded to Private Castle, and the second to Sergeant-Major Hall.

MUSIC.

The SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY has begun its twenty-ninth season. Its first performance, on Friday last week, consisted of Handel's "Solomon," an oratorio which, though not one of the best of the great master's works, contains many things worthy of his transcendent genius. In composing it he laboured (as he did in several of his other productions) under the disadvantage of having to pen a little merit. "Solomon" was written by one of those literary hacks whom Handle too often employed. There is no beauty in the language, no grandeur in the sentiments, and (with the exception of the famous words in the Judgment Scene) no dramatic situations and incidents. It is no wonder that even Handel's "Mass of free" yielded to such unfavourable influences, and that his music partook of the flatness of the poetry by which it was inspired. It is no wonder is that he could rear such a structure on such a foundation. Some of the choruses are full of the very highest merit. Handel himself has scarcely written anything grander than the magnificent choral hymn, "Yet sing cease and cymbals rain," with which the oratorio concludes than "From the center curling rise," or than the double chorus of "Praise the Lord with harp and timbrel," which is one of the gems of exquisite beauty—particularly "What though I trace each herb and flower" and "Shall I see my infant gird?" These and several other gems redeem the weakness of other parts of the work. Even, however, "Solomon" has never held a high place among the works of Handel, and the performance last week was unsatisfactory. To this fact coexists the principal singers were Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mdme. Hope-Dolby, Miss Banks, and Mr. Lemmens-Sherrington. The acquitted themselves admirably; especially Mdme. Sherrington, who promises to distinguish herself in a manner as great as she has already done in secular music. The choruses were splendidly sung, and the whole performance was worthy of the Sacred Harmonic Society.

The PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY is also very active in making preparations for its next—its forty-ninth—season. It has been determined, in compliance with the general wish of its members, to abandon the plan adopted five years ago of giving only six concerts, and to return to the old-established custom, which has existed since the foundation of the society, of eight concerts during the season. That them will be in the month of March, before Easter; the remaining six in the month of May and June. The first of the eight will be given at Beethoven, at the Hanover-square Rooms. Professor Sterndale Bennett continues to hold the office of conductor of the concerts—an office which he has exercised for five years with so much honour to himself and to the society. It is to be hoped that the report that the directors are making strenuous efforts to render the orchestra more complete and powerful as it can possibly be made, and using every means to give variety and interest to the concerts. This great society renowned throughout Europe for half a century, never was more prosperous, more full of life and vigour, than at the present time; and, notwithstanding the competition of rival establishments, its beneficial influence on the progress of music is as powerful as it has been on any period of its history.

Balfe's new opera, "Bianca, the Bravo's Bride," was produced at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, on Tuesday (last night). Next week we shall give an account of the work and its performance. In the meantime we may say that it has been duly successful, and will add fresh laurels to the chaplet of the composer.

THE THEATRES.

The near approach of Christmas brings to a pause the speculations of theatrical managers, and prevents the production of novelty. The Christmas pantomime is with great pains and expense and a fair amount of ambition. The LYCEUM and HAYMARKET both started with new pieces on the twelfth part of Twelfth Night. Both, however, proved unfortunate. The new drama at the former only lasted a fortnight, and at the latter had to be greatly abridged, as many an seven chances and whimsies from the pen of Mr. Arthur Law, have contributed a piece to the stage of the ST. JAMES'S for the purpose of laughter-provoking amusement of Mr. Alfred Bishop. The experiment was favour, though not calculated for popularity, and two or three weeks ago was withdrawn to make room for the best piece of Mr. Wilson Barrett's stock pieces and Miss Alleine de Rhona. At DRURY LANE the season opened with great expectations. A "combination of managers" was promised, and a new drama by Mr. Watts Phillips and Mr. Augustus Webster sponsored. The verdict of the first night was favourable, but the drama was found more attractive, and has since been withdrawn and brought to a hurried close. These facts demonstrate that there is something radically wrong in the system of the theatres. It is absolutely inferred that the public are not satisfied with the class of composition represented by the new ventures, and that a reform in what is demanded by the improved taste of audiences is of a higher quality. At the LYCEUM the spirited manageress lost no time in repairing the disaster of the opening night, and in a week or two produced a new three-act melodrama by a new author, which has proved eminently successful. She has also called in the aid of Mr. Arthur Law, the facile comedian, who promises to become a metropolitan favourite.

While other theatres have thus experienced a variety of fortunes, the ADELPHI has continued a career of triumph. "The Colleen Bawn" has had its go in one of the Christmas pantomimes. The success of this interesting drama has excited the cupidity of dramatic caterers both in and out of London, and its clever author has been under the necessity of appealing to the Court of Chancery for protection, which has been granted.

The theatres devoted to the legitimate drama in the east and north have pursued the even tenor of their way, and met with their usual amount of patronage. At SADLER'S WELLS Mr. Phelps's management has given to the stage a new actor, in the person of his son, who promises to become a valuable addition to the excellent company. At the STANDARD Mr. Sullivan, who has won golden opinions from everyone in now starring and last Monday performed Macbeth to a full house. At the CITY OF LONDON, Mr. T. C. Hazlewood has made an interesting engagement in the character of Hamlet, and was well received.

SIR J. BOWRING.—(To the Editor).—Being related to Sir John Bowring, I should be much obliged if you would correct a mistake in your impression of last Saturday. Yes there my be in rangooland Governor of Hong-Kong. I quote his own words on the subject:—"The London papers have in that I am reappointed to the Government of Hong-Kong. I cannot fancy where such a strange mistake can have had its origin." You also state that he had been by his first wife "two daughters and five sons," whereas it ought to have been four daughters, three of whom survive: he has four sons living, three of whom you mention, but each Mr. Frederic L. Bowring (who is practising at the Chancery Bar), his second son.—C. W. LAWS, Clifton.

The Viceroy of Egypt, Said Pacha, has announced his intention of shortly going on a pilgrimage to Mecca.

THE FARM.

The Christmas Fat Cattle Carnival was well led off at Rugby by Beauty's Butterfly, who won the £15 prize open to all the world. An enthusiastic butcher offered £40 for her, but Colonel Townley declined, and she will be kept to look at a little longer. What with a Farmers' Club dinner to a neighbour on Monday, the Royal, the Smithfield Show opening, and their show, and dinner as well, the agriculturists will have plenty to employ them in London next week. The Royal had two good business days this week, and have arranged to give £500 for their implement trials, at the Leeds show in July, of which is to be devoted to steam cultivation. The "steamers" will be tried about the third week of June, in the neighbourhood of Leeds, and the prizes awarded during the following week. Whether they will be worth competing for, not for further competition, but for public inspection. It is whispered that, in spite of the Royal having fallen off in funds, Saturday's Canterbury Show, the stock prizes will be increased this year; and, meaning that the Kentish Show will be a good one. Considering that this way, the blood-horse classes are not likely to be overlooked. Leeds in November will be prepared to spend any amount, so as to bring off the meeting with eclat.

The Mosen Howard, of Bedford, gained a verdict in the Queen's Bench on Tuesday against Messrs. Ransome, for their action making plough-fittings with their private trade marks. From the small quantity of these fittings which they have sold for years past, and the number of plough they have sold for years into the Retford district, the injunction of the Court will probably be a down-hill matter against one who was at once accommodated with a shed, a breast, and a host of inferior workmen. Mr. Howard, each bearing the name of his employer. One of the Ledgers created great fun in the Court by stating practically that the agent was "a false man," and that it was not him who bought the fittings, but "a man who lived next door." The firm only had the nominal damages (40s.), which they got, as they had reason to believe that Mr. Howard would not be eager to employ that man in future. When a firm sells some 6000 ploughs a year such frauds become more annoying to the manufacturer than to the agent and workmen.

As far as fowls and attendance went, the Bingley Hall Show was a great success; but, while the sheep and the pigs reached their usual standard of excellence, the cattle were a long way behind it. The Hereford numbered 20 in their four classes, and the extra prize for the best pen of three, the Earl of Ducie's, was not up to the Rugby Trophy. He was not very large, but thick-fleshed and level, and something like the Rugby beast, but he was not quite such a first-class piece, which was very fat, and the judges considered it a pretty strong pen. Mr. Price, of Aston Rowant, M.F.H., Bill's separated it from its rival, Mr. Tudge's; and the Messrs. Hill's first prize heifer was a very meritorious one, but looking none the better for her journey. Mr. Tudge's Shorthorns mustered 28, and although both the gold medals for the best "ox or steer" and "cow or heifer" in the Shorthorn classes and one silver medal were bestowed on Mr. Tudge's, the silver medal for the best "ox or steer" and the gold medal for the best pen, Mr. Richard Stratton's brother won the ox prize with a fine Duke, and Colonel Pennant, M.P., and the representatives of Bulmaiton and its neighbourhood were fulfilled with a gold medal going to their stock. This winner in the younger class it is a necessary to say, was bred by Colonel Pennant, whose Duke of Bulmaiton 2nd was a strong tendency to offal, a point from which he derives much of his style and quality. Mr. Tudge's pen of three were the best bullocks we have met with in a beast of such pretensions, a Shorthorn pen can scarcely be sent than, and the best of Yorkshire pastures; and Mr. Richard Stratton's white steer, which has not fulfilled the early promise of his youth, and now looks more like being scored, was highly commended. Colonel Pennant, M.P., was first with a pen of three, his white cow (a sad falling-off from Beauty's Butterfly), Mr. Richard Stratton was second, and Mr. Tudge third. The Duke of Devonshire's Keighley of Marsenides, belonging to Mr. W. Wells, was second; and a daughter of Mr. Tudge's Duke of Oxford, Viscount Powerscourt's, third. Each of the cows had enough food-fat and "out-shoulder" to qualify it for a carcase. Mr. Tudge's pen of three Shorthorn heifers, Mr. Stephenson's, with that nice orthodox horn-twist, and but one opponent, Mr. Farthing's cow, after her eleven years' pilgrimage and seven live calves, was first, and Mr. Stephenson's second. In the three extra beast heifer classes, the Prince Consort won with specimens of his own breeding, of which Mr. Tudge's Duke of Oxford 2nd was the representative. Mr. Tudge was much the best of the two. Earl Howe was second both for the Raven steer and the Raven heifer, Mr. Stephenson second; and Captain Hornby headed two other classes. Lady Louisa Wynne sent the silver prize for Dorking cocks in a field of sixty-one, in which three got prizes. Fifteen were in the Cochin class, and the Buffs mustered 20. Ducks seemed moderate, but the Aylesbury chicks were enormous.

Mr. Stephenson, of Bulmaiton, Bedale, Yorkshire, have decided to give up the system of secret judging, and to admit the public round the ring, as at the Smithfield Show, and the Royal will be open to spectators where in the north of England. Every year these shows are becoming more and more exclusive, and there is no way so certain to prevent the public interest from flagging and to make the exhibitors of importance of bearing the butt balls, and tups, and boars, for the use of their tenants. Even in the Smithfield Show the public are not sure of their poultry boudoirs enhance into an existing spectacle. The Royal will be open to spectators this year, and the Bingley Hall meetings shows that the public like rather more excitement than wandering round the pens, and fee on pig (for the Show on the five-shilling day) not being even able to tell what has been highly commended or condemned. Any one who compares the lifeless hound show at Middlesex, when judges and hounds were shut up in a box, with the stirring sight at Ponsford, when each huntsman was called on to produce his hounds in front of the judges on the flags—or indeed at the Harewood Hunters' Cup at Pontefract, when twelve hunters and six jumped over in the ring, and the Cleveland Bay classes filled four deep, with a few lithesome spectators walking up and down the horse lessons at the Royal, will see at once appreciate the difference between that publicity which gives every one an interest in the proceedings and those who do good to say can, and answers no earthly purpose, except that it keeps the public out. The Bingley Hall meeting has proved, in his nature who did not feel that it was equal in its quiet way to the Royal Show at the end of Newbury last week, and that one of the greatest shortcomings since which were tried in the ring this summer. First, there was not the Duchess of Cleveland's Queen Bee, Lord Spencer's of Gloyster, and Emma, when after a quarter of an hour's pauling each was called to the front, and an umpire was called in to decide. Again we saw Maid of Athelstane out for the Duke of Devonshire's and Duchess 77th at Alnwick; the cracks of the Towneley herd, headed by Royal Duchess 4th, were not to be seen at Bingley, and Royal and Duchess 77th side by side for minutes at Burnley; while Mr. Outhwaite's cow, the winner of December judging, was not to be with him for the run against the rail. One thing is certain, committees are now more chary who they select as their judges when the decision is to be public. To say nothing of the discomfort of being roused up at five, nothing can be more unfair and unconsiderate to judges than the secret system, and it is somewhat remarkable that the decisions so made are more frequently "executed" in the courts of the newspaper than any other. Really good and straightforward judges like best to do their work in public. The consciousness that they are overlooked by so many keen, critical eyes makes them doubly careful what they are about; and no bashaws can seek their masters when they rush like a lot of wild Indians into the yard the moment the judging is over, with long aggravating stories as to "our beast's never been done so." Again, we all know how different a beast looks when it is out what it does when it is in its stall or lying down, and hence, as we have heard many judges say, it is only satisfactory to them to state their justice to themselves that the exhibitors should see exactly why the decisions were made. There is also calculating the extent of ill-blood between judges and exhibitors which has arisen from such a meaningless exclusion; and, even when they can discuss their differences amicably, the judge invariably replies, "Well, but you never see them out together as a rule," and in this remark lies the whole kernel of the matter. These shows were established quite as much for the sake of public instruction in judging stock as in spreading a taste for careful breeding, and the whole lesson is lost on many spectators (who would gladly pay a heavier entrance fee) unless they are permitted to watch the judges as they examine the candidates, and summarily decught after one parade to those which are utterly unworthy of the honour of competition. Quality and not quantity are what we want at shows, and the competition would soon become more select if the owners, seeing that their bad animals had to stand to one side very early in the day, took the hint to keep them at home. Let us have more publicity, company for this future. The Americans understand these things better than we do, and have a full view of everything, from the Devon prize-winners down to the trotters. This system was in a measure followed out at Middlesbrough and the temporary stalls were crowded when Viscount Ledy Fascombe, Fandango, and The Cure were brought out for the final parade. Nothing but publicity at shows can prevent such than Yorkshire, and we trust that other counties will copy her by degrees.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE racing barometer is down at zero, and will continue so for the next three weeks, till the January nomination dinners come upon the scene, and encourage betting to feel its way at 66 to 1 about the Chester Cup. Those who look upon the special jockey meetings a temporary malady of their nominator for the purpose of driving back Downing-street, and those who look upon the increased power of authority that they are fools for their pains; and others are ready to bet that the Jockey Club will allow the Lincoln Handicap which has been recently perpetrated on Mr. Markwell to go unchallenged in the general confusion. Reviews of the racing season are the principal staple of the turf papers, and from one of these we learn that George Fordham had 471 mounts at fifty-one meetings last season, and that Custance had 400 and odd on an average of but five. The Volunteer Steeplechases at Hendon were great fun, and the ground was fearfully hard. The Grand Britain was not allowed nearly every one was down. Sir Charles, ridden by Mr. Henry Mason, was the first home, and Mr. Mason had the honour of a popularity as a clerk of the course and handicapper wrought quite a change in the steadiness at Croydon. Captain Barlow has hired the celebrated 6000-guinea Oulston, and Mr. Sherburne and Mr. Walhouse, and sire of the Plenty colt, for his stud at Hakston, in Suffolk; and Happy Land, Queen of Trumps, Paganini (£500), Sandiway (£1000), and Newcastle (£700) are in the market. The retirements of Masjid, North Lincoln, and Lucy Glitters are also announced.

According to Weatherby's "Racing-book Calendar" 1717 horses ran for fifteen hundred and ten Great Britain and Ireland during the past season. In 1859 their number (inclusive of nine two-year-olds) was 1414, which shows a majority of 330 over the return for 1849. The great increase of 1860 was in the two-year-olds, which numbered 698 against 564! Exactly 736 colts and 711 fillies have been entered with Messrs. Weatherby during the season, and 1717 have been named and stripped their foals. The following sires have the largest number of foals named:—Hermit (59), Barrister (54), Galopin (45), Scottish Chief (43), Chanticleer (41), The Cure (16), Daniel O'Rourke (38), De Clare (33), Fisherman (32), Hampton (32), Favolette (17), Gemini (1), Verdy (1), King of Trumps (12), Kingcraft (11), King of the Isles (14), Mountain Deer (29), Newminster (39), Orlando (21), Rataplan (19), Rosicrucian (20), Rosebery (21), Speculum (14), Strathconan (19), Talisor (19), Teddington (33), Touchstone (11), Velette (20), Vulcan (11), Wenlock Abbey (26), Wild Dayrell (22), Wild Dayrell (15), and Windbound (13). Of the 1447 foals no less than 1100 were by thoroughbred horses. Among the eight sets of twins, among which unfortunates were the half brothers to Ayrshire and Isinglass, and Mr. Tattersall's Laurel have come up again; but the happiest hits are Knight Bevor, by Chanticleer, and Double Shuffle, by Fandango from Fandango. On the whole (it may be going to be) a season of moderate promise, with a tendency to little taste or fancy. Sisters to Teddington, Velette, and Iguerande are in the field as well as brothers to Isinglass and Ayrshire, but Rose Haythorne has nothing to show.

The deer-stalking season made a capital hit, and had 272 entries, nearly all of which came. They consisted of 11 bloodhounds, 6 foxhounds, 4 harriers and beagles, 9 deerhounds, 6 greyhounds, 25 setters (12 Irish, 8 English, and the rest Irish and English), 43 spaniels, &c.; 2 beardhounds, 6 mastiffs, 6 Newfoundlands, 2 Dalmatian dogs, 3 bulldogs, 2 Pomeranians, and the rest not falling into classes. Blenheim spaniels, King Charles spaniels, toy terriers, and foreign dogs. There were entries of them (5 Welsh-bred), Mr. Sam, an ex-master of foxhounds; and another the celebrated sporting writer, "Stonehenge," who is also a judge of bloodhounds; but still Mr. Jennings of Kirby Moorside's dog left him far in the rear. The largest pointer dogs were a very excellent class; but the same could not be said of the setters, many of which were individually good, but so "very inferior," though the winner was sold for £50. It is somewhat remarkable that the Irish breed was exactly reversed in the small pointer classes. Mr. Morrall's greyhounds Momentum and Maidless were the best of the lot, and Mr. Darling and Mr. Cheshire, the only foxhound packs which were represented, shared the two prizes. A better place and raised platforms to exhibit the dogs on are sadly required, as Monday's was almost impossible to see anything for the crush.

The coursing meetings for next week are Spilsmore Club, on Tuesday and Wednesday; Burton Agnes (O.), on Wednesday and Thursday; Lace Hamlet, on Thursday; and Sudbury, on Thursday and Friday.

THE GREAT SWINFEN CASE.—The Master of the Rolls again gave judgment on Wednesday in this case; first, as to whether a share of £600 per annum paid under the will of the late testator's grandfather to his son for his next of kin, or whether such charge had so far merged in the testator's real estate as to be payable under the will of his daughter-in-law, Mrs. Florence Swinfen; secondly and thirdly, whether the gift in the testator's will of his residuary estate to his daughter-in-law "absolutely" carried the furniture of Swinfen Hall, or was subject to be kept upon settlement for the remainder in the house; and, fourthly and finally, whether two annuities, expressed to be "clear of duty," were to be declared free of it. His Honour decided the first three points in favour of the devisee, Mrs. Florence Swinfen, and the other two against.

On Monday a refreshment and lecture room for the special use of railway employés was opened in the parish of Battersea, when the men and their wives were invited to tea, and addressed by the Vicar and other friends. Lectures will be given on Friday evenings; and on Saturday evenings a penny bank is opened for their savings.

A letter from Belize, Honduras, dated September 17, states that yellow fever had broken out on board the British steam-ship Tarsus at Truxillo. Eleven of her crew and two officers had died, and a great many were down with the disease. Dr. Woodbridge, Wednesday, on her voyage to Jamaica, she reported thirty-three dead, and still a heavy sick list.

COUNTRY NEWS.

AWFUL COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

On Saturday last an explosion, tremendous in its consequences, occurred at the Black Vein Pit, Risca, about six miles from Newport, Monmouthshire, and the property of the Risca Coal and Iron Company. The colliery has been in work some years in the production of steam coal, and, as gas has more or less generated, the usual precautions have been adopted. The pit was examined, according to custom, on Saturday morning, after which, between five and six o'clock, the workmen were soon descended. At nine o'clock there was a terrific explosion, and such intense horrorism it was said, as soon darkness from the bottom of the pit the gas had fired. Considerable damage was done to the workings. As soon as the terrible catastrophe became known search was instituted. Dead bodies were discovered in several directions, and the search has been unremittingly continued. One report says that seventy-seven men, the resting off all communication with sixty or seventy persons who are beyond it. Some of them will be found alive, but the number cannot be great. The hopes of any being found alive are given up; for, should the choke-damps have spread any of those still beyond the point of explosion, exhaustion and starvation will have completed the work. When the explosion occurred 199 men had been sent down to the pit, of whom 122 were in the workings, and one of the workmen was summoned before the county magistrates of this town for taking half a candle into the pit with him, and it was proved in evidence that the man that two other men were detected with nails in their possession, in order to ignite the candle for the purpose of lighting their pipes for the purpose of smoking. These things show the recklessness of the men, and point, perhaps, to the origin of the explosion.

Baron Rosmead died at his residence, Rosmare Park, in the county of Monaghan, on Saturday evening last.

Paignton, in Torbay, was visited on Wednesday week by a hurricane and waterspout, which did considerable damage.

The Lord Lieutenancy of Berwickshire, vacant by the death of the late Earl of Lauderdale, will be filled up by Lord Polwarth.

The Rev. G. W. Clapham, of Haslingden, has accepted a unanimous invitation to become the pastor of the New Independent Church in Preston.

The Roman Catholic Bishop of Beverley, Dr. Briggs, is about to resign, from infirmities of age, his charge of the Yorkshire and Derby Bishop in this country, and seventy years of age.

The Queen's Bench, Ireland, has decided, in the case Donnelly v. Druitt, that a marriage celebrated at sea by the captain of a ship is not legal, and that accordingly a later marriage performed in the usual way.

The inquiry into the fearful explosion on board the steamer Tuesday was continued on Tuesday morning at the Custom-house, with a view to the effect that there was not sufficient evidence to show the cause of the explosion to implicate any persons.

A gunpowder explosion took place in a gunsmith's shop at Newcastle on Saturday last. The premises were wrecked, a man was killed, several persons were seriously injured, and much of the adjoining property was damaged.

A meeting is to be held in the Townhall, Leeds, on Tuesday evening next, to inaugurate a society called the Leeds Working Men's Parliamentary Reform Association, and which has been formed by the working classes. There were 1362 volumes handed out for perusal during the day, being more than double the number usually delivered to readers at the old library in Duke-street.

The Right Hon. F. Peel, M.P., appeared before his constituents in Derby, on Thursday week, to render an account of his stewardship. His reception by a large audience was most cordial. He reviewed the proceedings of Parliament during the last session, and congratulated himself and those he had in passing the financial measures rendered necessary by the French treaty, and he declined to join in the cry for the abolition of the most excessive snowballing in the Lower House, and thought that the fruits of the Reform Bill were not yet exhausted. He was in favour of a Reform Bill, but considered it to be inadvisable to introduce it at present. He was also the right hon. member's speech a vote of confidence in him, accompanied by an expression of satisfaction at his connection with the Government, was passed by acclamation.

Repeal of the Union.—An aggregate meeting of those in favour of the Repeal petition was held on Monday last in the Rotunda, Dublin, "to claim for the people of Ireland the right to choose their own rulers." The meeting was a very numerous one, filling the whole gallery, and body of the Round Room were densely crowded from an early hour, and the greatest enthusiasm was manifested throughout the proceedings. Mr. O'Donoghue, M.P., occupied the chair. The only other persons of any note present were Mr. Butt, Q.C., and Mr. Isaac Butt, Q.C., who arrived from Dublin O'Gorman, a letter of sympathy, and regretted that his absence was "it may be said with truth," he observes, "that a nation ought never to despair, and that a brave man never will do so, so long as he can draw a sword; but I confess that the results of the royal agitation of 1841, '44, '45, '46, '47, '48, have shaken my faith in the practical statesmanship of Irish agitation, and have rendered me unwilling to exact the remainder of my life in labours so unfruitful as those which I gave to the cause of repeal before my expatriation from Ireland." Nevertheless he thinks that compact men may be found to carry out the object, and therefore he thinks that "it is desirable that the public should know who are the prominent persons Those who are to be held responsible." Resolutions in favour of repeal were unanimously adopted.

Conference of Congregationalists and Churches in Wales.—On Tuesday week a conference of delegates from Independent churches in South Wales was held in Swansea with the object of considering the present state of the English population resident in the Principality, and adopt such means as might be considered necessary to promote their religious interests. The conference was attended by upwards of seventy ministers and other gentlemen, some of whom had come from a considerable distance. The meeting was then called to the chair, and having introduced the business of the conference the Rev. W. Jones, of Abergavenny, delivered a long and comprehensive report on the Moral and Spiritual Condition of the English Population in South Wales, and many twenty-three places in which the services of English in connection with the English residents were required. It stated also the promises of considerable and effective aid from the Home Missionary society for many years, and concluded by expressing a hope that the Home Missionary Society and Church Aid Missionary Society would take steps for at once providing the means of grace for the English population in Wales. Mr. Morley, of London, in an earnest and kindly practical speech, urged the claims of the Welsh upon the attention of the conference, and that an appeal should be made to the churches in England to assist in the work. The Rev. Dr. Thomas, of Liverpool, spoke in the same strain, and expressed his conviction that the Welsh would be ready to assist in the resolution, which was supported by several other gentlemen, and unanimously agreed to. Then followed several resolutions, one of which was to appoint a committee to co-operate with the committee of the Home Missionary Society and the Church Building Society. Before the meeting broke up a very liberal pecuniary response, and the Rev. W. Williams, of Llanelwy, was requested to become an agent for the conference, and to collect funds for the new chapels by personally visiting the churches in England and Wales. In the evening a large public meeting was held, Mr. Morley in the chair, when addresses of a similar character were cordially passed.

Reform Demonstration at Birmingham.—A soirée in connection with the Birmingham Freehold Land Society was held on Tuesday evening in the Townhall, Birmingham, which was crowded to excess, and the hall was subsequently well filled by a highly respectable audience, with a great interest in the proceedings. The meeting was one of a character entirely distracted by the announcement that Messrs. Bright and Scholefield, the Borough members, would take part in the proceedings, and address the meeting upon Reform. Scholefield being in the chair. Mr. Bright entered the hall while the proceedings of the society were in progress, and was received with cheers for him; but his entrance was the signal for a burst of enthusiastic and long-continued applause. The report having been read, Mr. Bright was received with boisterous and important, as an abstract of the resolutions will show. The first resolution stated that the present system of land transfer operated to heavily prejudice the interests of the working classes, and that freehold land societies were the best means of remedying the evil. The second resolution recorded the opinion of the meeting that any proposed Reform Bill ought to have reference to freehold land societies, and that freehold franchise would be especially beneficial to the industrious artisan. The third resolution, which being in the chair. Mr. Bright entered the hall while the proceedings of the society were in progress, and was received with cheers for him; but his entrance was the signal for a burst of enthusiastic and long-continued applause. The following resolutions were then passed with loud and

THE BABIRUSSA.

THE collection of living examples of the different species of the Suidæ or swine family in the Gardens of the Zoological Society in the Regent's Park has lately received a remarkable addition in the animal whose portrait we give this day.

The babirussa of the Island of Celebes (Sus babirussa, or Babirussa alfurus of Systematists) is one of the most peculiar and certainly one of the most rare of this group of quadrupeds. Very few of the museums of Europe contain perfect specimens of this animal, and it is believed no have only reached England alive on one former occasion. This was in 1853, when a young babirussa, obtained by Sir Edward Belcher during one of his exploring expeditions, was presented to the Zoological Society, and lived some months in the gardens. The present example of this same animal has been obtained by exchange from the Zoological Gardens of Rotterdam. It is a fine young male, and exhibits only partially the curious structure of the tusks for which the adult male is so celebrated, and which must render him so formidable an opponent in the forest. These tusks grow upwards instead of downwards from the upper jaw, from a sheath which pierces the lip, and in the full-grown male recurve backwards until they nearly meet the sides of the face again. The whole contour of the animal is likewise very peculiar, and different from that of the ordinary pigs.

The babirussa is said to be found wild in the neighbouring islands of Borneo and some others of the Sunda group, as well as in Celebes. It attained its name from the extraordinary idea of the Malays that it originated from a cross between the pig (Babi) and the deer (Russa, or Rusa). A pair of living babirussas were some years ago brought to Paris by the French whaling-vessel l'Adroluble, and lived some time in the Jardin des Plantes, where they produced a young one. At the present moment, however, we believe that the example in our Zoological Society's Gardens is unique in Europe.

The other members of the swine family of which the society possess specimens are the wild boar of Europe (Sus scrofa), the wild boar of Barbary (Sus barbarus), the wild boar of Java (Sus barbatus), the Red River hog of West Africa (Potamochærus penicillatus), the bosch-vark or river hog of Southern Africa (P. Africanus), the wart hog of Natal (Phacochærus Æthiopicus), and the two peccaries of tropical America (Dicotyles torquatus and D. albirostris). A pair of a very curious variety of the domestic pig bred in Japan are likewise at the present moment deposited along with the wild species of the group in the gardens, and the whole forms such an exhibition of "Porcorum genus omne" as has certainly never before been brought together. We may add, as the most recent piece of intelligence on this subject, that one of the female peccaries has just produced a young one, the first instance in which this animal has been known to breed in England.

THE BABIRUSSA, RECENTLY ADDED TO THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S GARDENS, REGENT'S PARK.

THE HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY'S NEW GARDENS AT SOUTH KENSINGTON.

THE change of local from which, until very recently, took place at Chiswick will shortly be revived with increased splendour, and under much more favourable circumstances, at Kensington. An attempt was made two or three years since to provide increased attractions to the gardens, to extend the privileges of the fellows and members of the Horticultural Society, and to add implements of all kinds to the display of the productions of horticulture; and great efforts were made to clear off the liabilities of the society and place it upon a sounder and more healthful footing. The Prince Consort accepted the office of president of the society, and his Royal Highness succeeded in rallying the leading members and restoring it to something like the prosperity of its earlier days. The Horticultural Society is also indebted to the Prince Consort for obtaining possession of rather more than twenty acres of land at Kensington, upon which new and more splendid gardens are now in course of construction.

The gardens, when completed, will be certainly the finest, for their size, in Europe, and, surrounded as they will be by open and covered arcades, ample shelter will be afforded from the wet and cold. At the northern end of the ground, and commencing at about five hundred feet from the Kensington-road, will be erected the conservatory—a fine building, with a circular glass roof, four hundred feet in length, and about half that in width. The front of this will look down upon the whole extent of grounds, and doors open from it upon the level of the ground to the first of the terraced walks in front. There will be three terraces immediately in front, communicating with each other by broad flights of stone steps. The walks will be bordered with tastefully-formed flower-beds, and on right and left will be a small basin of water. On each side of the conservatory, and communicating with, it will commence the ornamental arcades, designed by Mr. Smirke. They are in the Italian style, and consist of open arches, which support the upper terrace, so that promenades will be provided under cover, as well as upon the top of the arcades, affording accommodation for either wet or fine weather. The arches open on to ground on the inner side; the outer divided into compartments by ornamental brickwork.

This portion of the arcade, forming the top of the garden, is a semicircular in form, and the curve terminates on each side in large handsome square pavilions, one of which will be used for refreshments. Descending from the third terraced walk, and keeping in the centre of the garden, the first object met will be the memorial of the Great Exhibition of 1851, placed upon a granite pedestal at the edge of a large basin of water. Ten feet beneath this memorial there will issue forth the waters of a cascade, supplying many thousands of gallons per hour, and keeping active the whole water system of the grounds. From this basin the water will be led by underground conduits to smaller basins on the right and left, from which in turn it flows to other canals and ornamental pieces of water, and thence returns into a deep well, to be again pumped by steam-power, and again sent on its course. Still keeping along the central walk, which is forty feet in width, the next object of interest will be a large circular bed, formed entirely of box embroidery. This style of garden decoration is a revival of the mode adopted in the time of Louis XIV. It consists of elaborate designs formed entirely of box edging the pattern or design being filled up with earth and gravel of different colours. The effect of this embroidery is most pleasing, and in winter or dull weather especially it is the more pleasing on account of the freshness of appearance which the box presents. A little further on are two large panels of this same description of embroidery, one upon each side of the great walk. The design here consists of a handsome foliated scroll, surrounded by an exquisite border pattern. On the slopes by the side walks, to the right and left, are four smaller panels of this embroidery, the designs represented being "The Rose," "The Shamrock," "The Thistle," and "The Lily," all in various parts of the gardens other specimens of this elaborate work are to be found. Several of these panels are already completed. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort have shown the deepest interest in the progress of this part of the garden, and have on several occasions visited the ground to watch the development of these charming horticultural pictures—worthy to be the handiwork of Flora and her attendant nymphs. The sunk-garden in the lower part of the ground is laid out with a view to planting out flowering shrubs and evergreens, and in one part of it a maze will be constructed for the enjoyment of visitors who, not content with the "mighty maze" of life, seek to discover artificial labyrinths. The open corridors or arcades will be continued on each side of the garden from the square pavilion at the top, and also along the south side of the garden, forming a continuous walk under cover of rather more than three-quarters of a mile in length. The side arcades are also after the designs by Mr. Smirke. The front of the arcades is formed into compartments, each of which has four pairs of ornamental stone columns, carrying three semicircular arches. The lower arcade is from a design by Captain Fowke, the arches being supported by ornamental terra-cotta columns. An elegant council-chamber for the Horticultural Society, available for small flower shows, has been erected on the east side of the garden, and communicates with the arcades, and through them with the gardens. The site for exhibitions of flowers is at the extreme south of the ground, but, when the weather is unfavourable, the exhibition can be held in the arcades, pavilions, council-chamber, and other covered portions. The ground is abundantly supplied with broad and convenient walks. In addition to the central walk, there is one upon each side, and a broader walk in front of the colonnade upon three sides of the ground. Including those on the upper terraces, there are not less than six walks, which cross from east to west, and one of these is carried by an ornamental viaduct over the walks.

The whole of the works are being carried out under the direction of Mr. Eyles, the late chief gardener to the Crystal Palace; and the gardens will be completed by the 5th of June next, when they will be opened by a rural fête which for extent and variety will surpass anything of the kind that has ever yet been held. Prizes to the amount of more than £800 are offered by the society. There is every reason to believe that her Majesty and the Court will be present on the occasion of the inauguration of the new gardens.

We give an illustration of the way in which the Horticultural Society are removing large trees to their new gardens at Kensington Gore. The subject before us is a fine specimen of the deodar, 26ft. high and 18ft. through, which was removed from the society's garden at Chiswick. Its weight, with the ball of earth attached, was not less than eight tons.

The mode of operation is as follows:—After the tree had been duly prepared, a strong platform of wooden planks was placed under the ball of earth containing the roots. The sides were also secured by means of planks and short boards to prevent the roots from being injured. The transplanting-machine was then placed over it, and by means of powerful screws and chains it was raised to the required heigh for removal, and was carried in a vertical position to its place of destination. The society intend to remove a considerable number of large trees in this way with a view of producing an immediate effect in the new gardens. We are glad to learn that some of the fellows are materially assisting the council by donations of trees. Lady Holland has contributed several fine trees from the plantations of Holland House; and W. Gibbs, Esq., of Lyntenfield, has presented to the society many handsome red-twigged lime-trees from his estate at Bristol.

ST. PAUL'S DISTRICT CHURCH, KENSINGTON.

To meet the requirements of the important and rapidly-increasing neighbourhood of Onslow-square and South Kensington, a church (of which we give an Engraving) has been commenced, and will, it is hoped, be completed and consecrated on the 24th inst. This church is calculated to contain about 1600 sittings, of which one-fourth will be free, or let at a nominal rent, for the benefit of the poor. The style of the architecture is Perpendicular. The height of the roof is 37 feet, and the spire is 160 feet high. Mr. Preske, the owner of much of the property in and about Onslow-square, has contributed £5000 towards the cost of the church, besides having granted a site free of expense. Contributions have been received or promised amounting to more than £2000, and about £3000 more is required, which it is hoped persons interested in the erection of the church will contribute, and thus enable the Incumbent (the Rev. Capel Molyneux) to enter upon the duties of this important sphere without the serious responsibility and practical incumbrance of a heavy debt.

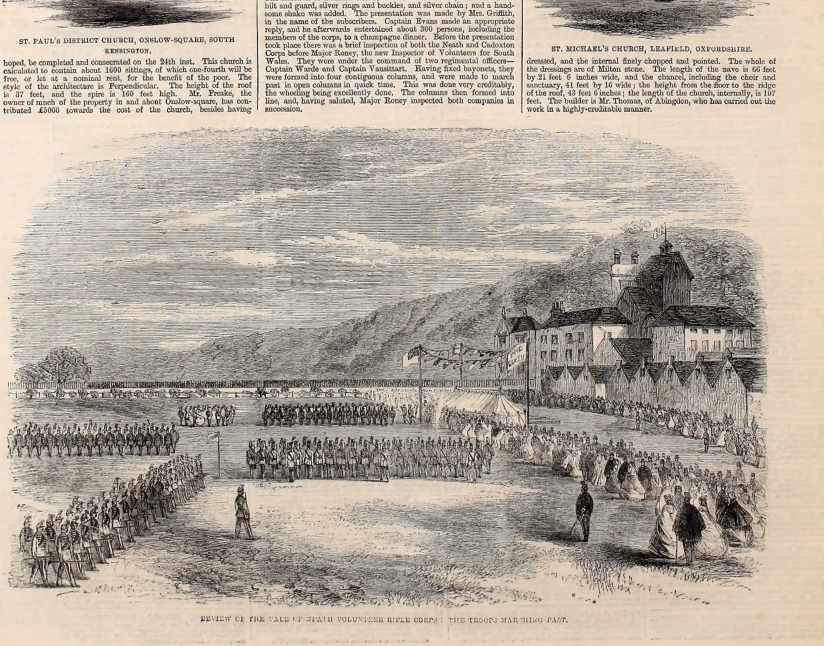
PRESENTATION TO CAPTAIN E. EVANS, OF THE VALE OF NEATH RIFLE CORPS.

THE 17th Glamorgan or Vale of Neath Rifle Corps have presented their Captain with a handsome sword and shako. Captain Evans, when the volunteer movement first developed itself, determined to raise and equip a corps, to be composed exclusively of members of an establishment of which he is the head—the Vale of Neath Brewery—and the corps is now nearly a hundred strong. The men and their friends having resolved to present him with a sword, a subscription was raised for the purpose, and on Monday, the 19th ult., the presentation took place. The sword is of Damascus steel, with silver scabbard, embossed silver hilt and guard, silver rings and buckles, and silver chain; and a handsome shako was added. The presentation was made by Mrs. Griffith, in the name of the subscribers. Captain Evans made an appropriate reply, and he afterwards entertained about 300 persons, including the members of the corps, to a champagne dinner. Before the presentation took place there was a brief inspection of both the Neath and Cadoxton Corps before Major Roney, the new Inspector of Volunteers for South Wales. They were under the command of two regimental officers—Captain Wards and Captain Vassittart. Having fixed bayonets, they were formed into four contiguous columns, and were made to march past in open columns in quick time. This was done very creditably, the wheeling being excellently done. The columns then formed into line, and, having saluted, Major Roney inspected both companies in succession.



NEW CHURCH AT LEAFIELD, OXFORDSHIRE.

ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH, Leafield, near Witney, Oxfordshire, the first stone of which was laid by Lady Churchill on All Saints' Day, 1853, was consecrated a few weeks ago by the Bishop of Oxford. The style of the new church is Early English, from the designs of G. G. Scott, Esq. It consists of a nave, with north and south aisles; a chancel, also with aisles; and a vestry at the north-east corner, with a vault under for hot-air apparatus. There is a central octagonal tower and spire, surmounted by a weather-vane rising 145 feet 6 inches from the ground line. The tower is ornamented by four double lancet windows, with Milton stone shafts, moulded bases, and carved capitals; and the spire by four gabled single lancets, similarly decorated. The nave is divided from the aisles by a bold arcade of four bays on each side, supported by circular piers, with moulded bases and square capitals, from which the arches spring square, with bold labels over them, above which are inscriptions painted on zinc: the clerestory windows are square-headed triplets, with detatched mullions, standing fair with the inside of the wall. The tower is supported by four massive piers, with rich carved capitals and deeply-moulded arches which rise nearly to the bell floor. The whole of the roofs are of stained deal, open framing, plastered between the rafters, and covered with felt under the Stonesfield slate. The sittings are open, of pitch pine, stained and varnished, and will accommodate about 500 persons: 250 of these seats are free and unappropriated. The church is entered from the west by a deeply-recessed doorway, with a carved medallion in the tympanum; and on the south by a handsome porch. It is built of local stone, the external face of the walls being hammer-dressed, and the internal finely chopped and pointed. The whole of the dressings are of Milton stone. The length of the nave is 66 feet by 21 feet 6 inches wide, and the chancel, including the choir and sanctuary, 41 feet by 16 wide; the height from the floor to the ridge of the roof, 43 feet 6 inches; the length of the church, internally, is 107 feet. The builder is Mr. Thomas, of Islington, who has carried out the work in a highly-creditable manner.

GUINEA EDITION OF BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS, in two volumes, each containing sixteen Sonatas, in cloth, plain 10s. 6d., BOOSEY and SONS' New Edition of THE NEW PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MR. ABRAHAM LINCOLN, who has just been elected President of the United States, was born in the county of Hardin, in Kentucky, on the 12th of February, 1809. His grandfather, who emigrated from Virginia into that State in 1781, was killed by the Indians whilst he was engaged in clearing his lands. His son, who, like himself, was very poor, also died prematurely, and left a widow and some children, one of them being Abraham, then aged six years. The widow, with her children, after a while, took up her residence in the south of Indiana, and there Abraham in course of time reached man's estate. In stature he is almost gigantic, being six feet three inches. His mother was able to give him but little education—in fact, he passed only six or eight months at school. He was in succession a farm-labourer, a woodcutter, and a boatman on the Wabash and the Mississippi. In 1830 he went to the State of Illinois, and earned his living for a year by working as a labourer in the fields; and then he got a place as a shopman, and afterwards enlisted as a volunteer in a company which was raised at New Salem to take part in the war in Florida against the Indian tribes headed by the chief called the Black Hawk. He served with credit, and was promoted to the grade of Captain. On his return to Illinois he took up his residence near Springfield, the capital, and has ever since resided there. In 1832 he was a candidate for a seat in the Legislature, but failed. The year after, however, he was elected, and he sat during four Sessions. During this time he studied law, and, having become an advocate, practised with great success at the bar of Springfield. In politics, to which, whilst following his profession, he paid great attention, he joined the Whig party, and was a warm supporter of Henry Clay. In 1846 he was elected to Congress, and continued to belong to it till 1849. He was a strong Abolitionist, and repeatedly expressed his sentiments on the subject of slavery. In the stormy debates which took place on the Wilmot proviso he bore an active part, and voted not fewer than forty-two times for that measure. He opposed the war with Mexico as unconstitutional. From 1849 to 1854 he kept aloof from the political arena, devoting himself exclusively to the exercise of his profession. In 1854 he was the candidate of the Whigs for the dignity of Senator for his State, but was defeated. In 1856 his name was at the head of the list of electors of Illinois, who voted for Fremont, in opposition to Buchanan. In 1858 he was unanimously designated by the Republican Convention of the State to succeed Mr. Douglas as Senator, and a warm contest took place between him and that gentleman. Both visited every part of the State to harangue the populations; Mr. Lincoln boldly declaring for the abolition of slavery, and Mr. Douglas standing by what is called squatter sovereignty. Fortune was then adverse to Mr. Lincoln, his opponent having been elected. The nomination of Abraham Lincoln at the Chicago Convention as the Republican candidate for the Presidency, and his election to that high office, are events too fresh in the recollection of our readers to need any recapitulation.

The personal appearance of Mr Lincoln is thus described in the Chicago Press and Tribune:—"Mr. Lincoln stands six feet four inches high in his stockings. His frame is not muscular, but gaunt and wiry; his arms are long, but not unreasonably so for a person of his height; his lower limbs are not disproportionate to his body. In walking, his gait, though firm, is never brisk. He steps slowly and deliberately, almost always with his head inclined forwards, and his hands clasped behind his back. In matters of dress he is by no means precise. Always clean, he is never fashionable; he is careless, but not slovenly. In manner he is remarkably cordial, and at the same time simple. His politeness is always sincere, but never elaborate and oppressive. A warm shake of the hand and a warmer smile of recognition are his methods of greeting his friends. At rest, his features, though those of a man of mark, are not such as belong to a handsome man; but when his fine dark-grey eyes are lighted up by any emotion, and his features begin their play, he would be chosen from among a crowd as one who had in him not only the kindly sentiments which women love, but the heavier metal of which full-grown men and Presidents are made. His hair is black, and, though thin, is wiry. His head sits well on his shoulders, but beyond that it defies description. It, nearer resembles that of Clay than Webster, but it is unlike either. It is very large, and, phrenologically, well proportioned, beckoning power in all its developments. A slightly Roman nose, a wide-cut mouth, and a large complexion, with the appearance of having been weatherbeaten, complete the description."

A great Republican jubilee was held on the 20th ult. at Springfield, Illinois, the home of Mr. Lincoln. It was intended primarily as a congratulatory county meeting, but it unexpectedly assumed vast proportions, and was attended with a demonstration of the greatest significance. The town of Springfield was illuminated in the most brilliant manner, and the most intense enthusiasm was displayed. The Wisconsins formed in procession and proceeded to the house of Mr. Lincoln: he was forced to appear before them and make a short address. The words he spoke were few, but their import, so far as they had a bearing upon the present agitation, was extremely conciliatory. He spoke as Citizen—Friends and Fellow-citizens—Please excuse me on this occasion from making a speech. I thank you for the kindness and compliment of this call. I thank you for your attendance with all others who have, by their votes, to indorse the Republican cause (Applause). I rejoice with you in the success which has so far attended the Republican party. We in all our relations let us neither express nor cherish any harsh feelings towards any one by his vote. (Cheers, with cries of Good enough.) Let us at all times remember that all American citizens are brothers of a common country, and should act together in the bonds of fraternal feeling (Hammers and cheers). Let me again beg you to accept my thanks and to excuse me from further speaking at this time." Among the other speakers was Mr. Trumbull, whose remarks were listened to with great interest, as indicating what will probably be the policy of the incoming Administration.—He said that Mr. Lincoln, although the candidate of the Republican party, as chief magistrate, will neither belong to that party nor any party. When he as ready to defend and protect the State in which he has been elected—a State against any encroachments upon its constitutional rights, as the one in which he has received the largest majority. The Republican party are fortunate that they have in power to prove that they have never intended, and do not intend, any encroachment upon the rights of any State or section.

STORM-SIGNALS.

DISASTROUS accidents sometimes have the effect of rousing mankind's attention to sudden shock, and of causing it to become fully alive to facts, the importance of which they had been but dimly conscious of before. The frightful gales of the autumn of last year, and particularly that in which the Royal Charter was wrecked, have called special attention to the storms which in the late autumn and winter so frequently desolate our coasts. It is well known that for some time before the arrival of the storm she becomes, by the fall of the mercury, given notice of its approach; and that, if these indications be attended to, and the proper precautions taken for the safety of ships, the yearly record of lost vessels would be much less than it unfortunately does now. Continued and extensive observations have also shown that, while the prevailing winds on the British coasts are from the west and south-west, winds from the north-east and east are also frequent; and that a gale begins from the south or south-east it frequently veers by south to west, while it commences if coming from the north to north-west, thus having the character, in being rotatory, of a true hurricane. The general direction and character of cyclonic storms have been described and illustrated in this Journal.

The storm-charts which have been constructed under the superintendence of Lieutenant Maury at the United States' Observatory have now been possible it is to deduce from many individual observations the laws which regulate the movements of the storms in existence. It has been found that in the North Atlantic Ocean the first part of the course of circulating storms runs nearly parallel to the north-west, and that the rotatory storms of the northern hemisphere revolve from right to left in a direction contrary to that of the hands of a watch or clock.

It is hoped that what has been done for America will generally may in time be accomplished for the coasts of Britain. And it is proposed that the knowledge already obtained by constant observations shall now be allowed to remain dormant. The storms which originate in the middle Atlantic at once be made useful, at least to all those vessels which, of the British shores.

A series of observations on the storms of Britain have been for some time in progress, and have resulted in the conviction that they are cyclonic in character. In fact, the course of the cyclones in the case of the wreck of the Royal Charter gale of the 25th and 26th of October, 1859, and of the storm of the 1st and 2nd of November following, have been ascertained. It has also been found that storms from the south-west, which come on gradually, are followed by storms from the north-west, which are sudden and very violent. Of the former of these the barometer alone, and of the latter that instrument with the thermometer, give sufficient warning.

The barometer which have been and will be employed for public use to seacoast towns and fishing villages have been and will be of great service in proper warning, which can and will be given, to the lives and property.

A plan of utilizing barometrical and meteorological observations was laid before the British Association in July last by Admiral R. Fitzroy. The plan is now under the beginning of practical consideration and operation. Daily, between eight and nine a.m., telegraphic communications are made from a certain number of places to the central station in London. These relate to readings of the barometer, to the state of the wet and dry thermometer, to observations on the direction and force of the wind, on the properties of clouds, and on the character of the sea. The information sent from five of these places—namely, Hull, Portsmouth, Dunrose, Cork, and Galloway—is telegraphed forward to Paris; and a communication, giving the results of similar observations made at the French ports, is returned. Communications are also made to Copenhagen, the Hague, Berlin, and Lisbon. The Continental messages reach London between one and two p.m. The barometrical observations are immediately recorded for index error, and reduced to the standard of temperature of 32° mean sea level. The whole of the observations are then tabulated according to a prescribed form.

Should there be no signs of bad weather, no further notice is taken of the communications; but, should it be judged that notice has been given of a coming storm, messages are sent back to each of the telegraph stations; and the signals which imply that a gale is to be looked for from the south or from the south are hoisted accordingly.

These signals consist of a cone and a drum, both of which are made of canvas, painted black, and stretched upon hoops. They are about 3 ft. 6 in. in height, and about 3 ft. in diameter, and present a similar appearance from all points of view. The drum is a cylinder; the cone, and, in case of special danger, a second cone is added under the drum.

The approximate direction of the wind is indicated by the position of the cone—the points uppermost showing that the wind is to be expected from the north-east, south-east, and south-west, and the point below from the south-west.

3. Cone with point upwards.
4. Cone with point downwards.

8. Cone and drum.

The diagrams Nos. 1 and 2 show the cone and drum separately; and 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, the signals as hoisted on poles erected for the purpose.

These signals are supplied not only to the telegraph stations, but also to all coast-guard stations intermediate between them, which have direct communication with London. When notice is sent that signals are to be hoisted they are repeated from one telegraph station, which receives the message from London, as far as the next, by means of the coastguard stations. It is expected that by these means the signals will be visible at each coastguard station in a single night round the coast in about four hours after the observations are first made.

Ships within sight of shore will thus be warned, and will be able to make arrangements to meet the coming storm. It is to be hoped that these measures, wisely carried out, will assist much in diminishing the probabilities of shipwreck on the crowded coasts of our country.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK.

His Grace Henry Granville Fitzalan Howard, fourteenth Duke of Norfolk, Earl of Arundel, Surrey, and Norfolk, Baron Fitzalan, Clun, Oswaldestre, and Maltravers, Hereditary Earl Marshal and Hereditary Chief Butler of England, Premier Duke, standing immediately after the Princes of the Blood Royal, and Premier Baron of England, was the eldest son of his Grace Bernard Edward, K.G., Duke of Norfolk, by his wife, Charlotte Anne, daughter of George Granville Leveson Gower, Duke of Sutherland. He was born the 30th of November, 1815, and succeeded his father, 25th of August, 1856, and Trinity College, Cambridge. He was early in life in the Horse Guards, and was for some years A.D.C. to the Duke of Richmond, when Governor-General of Canada. He was returned to the House of Commons from 1837 to 1851, and for Limerick from 1841 until the dissolution in 1852, when he succeeded to the title of Earl of Arundel, and in right of an ancient barony created by writ in 1295, which, and which he was entitled to sit in the House of Lords, and took his seat on the Woolsack on the 5th of February, 1857. He was a magistrate for the counties of Middlesex and Sussex, and as Earl Marshal and Hereditary Chief Butler of England, and Master of the Queen's Household, and his conscientious sense of justice in these different capacities was remarkable. He had also a seat in the Privy Council, and filled the honourable office of Lord Lieutenant of the county of Norfolk. He was a Roman Catholic, but by no means a bigoted one, and was, in fact, a thoroughly religious and good man. In public life he came but little forward, and seemed to shun sought him exceedingly, and was universally respected. He married, first, in 1839, Lady Augusta Mary Minna Catherine, eldest daughter of Sir Edward Granville Lyttelton, Bart., by whom (who died in 1845) he had no issue. She wedded, secondly, Lieutenant-General Sir Edward Lloyd, K.C.H., Colonel of the 7th Dragoon Guards, and by him (who died in 1860) she had issue. Her Grace, the present Duchess, is the second daughter of the late Sir Alexander Dixie, of Bosworth, Leicestershire, Bart., and was married, first, to William Sidney, Esq., of Oulsley, in the county of Salop, and, secondly, to Henry James Sheldon, Esq., of Brailes, in the county of Warwick, and Lords Arms, married to the late Sir Wolston Willoughby Dixie, eighth Baronet of Bosworth, in the county of Leicester. Her Grace is therefore descended, as of great antiquity in Ireland, and distinguished in the military annals of the kingdom both in ancient and modern times. Sir Robert Dixie, Knight, played an important command during the Irish Rebellion, and three of her ancestors attained the rank of General in the British service—Generals Henry Eustace, Royal Engineers—and the Right Honourable Sir Wolston Dixie, Bart., M.P., was the general Lieutenant-General Sir John Scott, of Scott's Grove, Capital Burgess, Lieutenant-Colonel of the Militia of Malmers. Her eldest brother, the late Rev. Charles Wolston Dixie, Rector of Market Bosworth, was created by the Lord Chancellor of England and Ireland "as having established his right to the dignity of Baronet by virtue of the letters patent of the 4th of James I., and the Viscount were reversed." The representation of the family of Eustace and Dixie is now vested in Sir Wolston Dixie, Knight, Alderman, and Lord Mayor of Trimlestown's nephew, Captain Charles Beamont Eustace. Lady Trimlestown was at the time of her death in her eighty-seventh year.

SIR EDWARD M'DONNELL.

This highly-respected citizen of Dublin, who during his useful public career has done so much for the great prosperity of the Irish railway system, died at the residence of his son-in-law, Mr. M'Donnell, Esq., of Rosbuck, in the county of Dublin, and not without a brief notice. Inheriting position and fortune from his father, Edward M'Donnell, as a man of business much enhanced his private property and reputation by his energy, integrity, industry, and talents; and his public life was equally deserving of the highest praise. He occupied a distinguished place in the ranks of the Irish public men. As Municipal Council of Dublin he discharged the duties of civic representative with ability and zeal, and as Chief Magistrate of the city with much precision and dignity during the year of the Exhibition, 1854. On the death of Mr. Carr, Sir Edward M'Donnell was elected to the Board of Directors of the Great Southern and Western Railway Company in May, 1848. For many years previous to his death he was chairman of that line, and acquired under the presidency of Sir Edward. The trunk line was scarcely completed as far as Cashel when the various branches since opened by the company were not in existence. This national undertaking may be said to have had its birth in 1844, when the deep interest in the line of south property was scarcely exceeded by his attention to his own private affairs. The formation of the company was finally completed in 1845, and the line, from Kilkenny, Cork, by the Earl of Clarendon, then Lord Lieutenant, in 1846. At all public meetings Sir Edward was a prominent figure as chairman of the company, Sir Edward was a prominent figure as chairman of the company, Sir Edward was a prominent figure as chairman of the company,

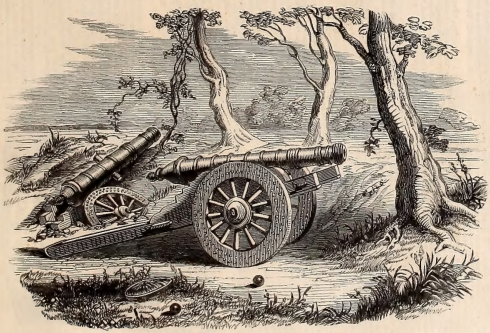
LITERATURE AND ART.

EVERYBODY by this time has seen the new penny. The "Académie Française" has its "Dictionnaire de l'Académie Française," which is the authority for the spelling of the French language; and we who hold that the English Academy should be established, and that it should publish a dictionary which should be the authority for the spelling of the English language, have long been of opinion that the Mint should publish a penny which should be the authority for the spelling of the English language. The "Académie Française" who hold their disputations in the Jardin des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres," who hold their disputations in the columns of the daily press immediately fall foul of the legend inscribed on the newborn coin. "Why Britt- with a double t?" asked one, on the newborn coin. "Why Britt- with a double t?" asked one, an Academician, who, as becomes a Frenchman, is somewhat ignorant of matters commercial; accosted us, suppose to the euphonious Greek coin of "Rule Britannia." It has been shown since that the double consonant is perfectly correct; that her Majesty is Queen of "all and in Britains," just as the classical plural is in "Britt." Thus, too, "coss" is fully entitled to the classic authority of "Britannia metalla" for "counties;" and "Britt" for "Reverende Fires" and "Ll. MM." for "Leges Majestatis." A graver objection to the penny is made by a correspondent in which her Majesty's profile is exposed. We exceedingly regret that in which her Majesty's profile is exposed. We exceedingly regret that "ea pia bona ars semper et ubique fovenda," for the sake of the kingdom of Italy, or even the charming Imperatrice of the Russias, of which the Queen has hailed little silver five-rouble pieces of Russia, of which the Queen has hailed little silver five-rouble pieces from Russia, with which they were presented with Siberia by the Government for defacing the coin of the realm.



On the 17th inst. the great jewellers, Messrs. Christie and Manson, have no such the very valuable musical library of Mr. John Hullah. Surely in a column dedicated to literature and the arts we may be allowed to call attention to the claims of a gentleman who has done so much for Music, the satire of Letters and Science. The Hullah is entitled a fairly sale by auction, and doubtless the ensuing week. But it is a labour of love of, and a taste for, music into the very rudest of the people of a new world, and to whose indigeneity and love of song he fallen upon now that, as our opportunity offers for all lovers of art to come forward and purchase, if possible to get into the country, the whole of the world and prove "fancy prices" for the works in Hullah's library, and the sum of the sale to accumulate to the advantage of the fund. We swell the proceeds of the sale to accumulate to the advantage of the fund. We swell the proceeds of the sale to accumulate to the advantage of the fund. We swell the proceeds

BRITISH COINAGE.

As our object in relation to the earliest coinage of the Anglo-Saxons is to give only such a general view of minting in those times as may be interesting to the public we shall endeavour to eschew whatever is doubtful and provocative of controversy in the subject.*

Leaving, then, the mystic period which immediately followed the departure of the Romans from this country to be studied in the pages of Rolling, Leake, Lindsay, and other numismatic authorities, we shall prosecute our inquiries into the progress of the coinage from the days when Egbert contrived to unite the larger portion of the petty kingdoms of the Heptarchy under his sole dominion, at the beginning of the ninth century. "The greatness and glory of this Monarch," says Lindsay, "consisted rather in the swallowing up of the other subject States, and in the new styling of the heirarchy by the name of England, than in having a larger dominion at the end of his predecessors." His establishment of a mint in other States, or rather his incorporation of them with the West Saxon Kingdom, of which original Mint the Kentish Mint was then upon the whole that name of which we are to this day so proud, has unquestionably elevated Egbert from the ranks of the Heptarchic Kings made him for all ages a man of mark. He may, in truth, be said to have been the First King of England, and little fact alone will justify the preference accorded to him in these articles.

It is unfortunate, perhaps, for our purpose that his coins are all of them of workmanship so artistically and numismatically speaking. Mr. North has remarked that "the money of King Egbert is so rude and so bad as to be considered almost as, especially as that of some of his predecessors, and of Offa in particular, exhibits a degree of elegance and finish." On his coins he is sometimes styled Rex alone; and sometimes Basileus is added in a monogram within an inner circle of the obverse. It may be generally observed, however, that they are inferior in all respects to the rest of the Saxon money. The cause of the deterioration is a question which has given rise to much discussion, and has been variously and discussed, but which cannot, that we know of, be satisfactorily explained. In our previous article it was intimated that the coins of special workmen were engraved by each of the Anglo-Saxon Monarchs and such of their privileged officers as were permitted to exercise the art, but will take the trouble to refer to the report of the Royal Mint Commission published in 1849, he will find it there stated, on competent authority, that the coining process of coining was abandoned in this country "about the end of the ninth or the beginning of the tenth century."

In the second place, he takes exception to our assertion that the Saxons did not decline the honour either with regard to the appearance or the standard of their coins. Now what says Ruding?—"It has been conjectured, but on no sufficient grounds, that the Saxons were, before their arrival in Britain, entirely ignorant of the art of coining, and that they had not any current money. But this latter opinion is contradicted by numerous passages, two by none more forcibly than by their early coinage in this island, which, instead of imitating the Roman coins, as it would unquestionably have done had the Saxons been unacquainted with money before their arrival here, differs from it not only in type, but in the more essential points of weight and fineness."—p. 21. In reply to his last observation, that the coins of the Saxon gold coins, we have only to commend to his attention the following passage from Lindsay:—"That gold was at a very early period coined by them appears from a passage of Bede, quoted by Wise, p. 228, 'Aurum illud auditum quod de caelis venerat.'" Lib. iii. c. 8.

ANTIQUE SILVER SHOE-BUCKLE.

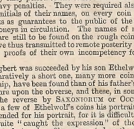
A FEW weeks ago, as recorded in this Journal, William Jenkin, an ore-dresser, of Redruth, Cornwall, dragged up in Falmouth harbour an antique silver shoe-buckle, one of a pair which, from its pattern, little defaced by time, the name and title of an illustrious warrior of old—Sir George Bryges Rodney, Admiral of the White. This buckle is now in possession of the Hon. Sarah Munby, sole surviving daughter of the late Admiral Lord Rodney.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

The second complementary convention edict to the Commercial Treaty between England and France, has been published in two decrees; the one having been signed on the 16th ult. by the Emperor, and the Imperial decree on the same day. It regulates the import duties on all the manufactures of cotton, linen, and woollen textile fabrics, in whatever material, and brings these hitherto entirely prohibitive duties more or less moderate duties; indeed, the new duties, the greater as well as the ad valorem duties, which have been adopted in the case of prints and other similar cases, ranging in general between 10 and 20 per cent, will here cannot be much doubt entertained that in good made of wool, as well as of cotton, flax, hemp, &c., a considerable trade will spring up between the two countries in consequence of this reduction.

The general scope of the supplementary convention to the French Treaty is thus indicated by a contemporary:—

Manufactures of wool, previously prohibited, are to be admitted at 15 per cent ad valorem, reduced to 10 per cent in 1864; hosiery of pure wool, equally excluded hitherto, is to enter under similar conditions; blankets, which were formerly charged 240f. per 100 kilogrammes, will pay 15, and ultimately 10, per cent; and carpets of all kinds, the duty on which was from 360f. to 600f. per 100 kilogrammes, are to be charged 15 per cent ad valorem. The duty on lead-ores and on lead in pigs, which is 10f. 50c. per 100 kilogrammes, will per cent ad valorem; and the duty of 3f. per 100 kilogrammes hitherto levied on lead in sheets, pipes, and shot, is to be reduced to 2f. 50c. in 1861, and to 2f. in 1864. Cast-iron, wrought-iron, and steel, unhammered, rolled, hammered, and hoked, paid 8f. 40c. per kilogrammes, all others being prohibited; new single yarns of pure wool, bleached or not, are admitted, according to their fineness, at from 50c. to 1f. per kilogramme. Cotton goods are placed upon an equally advantageous footing. Cotton yarns unbleached, certain yarns unbleached, certain qualities of which were charged 1f. 60c. per kilogramme, all others being excluded, are now admitted at a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem, or 1f. per kilogramme, according to their quality; bleached and dyed yarns, heretofore prohibited, are admitted at the same rate. Cotton tissues, unbleached, unbleached, and dyed), velvets, fustians, quilting, dimities, damasks, counterpanes, and printed cotton goods, will pay 25 per cent ad valorem, but for furniture or hangings), have been up to this time under the ban of absolute prohibition, will pay 30 per cent ad valorem. Flat cambrics, varying according to the quality and value of the goods, but ranging in some cases from 1f. to 1f. 25c. and 1f. 50c. per kilogramme, will pay 25, to 3f. per 100 kilogrammes. Linens also come in for a considerable reduction of duty, and the new tariff will be found to be one which affect our commerce, but will quite sufficient to promote a considerable extension of trade; damasks, for example, which were formerly charged 600f. per 100 kilogrammes, and 100 kilogrammes, being now admitted at 12 per cent ad valorem (or about 100 kilogrammes, being now admitted at 12 per cent ad valorem (or about 100f. per 100 kilogrammes). Linen thread, lace, and cambrics, lace, and embroidery, which were formerly duties having been reduced from 1f. 20c. to 2f. 80c. per kilogramme; on lace, 15 per cent ad valorem; and on hosiery, 1440f. per 100 kilogrammes, will pay 25 per cent ad valorem, or were formerly from 1f. 80c. to 7f. 20c. per square metre, is now fixed at a duty of 1f. per metre for the former, and 2f. for the latter. Articles hitherto prohibited, pay respectively 1f. 20c. and 2f. 60c. per 100 kilogrammes; and glassware and looking-glasses, which the convention has also been excluded, may enter at a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem. Tiles, bricks, and drainage pipes are placed on the same footing on common tiles, which from 1f. to 1f. per 100 kilogrammes; fine earthenware and fine stoneware, prohibited up to the present time, will pay 25 per cent ad valorem, for the present to 15 per cent in 1864; and porcelain of all kinds, paste, and biscuit, is to pay 25 per cent ad valorem, in lieu of the present impost, which ranges from 180f. 60c. to 222f. 60c. per 100 kilogrammes. Such are a few of the leading features of the convention.



It is stated that the French Government has obtained from dealing with the Zollverein Government the right of free shipment of merchandise in order to give it an opportunity of negotiating with other Continental countries in favour of a more liberal policy in regard to the exportation of rags.

The Gazette de Liège says:—"The manufacture of arms in this city is constantly increasing. Not less than 600 men, more than doubled, the wages of workmen have tripled, and certain arms which formerly cost 1f. 60c. to 2f., now cost 5f., 6f., and 7f. The increase in wages has had the effect of giving to greater skill on the part of the workmen."

The Congress of Paris has been reopened, and, to the great delight of the Russian population, the opening discourses were given in whose language was spoken by each of the plenipotentiaries was hearing once more their native tongue, the tongue which for eleven years Germans—the language of the foreigner and the hated conqueror—had proscribed.

THE SOVEREIGNS OF EUROPE.—We copy from the Almanach de Gotha for 1861 (its 90th year), which has just appeared, the following information respecting the Sovereigns of Europe:—Emperor Napoleon III. at present, including the dispossessed Italian Princes, 47 Sovereigns, of whom 20 are Catholics, 17 Protestants, and 10 of the Greek Church. The youngest, Prince Henri XXII. of Reuss Greiz, is 14. After the King of Würtemberg come the Landgrave of Hesse-Homburg, 73; the King of Saxony, 69; the Schaumburg-Lippe (who is since dead), 68; the Duke of Nassau, 67; the King of Prussia, 64; the Grand Duke of Oldenburg, 63; the King of Bavaria, 59; the Grand Duke of Hesse, 58; the French (the Emperor excepted), 57; Victoria, 56; the King of Sardinia, 54; and the Emperor of Austria, 50. The youngest Sovereign is the Prince of Reuss Greiz, whose age we have already recorded. The oldest Sovereign is the Prince of Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, 88 years; the Duke of Anhalt-Dessau-Cothen, 84 years; Prince Hohenzollern-Hechingen, 82; the King of the Netherlands and Baden, have reigned from 30 to 39 years; fourteen, comprising the Kings of Prussia, Würtemberg, Saxony, Hanover, and the Emperor of Austria, from 11 to 19 years; eighteen Sovereigns, among whom are the Emperors of the French and Russia, the Kings of Italy, the Kings of Sweden, the two Siciles, and Sweden, have reigned less than ten years. The last Sovereign who succeeded to the throne was Duke Charles Frederick of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, who succeeded to Meckleburg-Strelitz." Since the work mentioned above appeared, Prince Adolphus George of Schaumburg-Lippe, Ambassador at London, has died on the 21st ult.

THE VEIL.—The Journal du Loiret relates the following:—"Mlle. Blanche de Beauval, a wealthy heiress of Orleans, was about eight months ago left by her parents, married to the Viscount Chauvy, but on the bridegroom elect was in delicate health he was recommended to go to Italy for change of air. The marriage was postponed until his return. The Viscount, however, never reached his destination, having died on his way thither, and the intelligence of his death caused the grief-stricken bride the veil. Her resolution was carried into effect a few days ago, at the Carmelite Convent of the Rue d'Ulm, in the presence of a large crowd. At four o'clock the doors of the chapel were filled with persons who had been invited to be present, and soon after a long train of carriages arrived at the convent. Mgr. Saint Mille, son of Mgr. de Beauval, in the prime of youth and beauty, entered the chapel leaning on the arm of her father, and was dressed in a magnificent white satin trimmed with lace; a wreath of orange blossoms confined her long flowing veil, which fell gracefully over her shoulders, and she held a white satin prayer-book in her hand. She was conducted to the seat prepared for her, and the officiating priest delivered a short address, in which he pointed out the duties she had undertaken to perform, and the vows she was about to take upon herself. In a moment after the curtain was drawn and she was seen on the other side of the grating on her knees. The priest approached and asked whether she still persisted in her resolution to quit the world, to which she replied in a firm voice, 'Yes.' On this, one of the nuns who was standing by removed the bridal wreath and veil from her head, let her beautiful hair fall on her shoulders, and then with a scissors severed the tresses close to the head. A murmur of regret was heard among the fashionable persons present, and many were observed to sob. Mlle. de Beauval then left the chapel, but reappeared in a few minutes after, dressed in the habit of a novice. She now knelt on the step near the altar, and a funereal cloth was thrown over her, the priest recited the prayers for the dead, and the 'De Profundis' was sung, while the persons in the chapel were sobbing."

which has endured so many centuries in the course of which it has which will probably become obsolete only when the present system of money has also succeeded by one of decimal subdivision.

There is little, if any, doubt that the earliest and most common coins of the Anglo-Saxons were the silver pennies, and that the value then the penny by one-twenty-fifth part. The sceatta was the smaller coin of the two, and of the remainder little is known to the beginning of the tenth century. The etymology of the latter has occasioned much curious speculation. It first occurs in the laws of Ina, King of the West Saxons, who began to reign about the 688. In the legislative documents of this Monarch and in those of his successors it is spelt penig, pening, peninig, penning, and pending. By some the word is derived from pendo, to weigh; by others from pecunia, to knock. One writer suggests that it comes from pecunia, and another has sought it in Greek. The most plausible of those theories is that which refers the word penny to pendo. If that etymology be allowed, it seems probable that the penny was unknown to the Saxons before their arrival in Britain, but was adopted, together with its name, at the same time that myrse—the origin of mint, from moneta—was introduced. By the word "penny" it is held that the Saxons intended a species of money of which 240 were coined out of one pound of silver. This number, of course, gives 24 grains to each penny, and makes the pound equal to 5760 grains.

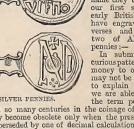
In time the larger sums were not unfrequently computed in pennies, and in one ancient record it is shown that so many as 3000 pennies constituted the payment of a little bill. Even halfpennies and farthings—coins too diminutive in size and value one would think for our gigantic appetites—were also coined in Egbert's time.

To return, however, from this digression. It is only needful further to observe of the silver coins of Alfred that the name upon them generally is either simply ALFRED, or ALFRED REX, whilst in his charters it is ALFRED REX ANGLORUM ET SAXONUM. The reverses of the coins bear, in some instances, the name of the moneyer by whom they were minted, and in others a monogram of the town where the coins were struck. Thus, in the first Monogram given above the monogram is that of London, whilst the second bears the name of the moneyer who struck it.

Alfred the Great died in the year 901, and his son Edward, distinguished by the name of Edward the Elder, succeeded to the throne.

As if to compensate for the little attention paid by his immediate predecessor to the coinage, Edward appears to have been literally moneymaker. He established mints in many parts of the kingdom, and as a consequence his coins are numerous. Many of the smallest are pretty generally believed to have been coined in several previous reigns, and to a single specimen have been assigned a date anterior to his. As the laws enacted by Edward the Elder are estimated by shillings alone, we may as well glance here at the probable origin of the word. In the Anglo-Saxon language that of Love" shilling" is considered to be a Saxon word importing merely money. Jonius, on the contrary, deduces it from the Greek word Tessaron, and Wise is derived from scilion, to sound, "ut propria sit nummus tinniens sono integro percussus." Lye, however, derives it from the Saxon word scylle, or from scealg, to scale, and then concludes that it meant so much silver cut or slit in China. Mr. Clark, again, asserts that the Anglo-Saxons and Saxons borrowed their money terms generally from the Romans, trace the word shilling from scillicus, "which signified in that language a quarter of an ounce, or the eighth part of a Roman pound." From scillicus, he says, came scille, scilla, scilling, for so the Saxons always wrote it. Mr. Clark, however, forgets that the Romans called the Saxons borrowed from the Romans a coin which was the forty-eighth part of a pound of silver. We have no further comment on the remarkable coincidence of proportion, for, as the Roman and Saxon money pounds were different to each other, it is impossible that coins which formed the 48th part of the Roman pound could correspond in similarity than that which arose from their bearing the same proportion to the Saxon pound. Of the other derivations we are the opinions of the chief authorities on this matter, which, like many others previously alluded to, must be left in unequivocally unpenetrable mist.

It is a noticeable fact in relation to the coins of Alfred's immediate successor that, although the names of no less than seventy-five different moneyers appear on the reverses of extant specimens, there are no such names upon the obverses. Edward's coins bear his name and title alone. His title upon them was invariably EDWARD, or EDWARD REX. The word ANGLORUM, too, is rarely found upon them, and almost always adopted instead of it.



On the death of Edward, which occurred in 924, the throne was occupied by his son Athelstan, a Monarch to whom we are indebted for the clearest laws and regulations concerning the coinage which have been promulgated during the whole course of those enactments, are of a very singular and stringent nature. In a grand synod, the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by numerous Bishops, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and a number of "noble and wise men, it was enjoined that there should be throughout the whole realm of money throughout the realm. At the same sitting it was ordained that no coins should be minted except in "cities," and that death was the enactment which savours too much of the barbarity of the good old times. A moneyer found guilty of dishonesty in his vocation was to have a hand cut off, and "hung upon the mint-smith's door," and to be nailed to the mint, as a warning to his fellow-craftsmen! When accused of fraud, he was, however, allowed to clear himself by the "ordeal iron" and, if he managed to pass through the terrible ordeal unscathed, he was to be "quit" of the charge, and his hand was not amputed. Failing to do so, the hand was forfeited, and disposed of in the way described.

The cities, as this synod it was provided that there should be in Canterbury seven moneyers—four belonging to the King, two to the Archbishop, and one to the Abbot; in London, eight; in Rochester, three—one for the Bishop, and two for the King; in Winchester, six; in Lewes, two; in Hastings, two; in Hythe, two; in Romney, two; one; in Shaftesbury, one; and one in some other burgh then unenumerated.

The comprehensive and explicit rules propounded by Athelstan were not without effect. Much confusion had previously arisen from the fact of various moneyers belonging to the same mint using their exclusive peculiar dies. But on nearly all the coins of this Monarch the name of the moneyer and that of the town at which they were minted marked upon them; and this, no doubt, was a voluntary arrangement of the local moneyers, as they became answerable only for their own work.

To show still further the care taken by Athelstan in everything that had related to money-making, it should be stated that in his laws it is recorded that in the course of almost every coin which was at any time in circulation under the Anglo-Saxon Kings. Thus the laws of misdemeanours are estimated in sceatts, pennies, thrymsas, shillings, and marks; but, for the purposes of illustration, we have already spoken. Of thrymsas and mancuses it will only be necessary to say that the first was equivalent to three pence, and that the latter a Saxon word signifying three; and that the thrymsas appears to have been equivalent to three-fifths of the shilling of 12 pence, and to three-fourths of a shilling when that coin subsequently reduced to four pence. The term mancus was probably of Italian origin, and derived from the Latin word mancus, meaning maimed. The value of the mancus has been distinctly recorded by Archbishop Ælfric, who says that one hundred mancuses, or 3000 pennies, were equivalent to 30 shillings. There are writers who affirm that the term "mark" arose from that of mancus; but, having discredits the supposition, we always use the mark was clearly of Danish extraction.

As has been previously remarked, Athelstan absorbed nearly all the which amount to above a hundred. On the death of Athelstan, in 940, his brother Edmond occupied the throne for the short period of six years, and was succeeded by another brother, Eadred, whose seal, upon his death, was filled by his nephew, Eadwig. In these reigns the instructive practice of impressing the names of the towns which gave them birth on all the coins of the realm fell into complete disuse during the whole period, with the exception scarcely any materials of interest for our annals of the British coinage.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

THE GLACIER THEORIES are again discussed, being brought forward in Fraser's Magazine for December in a favourable yet discriminating article on Dr. Tyndall's "Glaciers of the Alps." The writer, in conclusion, expresses his concurrence with the views of Dr. Tyndall, whose explanations, he says, "though they may not embrace the whole truth, probably involve a large proportion of it. At all events, the progress of the subject is now considerably advanced, as accurate experiment, and not an vague imagination has been introduced into the reasoning."

THE NEW PLANETS have been named as follows:—No. 60 (discovered by Mr. Pogson on Sept. 13 last), Titania; No. 61 (discovered by Mr. Goldschmidt on Sept. 19), Danaë; and No. 62 (discovered by M. Chacornac on Sept. 12 last) is still unnamed.

THE CONDUCTION OF HEAT BY GASES.—From a course of experiments Professor Magnus, of Berlin, has obtained the following, among other results, with respect to hydrogen gas:—"It conducts heat more rapidly than any other gas, and higher in cause than it conducts heat like the metals; and that it conducts heat and electricity under the same laws, namely, proportionally."

THE SENSIBILITY OF THE HUMAN EAR FOR THE PITCH OF MUSICAL NOTES.—M. Fessel, of Cologne, on testing the new Puritain tuning-fork reserved took he heard differences of pitch of one-fifth of a vibration heard with the right ear being somewhat higher than that heard with his left. On examining the matter, M. Fessle he has not as yet found out, among amateur musicians, whose ears are precisely alike in the estimation of the pitch of musical tones. He conjectures that the reason for this difference is temporal, probably, that the external passage of the ear is set in vibration, like a speaking-trumpet, by the sonorial that rider it, and that the sensation of pitch is the pitch of the entering sound according to the form of the individual ear.—Philosophical Magazine.

FOSSILS FROM GREECE.—M. A. Gaudry has exhibited at the meeting of the French Academy of Sciences a magnificent specimen of the fossil bones recently brought over by him, being the results of his excavations at Pikermi. Some of the bones are considered to have belonged to a great animal about fourteen feet and a half in height, the leg and shinbone being about three feet and a half in length. A massive and radius of another animal, although broken at the extremity, measure more than thirty inches, consequently exceeding in size all the fossil bones which they have considered to have belonged to a dinotherium.

CHEMISTRY OF ZINC AMALGAMS.—Sir H. Davy, in 1826, discovered that an amalgam of zinc has more chemical affinity than pure zinc. M. J. Regnauld has also published a memoir on the subject communicated by him to explain the phenomenon. He concludes that it is due to the differing electricities of the metals combined, and to the consequent production of the electrical stains of soft iron and steel.

THE ELECTRICAL INDUCTIVE SPARK obtained from Ruhmkorff's apparatus has been repeatedly investigated by Du Moncel, who among other experiments repeated the spark in the action of powerful electromagnets, and discovered that it was affected in precisely the same manner as the electric arc by which the ordinary electric spark is influenced by the magnetic force. The Philosophical Magazine for December contains a note on this subject by Dr. P. Riess, of Leyden, who, after giving an account of his experiments, by which he obtained the same results as Du Moncel, expresses his trust that physicists will admit that he and Du Moncel are justified in considering that "in the inductive spark the point of light is to be attributed to the resistance of the ether which charges successively in the secondary and the secondary wire, while the luminous atmosphere is produced by the electric fluid continual in the parts of the wire nearest to the solid points.

PHOSPHORUS IN THE ATMOSPHERE.—A memoir on this subject has been read before the French Academy of Sciences by M. Berral. In 1852 and 1853 he detected appreciable quantities of phosphate of lime in the ash residue of various rain-waters. Having for the last few years had analysed many specimens of waters collected at Paris, and has been led to conclude that there are more lime than the amount of phosphoric acid in the air at Paris than in that of the country. The presence of phosphorus in the air he attributes partly to the action of the sun's rays on phosphuretted hydrogen, and to the emanations of phosphoretted hydrogen from decaying animal matters in the soil, and partly from manufactories of phosphorus. M. Berral and Fatteur show what an important part these small particles of matter play in the production of cryptogamic plants, and in the nutrition of the vegetable, and confirm the scientific doctrine that the atmosphere contains all that is necessary to feed the most sterile soils.

THE DECOMPOSITION OF BODIES BY HEAT AND DISSOCIATION form the subject of an elaborate paper in the Philosophical Magazine for Dec. by St. Claire Deville, the eminent mineralogical chemist. He first considers those compounds which at the ordinary temperature of the air, as carbonic acid, nitric acid, and nitrogenous compounds, oxides of the precious metals, &c., which nevertheless are decomposed with more or less facility by heat, and which he explains by a theory that nitrogenous compounds, particularly the explosive ones, are endowed with a temperature of maximum stability, which is the limit for the state of stable equilibrium of their molecules. Molecular attraction in bodies produces certain definite molecular groups which constitute their stability, which vary with the temperature. This diminishes as the temperature is increased, and at a certain temperature they enter into a state of partial "dissociation." For an account of the wonderful phenomena connected with this subject and the conclusions derived from it, we must refer our readers to the paper itself.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY elected a new council on the 30th ult. Sir B. C. Brodie has been prevailed upon to retain the presidency. The several councillors, viz., nominal, eminent writers, and the treasurer and secretaries. A response is represented by Mr. J. C. Adams, the discoverer of the planet Neptune; a profound mathematician by Mr. Boole; a chemist by Dr. Odling; the physical sciences by General Sabine (the treasurer), Messrs. W. H. Miller, C. G. Barlow (secretaries), Professor J. Tyndall, Dr. Hooker, Professor Stokes, Mr. W. Fairbairn, of Manchester; the medical sciences by the president, Dr. Sharpey (secretary), Sir Henry Holland, and Dr. Hooker; natural history and geology by Professor T. Huxley, Dr. Hugh Falconer, and Mr. Alex. Henfrey; civil engineering by Colonel Portlock, Mr. Vignoles, Mr. Graham; Dr. A. Williamson, and Colonel Sykes; and miscellaneous political science by Mr. Grote, Sir J. G. Shaw Lefevre, and Dr. W. Farr.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.—On Monday last Dr. E. Frankland, D.C.L., was elected honorary member in the room of the Rev. John Barlow, resigned, who was at the same time elected a manager. Both of these gentlemen have delivered courses of lectures at the evening discourses at the institution. Mr. Barlow gave a course on Mechanics in 1851, and on the Science Applied in 1852, in which he showed the use of several laboratory lectures on Animal Chemistry, a branch of science in which he is regarded as a high authority. Dr. Frankland's course in 1857 was on Chemical work containing an account of his experimental researches in scientific chemistry, and in 1859 on Chemical Physics, which he repeated in the Royal Polytechnic Institution in 1857, of Making Water. Both of these courses were edited by him. At the same meeting the Rev. Alex. Dennys, and E. Smith, Esq., were elected members of the institution.

THE NORTH LANCASHIRE DIALECT.—Prince Lucien Louis Bonaparte has for some time been engaged in collecting specimens of the country for some philological purpose. The "Song of Solomon" was selected by him for the several translations, and the following specimen, which is given on behalf of his Royal Highness, the assistance of some gentlemen conversant with the dialects of the northern parts of the kingdom has been requested, and completed to the satisfaction of the Prince, by Mr. James Pinkerton, of Lancaster, the well-known author of "Dialogues in the Lancashire Dialect." Reporting that specimens of three of the dialects spoken to govern the dialect of the district:—1. The dialect of the fells and dales; 2. The dialect of the Lancashire Coalfield; and 3. The dialect of the sea-coast. The change of the sound of a to "ee" into—1, a, as in "art," as "kaar" for "know"; 2, ah, the first sounded like a in "art," the second like that of the word "bone," "stain" for "stone," "stah" for "stone," &c. 3. A change of a as in "ee," into ai as above—thus "gaain" for "gain," "taake" for "take," "waake" for "wake," "waaid" for "wait," "gaid," "caild," "taild," &c., which are pronounced "gaid," "caild," "taild," &c. 4. The frequent substitution of ee for "oi" as "ee" for "oi" (or in "er") for "oi," "ran" for "one," "we" for "with," "ivery," &c. "hev" for "have," "hes" for "has," with numerous alterations occur in many other words, as will be plainly seen in the text. 5. A further pronunciation of the letter a at the end of a word—"ma-ma," "gave," "take," "make," are commonly sounded "gav-e," "tak-e," "mak-e," but more frequently "gaav," "taak," "maak," are the sounds represented in this translation.—Lancaster Gazette.

A WEAK CHIEF'S CHASTISEMENT.—The following story of feuds committed by a pseudo clergyman is told by a local journal:—The estate of Rudloch, in Wiltshire, finding himself in debt, and in order to raise a sequence of ill health, advertised a few weeks since for a clergyman to perform his duties, and shortly afterwards received a communication from a person calling himself the Rev. William Simpson, whose testimonials were highly satisfactory. The worthy secretary accordingly, on the gentleman arriving, nothing with him but an empty carpet-bag) with a decent story of having lost his luggage on the railway; and Mr. Rudloch, with his personal kindness, put him at quantity of plate for his use. His first attack was on a neighbouring clergyman for a short, after which he patronised several tradesmen in Devizes for clothing, boots, confectionery, groceries, and other articles to a large extent. After two or three Sundays, however, the Bishop of Salisbury's request to have an inspection of his letters of orders became too pressing to be resisted; and, finding the plate getting too warm for him, he suddenly decamped, with his carpet-bag full to bursting of Mr. Bradford's plate, and no end of articles of clothing, &c., which he had ordered in the name of Mr. Rudloch. The testimonials were of course forged.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. GILBERT.—No. 1 is very pleasant; and the other, though less elegant, is difficult and well worked out.

D. L.—The problem by Mr. Bolton, which we mentioned last week and which adorns our present Number, is the first of a series of three which he has composed on the same theme, the merits of which were collected by the Society of the Chess-Players, and a prize was offered and given to the party who first sent in the correct solution. The conditions, we believe, were that it was to be solved within a given space of time, and without the chessboard being moved.

E. H. Brighton.—Certainly, should bestow more pains upon his problems, or, at least, spare us the trouble of looking each move twice before we can be sure that the last solution of the most obvious solution in two moves—1. P to Q 4th (ch), 2. Q takes P. Mate.

J. S. Tavistock.—Unfortunately it has been, by a mistake, overlooked for that fact in the published variation White may play 3. Kt to K 4th, and Black to Q to R 4th.

J. Wright.—Your solution is correct, and we have received it through only the others sent.

X. Y., and E. Z.—Our solution of Problem No. 874 is precisely correct. The move regretted by the latter correspondent is the only one that will do. The others are all defective.

The following are the names of the successful solvers of Problem No. 873:—Rev. G. Bird, Mr. Bolton, Mr. Bull, Mr. Boyd, Mr. Bowyer, Mr. Bloxam, Mr. Bell, Mr. Bird, Mr. Bird, Mr. Bird

INDIAN TAXATION.

"HAPPY is the country that has no history," says the proverbial philosopher. If there be any nation on the globe that is, or has been, entitled to enter into this charmed category, at least it cannot be British India. There have been occasionally times when the recurrent arrival of the mails have failed to create that temporary and spasmodic interest which it is to be feared is alone excited in the minds of the English public in regard to that country; but those times have been few, and generally far between. Indeed, those periods of tranquillity and absence of exciting intelligence have usually borne the character of that lull which in nature precedes the tempest. We have had enough, and to spare, of tidings of wars waged for the acquisition and the defence of territory, the necessary products of a policy which in a great empire is supposed to be that of glorious and paternal annexation, but which in a partisan leader on the Spanish Main would have been rank buccaneering, or, as the modern phrase goes, filibustering. Then came the culminating horror of the mutiny in the Native Army, which by a somewhat illogical sequence has brought about a governmental revolution in our Eastern empire; and now we have before us a prospect not a little alarming of a civil—not merely native, as we apprehend—rising against the plan and purpose of taxation which, in conformity with the new system of administering the affairs of India, has recently been brought into operation.

There can be no doubt that the native population are either actively or passively obstructing the collection of the income tax. From about a number of cases of a like description we select a few instances in which are shown the results of the first attempts at working the new impost. At Simla, when the qualified officers explained to a gathering of natives, such as shopkeepers, dishmerchants, &c., that they would have to pay the income tax, the announcement was met with disapprobation, and loud complaints were made of their having to pay four per cent on their profits, and there was a general declaration that the tax was most distasteful to them. At Dumpore, it is stated that income tax operations had been carried out vigorously by the authorities, but the result, in the shape of collections, it was expected, would not be at all commensurate with the exertions of the assessors. At Moulmein, we are informed, matters assumed a still more serious aspect. When the news arrived that the income tax had passed into law the Commissioner, instead of carefully translating the wording, and explaining the nature of the law, sent native policemen round the town, and even into the houses in the interior, to explain the act after their own fashion. These men, perfectly ignorant of the duty imposed on them, went about circulating most exaggerated ideas of the law, and telling the people that they must by a certain date send in returns of their property, and on the gross value of which, of every description, the tax was to be levied. When the forms to be filled up were distributed it was found that even the value of their wearing apparel was to be inserted, and great excitement ensued. Threats were uttered that the shops and factories would be closed. Petitions were presented to the Commissioner; and, at deputation having waited upon him, they were merely told that their representations would be forwarded to Calcutta if they chose, but that the authorities would not in any account wait for a reply or stay the operation of the tax, which would be collected at all hazards, even if in doing so the town and country were reduced to the fishing-village and jungle which it was thirty-five years ago. The next day a deputation, consisting of native merchants, accompanied by a large crowd of natives, was received by the Commissioner. That functionary repeated his threat of reducing the district to a jungle, and a cry arose from the assembly that they would not pay the tax. A guard of sepoys were ordered to disperse the people, and, ludicrously enough, the Commissioner is described as taking his hat and stick and in person driving the crowd a considerable way from the Court House where they had assembled, but failed to disperse them. The statement goes on to say that the Europeans were determined passively to oppose the tax, and placards were posted about stating that determination, and containing expressions most insulting to the Commissioner and even to the Queen.

In another district it is said that the blank forms issued to the natives are so badly worded that the people cannot make out what has been demanded. Some taking with them the blank forms, wandered in the street, asking friends whether they could by any process translate the Government vernacular into that of the people. Some repaired to the office of the Commissioner, but found that the officials there were in as complete a difficulty in this respect as themselves. It is asserted positively that the native mercantile community have no objection to the assessors, either as to their competency for their work or their maintenance of that honourable reticence which is essential to the satisfactory working of a tax like this. It is also stated that uneasiness with regard to the working of things accompanying the collection of the tax prevails in Scinde, in Pegu, and in Martaban. In short, the whole of the Indian population is in a state of ferment.

Without going further into details, it may be remarked that some of the facts stated above present serious causes for alarm. It was not too much to expect that the collection of a fiscal imposition of so delicate and exceptional a character as that which is here complained of would call all the good sense and patriotic feeling of Englishmen at home to enable them to endure with patience and forbearance, should have been carried out with the utmost care and the greatest tact. Instead of this, it would seem that the details of the necessary machinery are imperfect, and the practical working of some of the officials intrusted with an important duty by no means conciliatory or judicious. It may be uncharitable to suggest, but the suggestion is one that involuntarily arises out of the consideration of statements such as we have alluded to, that the unpopularity of the income tax, not being confined to the native population, there is an indisposition on the part of the native functionaries of the State to render its working too easy or too satisfactory. If such be the case, the people who surround the question, obvious enough and numerous enough, will assume a magnitude and a proportion wholly beyond and above anything that could have been expected; and may produce effects which the best auguries of the reformers of the administration of Indian affairs could not have calculated upon.

It is useless for those who cling to the traditions and the usages of the governmental system of the East India Company to refuse to acknowledge and to endeavour to obstruct the progress of what is confessedly an administrative revolution in India. For good or for evil, a new state of things has been inaugurated in that country. The principle on which the appointment of Mr. Wilson was based was that old things were about to pass away and new things to arise: that what was possible in administration, whether fiscal or political, in England, was capable of adaptation to the purposes of Indian government. Amongst the difficulties to be met, and the reforms to be effected, was the disagreeable fact of a yearly discrepancy between expenditure and revenue involving a chronic deficiency. At the present moment every effort consistent with safety and economy is being made expeditiously to adjust the narrow monetary resources of the empire balance, and a deficit of some seven millions had to be provided for. In a similar conjuncture in this country resort was had to an income tax by a statesman to whom when the Duke of Wellington was asking his cost in Hungary. They go from the Austrian capital and the other Ministers of the empire, by railway, to Brünn, Raab, and Pesth.

The Emperor of Austria, it is stated positively, has promised to the Comte-Sclavonian deputation the union of Dalmatia to Croatia and Sclavonia, and the Triune Kingdom to the United Kingdoms, to be governed by a Ban.

M. Kameny has been appointed Provisional President of the Court of Chancery of Transylvania.

RUSSIA.

The Russian Cabinet, in consequence of the elevation of the British Minister at St. Petersburg to the rank of an Embassy, has appointed Baron Brunnow Minister Plenipotentiary of Russia at the Court of St. James.

The decree emancipating the Russian peasants has been signed by the Emperor, and will be published to the people on the occasion on the 1st of January. Various rumours are in circulation respecting the essential character of the great reform; but nothing positive has yet transpired, except the important fact that the personal liberty of the serf is formally stipulated.

TURKEY.

Reports have for some time been circulated to the effect that large quantities of warlike munitions were being accumulated on the Danubian Provinces by Sardinian agents for the use of the malcontent Hungarian refugees in Turkey, and in Moldavia and Wallachia. Circumstance is given to them reports by a despatch from Constantinople, dated December 14, stating that the Sultan's yacht Pote has seized a Sardinian vessel, provided with false papers, and laden with a large cargo of arms and ammunition shipped at Genoa. The Porte has protested against this fraud, and the cargo of treasure which it contributes.

Agitation prevails in the Danubian Principalities. At Jassy the Metropolitan Sophronius and the Greek priests have been arrested and conveyed to a convent, where they are provisionally undergoing imprisonment.

Letters from Adrianople report a desperate fight on the fête-day of St. Demetrius (Oct. 26), in the Greek church of that city between the Orthodox Greeks and the Latin Christians. The latter got the best of it, and turned their opponents out of the church.

GREECE.

The secession movement still continues with undiminished notoriety in South Carolina and the other malcontent Southern States. As far as regards the latter, it does not appear as if South Carolina had counted herself to secession almost beyond the power of retracing her steps. Governor Pickens has addressed a proclamation to the South Carolinians, and argues that the time is gone by even for a conference of Southern States. He has, however, being urged by the extreme party to permit secession without interference on the part of the Federal authorities. The proclamation of business and the critical state of monetary affairs, of course, also operates.

Diplomatic relations between the United States and Peru are entirely suspended, pending the action of the Congress of Congress for jurisdiction.

The latter was visited on the 24th by one of the most violent storms which has occurred for several years. The damage done to the shipping was very great. The Alliance blew a gale in New York. Some damage was done to vessels in the lower bay, but nothing serious occurred in the immediate harbour.

CHINA.

CAPTURE OF PEKIN.—FLIGHT OF THE EMPEROR.

We have two telegrams with important information from Pekin: The Government telegram received last Saturday from Admiral Seymour's Consul General at Alexandria. It is dated November 30, and is as follows:—

Two of the gates of Pekin are in our hands. Parkes and Loch have been captured in the Summer Palace, and Mr. De Norman have died from the effects of ill-treatment. Brabazon and Bowlby were released. The Emperor's summer palaces taken and sacked, affording immense spoil. Emperor fled into Tartary. Prince Kung a prisoner at Pekin and Tien-Tsin. The two Ambassadors at military head-quarters.

Reuter's telegram, which is rather more full, only reached the papers on Tuesday. It is as follows:—

PEKIN, Oct. 13.—Pekin surrendered to the allies this day, yielding to all demands. Parkes, Loch, and Anderson were released on the 8th instant. De Normas and Anderson have died from the effects of brutal treatment. Thomas and Brabazon released. There is little hope of the return of Bredazon, Bowlby, or the French officers missing. The Emperor and his Tartar army have fled, and none of the enemy are to be seen at Pekin. The Emperor's summer palaces were taken and looted on the 6th instant. The quantity of spoil was enormous. The Pekin gates have been given up to the troops, who are now in possession, and encamped on the wall. The allied army will winter in the north. Lord Elgin and Baron Gros left Pekin on Wednesday ready when demanded.

SHANGHAI, Nov. 15.—All is quiet here. A new and distinct rebellion is reported in the province of Shensi; It is said to be led by influential people, and is known as the Lai Ayang rebellion.

It appears that the French Government has refused to transmit £300,000 in silver to China.

It is stated that proposals for a new Sardis Loan will be presented on the reassembling of the Chambers.

The Progrès de Lyons announces that among the great porcelain works which exist in that city, the manufactory of Mr. Lyonnet is the first of all the French railways.

The second session of Electoral Hesse formally agreed last Saturday to the Committee's proposal to declare its constitution illegal; and the Elector dissolved the Assembly on the 5th inst.

Mr. Stuart's exploring expedition has been compelled to return, by the hostility of the blacks, after it had penetrated to lat. 19 deg. 20 min. S., in the country between the Adelaide and Gulf districts.

The proffered mediation of the English Government between Denmark and the Germanic Confederation, it is stated, in the Austrian Lloyd, has been declined by the Prussian cabinet. The question will consequently be settled by the sword, and not by the decision of the representatives of Assembly.

The advices brought by the West African mail state that the monster who is now King of Dahomey has actually asserted 1700 human beings in honour of his predecessor, and his cadre to complete the number of victims to 2000. The European traders (probably Spaniards or Portuguese) have been retained by him as Ministers, in order that they may be witnesses of these appalling sacrifices.

A duel has been fought between two subalterns in the Russian army of the Caucasus—Prince de Gortchekoff and Baron de Fittinghof, in which the latter was shot through the heart. The survivor and two seconds have been arrested, and their documents seized, but no trial will be made, with the consent of the latter, in consideration of his efforts to effect a reconciliation, he has been released to his regular military employment.

AUSTRIA.

A Ministerial crisis at Vienna has terminated in the appointment of Baron Schmerling, a moderate Liberal, as Minister of State. Herr Plener is the Minister of Finance. It is stated that the programme of the new Minister includes revision of the Concordat and the privilege of worship, abrogation of the provisions of the Concordat, and a general constitution of the whole empire, excepting Hungary and Venetia.

On Monday the Congregation of the Comitat of Pesth was opened. The Counts Carolyi and Nyari spoke in favour of the unconditional restoration of the Diet. The Vienna journals publish a telegram from Pesth, dated the 19th inst., asserting that the city was splendidly illuminated on the occasion; and that, though there was much agitation, public order had not been disturbed.

The discontent in Hungary seems rising every day, and finds each day a new channel of expression. The sympathetic excitement in Poland and in Roumania is also a striking sign of the times. Numerous corps of volunteers are being sent to Hungary. They go from the Austrian capital and the other Ministers of the empire, by railway, to Brünn, Raab, and Pesth.

The Emperor of Austria, it is stated positively, has promised to the Comte-Sclavonian deputation the union of Dalmatia to Croatia and Sclavonia, and the Triune Kingdom to the United Kingdoms, to be governed by a Ban.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams were received at Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday):—

THE STATE DEBS. — Hanover, Thursday. — England has accepted the proposal of Hanover, that the third million of thalers for the redemption of the State Debt be distributed among all other States except England and Hamburg, according to their naval importance.

SAVOY.—Berne, Dec. 13.—In to-day's sitting of the Council of the States, M. Almeras, from Geneva, gave notice of an interpellation on the state of the question of Savoy.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Admiral Robinson will, it is said, be the successor of Sir Baldwin Walker as Surveyor of the Navy.

The Board of Admiralty have, it is said, decided on seeking for the services of Mr. Reed, late Chief Constructor of the Navy, as one of the Surveyors of the Navy.

The examination of candidates for appointment to the Commissariat by the Council of Military Education will commence at the Royal College, Chelsea, on Monday, the 15th inst.

A competitive examination for candidates for assistant surgeons in her Majesty's Army will take place in February next, at the Royal Hospital, Chelsea. There will be about fifty vacancies.

The next examination of candidates for admission to the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, will commence on the Vice-President and members of the Council of Military Education on Monday, the 16th inst., at her Royal Highness, Chelsea.

The Treasury have decided, says the Army and Navy Gazette, to lend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, on his resignation of the pension sole interest, according to the Indian scale, as was expected. The decision will create discontent.

The next examination for admission to the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, before the Vice-President and members of the Council of Military Education, will commence at the Royal College, Chelsea, on Tuesday evening next. WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of General Sir Thomas Wynyard, K.H., M.P., of Cockermouth Castle, Cumberland, has been brought into her Majesty's Court of Probate, in bearing date July 17, 1858, and a codicil thereto, dated December 1, 1860. The United Kingdom estimated for probate duty at £70,000. The only legatee mentioned in the will is the adopted daughter, Caroline Wynyard, spinster.

Charles Wyndham, of the 9th Bengal Light Cavalry, to whom he had left the whole of his property, previously to the execution of his will, on the 1st of June 1858, and he had not since made any other disposition thereof. He had also appointed him executor. Sir Henry Lawrence, K.C.B., died at Lucknow, died intestate, and his estate and effects will be shared according to the statute of distribution of intestates. The personal property, estimated at £4,000, is to be saved, having been granted to Elizabeth Lady Wyndham, the relict of Sir Henry, and to the guardians on the 16th of July last, appointed by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, at the age of seventy.

The will of Mr. Thomas Hall, late of Bath, gentleman, residing at 21 Cumberland-terrace, Regent's-park, who died on the 19th of July last, was proved in the principal registry; the personalty being under value £4,000. The executors are the Rev. John Hall, Vicar of Bathwick, Bath, the testator's brother, and the testator's wife, who died in his lifetime. Probate was taken out by the surviving executor. The will is somewhat singular. It is addressed to Mr. Jenkins's own handwriting: it bears date the 20th of October, 1852, and was executed in the presence of and published by two persons who, by their wills that they may "if they choose, close this controversy for ever, and so to confound the plans of the enemy, who is watching for the moment to recognise the principle of emancipation." "What the Dissenter demands is, that his religious principles, his acts, and publishing his own will, and declared that they had to present confession." He disputes the assertion that the levying of the rate for dissenters respecting Acts of Parliament, and the Church of England, of the large towns, he maintains that the great bulk of the population are not "the votaries of rival creeds and establishments," but men who are "ignorant, indifferent, or more unfortunate." He, therefore, puts the question—Is the Church of England to be maintained as the Church of the unchristianised and unbelieving mass." Answering this question to the disappointment of the supporters of the two to design Parliament with perfect fairness, and with a broad issue, in favour of maintaining the union between Church and State, and, incidentally, in favour of church rates." The ground to be taken is, that "on the union of Church and State depend, in a large measure, the happiness, the greatness, and the liberty of England." The right hon. gentleman, who was listened to with preferred attention, sat down amid general applause, and, after discussion, Mr. Lowndes Chesham moved those resolutions, embodying the recommendations of Mr. Disraeli, which were unanimously adopted.

THE COURT.

The Queen has received during the past week at Windsor Castle the reigned husband of Princess Alice, his Grand Ducal Highness Prince Louis of Hesse Darmstadt. The Princess Alice's nursing religion also arrived at the castle for the purpose of attending Princess Alice. ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE PRINCE OF WALES' VISIT TO AMERICA.

MOUNT VERNON.

MOUNT VERNON—once the home but now the tomb, of Washington—is about fifteen miles south from the city of Washington, on the River Potomac. Whilst the Prince of Wales was at Washington, the guest of the President of the United States, an expedition was made to Mount Vernon. On the morning of the 5th ult. the distinguished party embarked, under a double salute for the Prince and the President, and went down the broad and glittering waters of the Potomac. Arrived in front of the famous historical mount, the anchor was dropped, and the party landed. The visit to the tomb of Washington was a most impressive scene. Before it the Prince, the President, and all the party, stood uncovered. It is, as a correspondent remarks, "easy moralising on this subject, for there is something grandly suggestive of historical retribution in the reverential awe of the Prince of Wales, the great-grandson of George III., standing bareheaded at the foot of the coffin of Washington."

Washington's House at Mount Vernon (of which the subjoined is an Engraving) is, according to the Times' correspondent, in shocking plight, and fast going to ruin. The following is his description of the house:—"In the centre of the lawn is a long, straggling, old-fashioned, wooden country-house, three stories high, with very tall, square wooden pillars, supporting a broad balcony, which shades over the whole front. Beneath this, in an irregular square stone pavement is a long, angular, wooden seat, white and almost decayed, placed close by the side of a narrow double-leafed door, from which the yellow paint is worn, and the panels are shrunk and cracked. Above the balcony, with its wooden lattice balustrade, ruined and broken like torn lace, is a sloping irregular tiled roof, green with the moss and damp of many years. Four pointed little gable windows peep timidly from under the eaves of this, while in the centre of the ridge rises a little glass lantern, like a belfry, with a huge rusty weather-cock, and an iron lightning-conductor of great thickness. At either side of the house, curving backwards, are the blanched remains of little vaulted arcades, leading to dilapidated farm-buildings in the rear, while, on the left, another large tiled outhouse, in better preservation, though still in keeping with the rest in swift decay, completes the scene. Such is the first appearance presented by the remains of this world-famous building; such, and no more, are the plain simple features of the house in which George Washington lived and died. Every window in its quaint white wooden front has an interest now; every little peculiarity is scrutinised as you stand amid the silence that belongs to decay, and note its every aspect for memory to treasure up and dwell upon hereafter. The old, faded green blinds are closed over the sitting-room, as if the house was mourning; the others are open, but dim, hollow, and vacant, looking eyes from which the light has fled for ever. The closed windows speak only of death; but there is something in those sightless, glazing panes, stained black with dust, and tapestried with webs; there is a mute, appealing mournfulness in their decay—in the sad efforts which they seem to make to keep the daylight from entrance into the gloomy rooms beyond, that is almost touching; that speaks of one not only dead, but dead and long forgotten. The gaunt white columns are riven with unseemly gaps and crumbling to decay; the bell-wires outside the house are worn to threads and parted, leaving a mouldering, rusty stain along the wooden walls. The upper windows seem to have grown decayed and lost their light, as if from long neglect of use, for years have come and gone since these were wanted—since any faces looked for light from them. The very walk under the arcade has a faint cold echo of the past; the solitary tap, tap from drops of water breaks on the stillness with a ion and which here is noise; the old green-tiled roof droops in slow lands, as if, its duty done, it, too, was slumbering to decay with all the rest. There is a loneliness about the place, about its solitary quiet and formless, that more than clings to tombs; it is the chilly loneliness of the forsaken mansion of one greatest in world's history, left desolate, and never to be used again. The stacks of chimneys stand in sharp outline against a cold October sky, dumb and cheerless, breathing no signs of hospitality or token of life within those mute, white walls. There are no swallows near the building, no people round the place—the vane above the lantern is rusted into quiet, never broken here save by the falling leaves or wind, or ring, drip of water. Here the sun-rays softly rest on the ghastly look, so, all white and empty, its iron bolt rusted and dead, its dim, shadowy-looking windows gazing out the light of a cold October sun to be seen through its little panes. The most bigoted stranger that ever trod within these sacred precincts must feel, even without one thought from his mind, or even a feeling of sorrow that this touching relic of one of earth's noblest dead should be now in such a state and left to such decay!

INDEPENDENCE HALL, PHILADELPHIA.

On the morning of the 10th ult. the Prince of Wales drove through Philadelphia with the Mayor and other officials of the city, and visited several of the public buildings and admirable institutions of the Quaker city. One of the most interesting among the many lions of Philadelphia is the State House, containing the halls of the old Congress, rich in associations with the important acts of the Revolution, and wealthy with its commencement. Independence Hall, the apartment east of the entrance (of which we give an engraving on page 561) is that in which the Declaration of Independence was adopted and signed, and in which Washington was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the army. From this room in the building, on the 4th of July, 1776, the Declaration of Independence was read, and from these steps, also, Washington delivered his farewell address on his retirement from public office. The correspondent of the Morning Post, in his account of the Prince's visit to Philadelphia, says: "Independence Hall—it could not be—is certainly a very interesting relic in itself, and American citizens [of equally interesting descent] from all parts of every Britain, with respect and obeisance, and every stranger, even the with portraits of the heroes of Republican freedom, including two of Washington, taken at different periods of his career, and a splendid full-length one of Benjamin Franklin, which gives a considerable idea of the great statesman's appearance. A philosophic-looking portrait of Washington's mother, a most amiable-looking old lady in a cap and shawl, and the dress generally of the early part of the reign of George III., also attracts much attention. There are likewise portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Penn, the founders of Pennsylvania, and many of the revolutionary Generals. The whole series is to the last degree interesting, particularly to Americans, who are so proud of the founders of their great Republic. Upon the elevated pedestal, adorned with inscriptions and emblems of Liberty, and inclosed within an iron railing, stands the old cracked bell whose deep tones first proclaimed liberty through the land. It was cast in the city, and has the name of the founder upon it, and is very remarkable that the words "Proclaim Liberty" are also engraved upon the rim of the relic. Several original letters of Washington and others are framed and displayed upon the walls, as well as some of the original paper money issued by the revolutionary party. The old rebel brick building, with its chapels and side rooms, and its trees shading its venerable front, affords a striking contrast to the noble marble and stone palaces which tower above it on all sides. It is in all respects a most interesting relic of the past.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

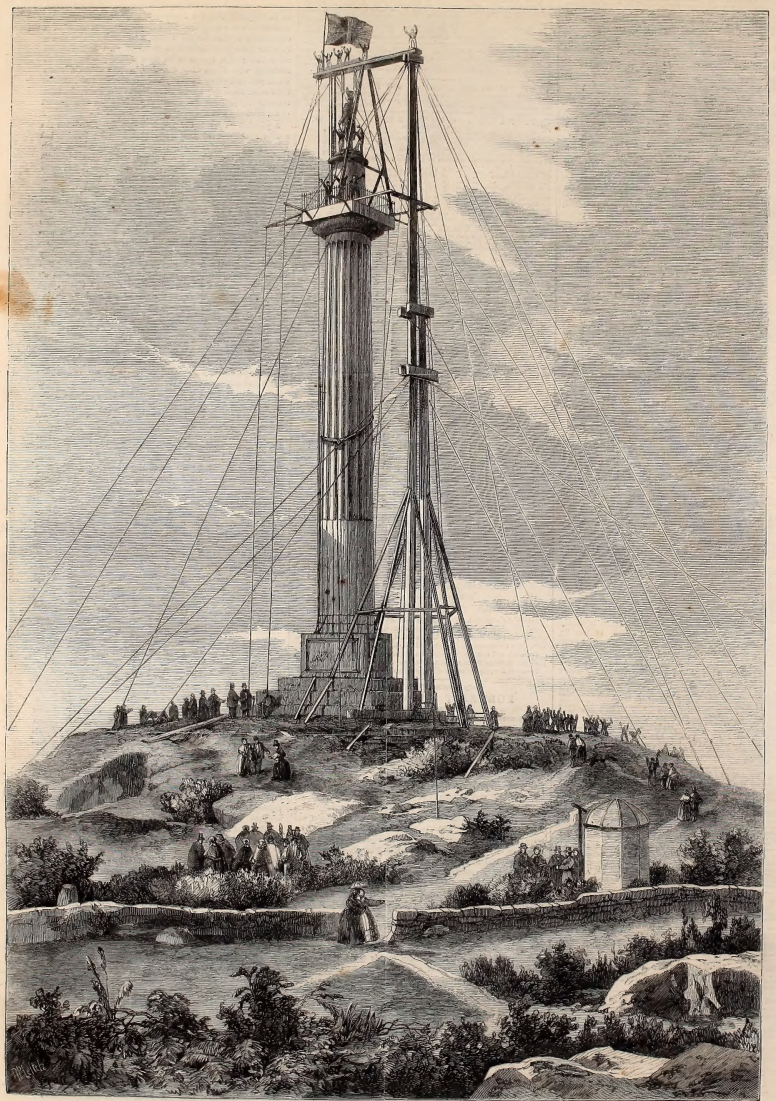
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1860.

THE progress of events in China, striking and remarkable as it is, has tended very materially to extend the dimensions of the question involved. On the face of it there is a curious sense of the ineffectual in the movement of the allied forces at Pekin, the flight of the Emperor, and the occupation of his capital by a force of Europeans whose numbers it would not be a very fatiguing mental effort to count. But there lurks in this brief statement that our Army in winter in the Imperial city a peculiar importance and significance. It also means anything it implies an indefinite postponement of the settlement of the matters in dispute and the beginning of the old circuit round of diplomacy. The absence of the nominal head of the realm will not only add to the difficulties of negotiations on these remarkable functionaries in China whose business it is to carry on negotiations for the sole purpose of having their authority disavowed at the last moment. The absence of the Emperor, however, is decidedly advantageous. It is no longer a question of a brief and successful campaign, and a temporary occupation of the metropolis of the empire. It has reached a point far beyond that. There is a very serious question to be solved by Prince Kung and the remaining two winter quarters, under peculiar circumstances, in Pekin. We in England not too long ago learnt the nature of the cost of the maintenance of a fleet and army at a distance of a few thousand miles; we are, probably, about to become equally acquainted with financial requirements of that nature upon a scale by no means tallying with the mere numerical force of our troops employed in China. While we are incurring an expense which is very easily calculated, owing to the largeness of the figures by which it is counted, our opponents will rely on that vis inertiæ with which they are so bountifully endowed, and it will be a very difficult thing to say, having got into Pekin, when we are to get out of it. It is to be hoped that the fuller accounts which will be brought by the mails will go far to neutralise the effect which has been produced by the telegraphic dispatches. It is, of course, to be supposed that the Plenipotentiaries are not constituting themselves with seeing all due preparation is made for a comfortable sojourn for the winter, and certainly now is the time for these functionaries to prove of what stuff they are made. As things appear to be, their difficulty is to catch an authority with whom they can deal, and to obtain a treaty which will be binding upon any body or for any time. Unless there occur some very special alteration in the state of affairs, it seems very probable that we are as far from the arrangement of our relations with China as ever.

A political "star" has at length deigned to illuminate the sombre firmament of the recess period. Mr. Disraeli has delivered, at Prestwood, in Buckinghamshire, an address upon the subject of church rates, which nobody can accuse him of want of giving an uncertain sound. He says that it has been arranged that the question whether a National Church shall or not exist shall be tried on the church-rate issue, as, in an action of ejectment, the right of cutting down a tree is made to do duty for the right to an estate. Therefore he calls on the friends of the Church to stand by the rate, unless they propose to give up the Church altogether; and in support of his proposition, he avails himself, with adroitness, of the admissions made by some of the ultra-Dissenters before the Parliamentary Committee, to the effect that they regarded the abolition of the rate as most desirable, but only as the means to an end, the severance of the connection between Church and State. The success of the opponents of the abolition during last Session appears to have convinced Mr. Disraeli that a very good fight may be made in the next, and he does not seem to think that the Hierarchy is sufficiently demonstrative. At the same time he appears to be perceiving that the Nonconformists of the present system are great, and he desires to attempt a return to the abandoned plan of taking the money wanted for the Church out of a general parochial rate, not to bear the existing obnoxious name. He also adds exhortations to churchmen to unite upon the question, and use all their energies and influence in support of what he terms the Church. The matter has been too often discussed in these columns to leave it necessary to say more than that Mr. Disraeli's policy is evidently inadequate to meet the difficulties of the case. While alluding to a Conservative demonstration, we may as well add that it is announced that Lord Robert Montagu (son of the Duke of Manchester, and member for Huntingdonshire), who recently obtained near political notoriety by his classical speech in Parliament, is one of the filibusters of the day, to be let loose on the Government "whip" for that party.

Sensation has been created by the announcement of the new French Minister of Public Instruction, that the pens of the future henceforth to enjoy a freedom, which he endeavours to make of still greater value to the Parisian journalists by showing them, in a long historical essay, that it is really not enjoyed in England. Further, he has requested of the Emperor (who is good enough to confess, "I am but a child") as a present hanging over certain of the papers may be cancelled and considered as NON AVENUE. Hitherto, the parties to whom this boon is conceded have not been very gushing in the expression of their gratitude, nor have they shown any disposition to avail themselves of the new license. It may be that they are waiting in order to comprehend more completely what precise value they are to attach to the liberating missive. Some of them think, we fear, that the views of their Government are something like those of the Attorney-General in the immortal "Fudge Family" of Moore:—



My Lord, I venture, as ex-case,
To offer some of the pieces
My only aim's to crush the writers.

Almost as interesting, at least to English readers in cattle-show time, is the announcement that French experiments have shown that the plant called in that country "ail" or "ail royal," the Allium Ialic Latin alias—is extremely valuable for green fodder, a fact which we commend to the attention of our agricultural friends.

Princess Alice, who was born in 1843, is it is now announced, to be married to the heir of the fortunate bridegroom being Prince Louis, of Hesse, who, like Prince Frederick William, is the son of the heir presumptive of a childless ruler. This will, of course, be the domestic event of the season, and all her Majesty's subjects will unite in an affectionate hope that the new matrimonial alliance may be a happy one.

Southwark has honoured itself by electing Mr. Layard in spite of his having come late into the field, and there being arrayed against him all the local prejudices of the borough. Mr. Layard's majority over Mr. Locke exceeds seventeen hundred, and eight thousand of a constituency of 10,000 (in 1860) went to the poll. Mr. Fawcett retired at the end of the preceding week. Southwark has thus not only made choice of a worthy representative, but has done her share in emancipating from the metropolitan constituencies the stigma of being given to elect nobodies, with local influence, rather than men of real mark. Mr. Layard has now a new and bright career before him; and if he avail himself of his advantages, and specially if he avoid giving the petitfogging advocate of Conservatism reason to suppose he sees any opportunity of doing as they did in the Crimean debates—namely, fasten upon minor inaccuracies in order to discredit large accusations, his energy, popularity, and intellect will secure him a front place in the Legislative ranks.

Incomet astonishes seldom spoken of without that "impatience" to which Lord Castlereagh was pleased to fix the adjective "ignorant." Perhaps, in a new case which has arisen, such impatience may always be tolerated. It appears that the dead have to pay as well as the living, and that an executor whose testator's accounts are being made up, is called upon for nine months' tax from the time of the decease of his friend. Sidney Smith was therefore a little in a hurry to conclude his summary of the life of a taxed Englishman, who at last lies down with his fathers to be "taxed no more."

RAISING THE ANGLESEY STATUE TO THE TOP OF THE COLUMN ERECTED TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE MARQUIS NEAR MENAI BRIDGE.
FROM A DRAWING BY MR. W. C. HASLAM.—SEE SUPPLEMENT, PAGE 569.

THE INTERIOR OF ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL, SHOWING THE IMPROVEMENTS RECENTLY MADE, WITH THE NEW EASTERN TRANSEPT IN THE FOREGROUND.

Two years ago the Metropolitan Cathedral would hardly accommodate more than 500 worshippers; since that time, however, congregations of 2000 and upwards have been commodiously placed under the dome during the special evening services; and at this present Advent the choir has been reopened, after a cessation of a few months, with greatly-increased space for the ordinary daily services.

It was never the intention of Sir Christopher Wren to subdivide the length of the church by the organ, which till lately occupied the centre, but he was overruled by the authorities of his day, and the effect of his interior was nearly spoiled. The present Dean and Chapter, however, have allowed his judgment to prevail, and the organ has been removed to the north side to a position chosen by himself, as shown on a drawing lately discovered and preserved among the cathedral records. The solid and gloomy screen which supported the organ has been taken away, and the choir is at present open westwards, and will probably either remain so or be terminated by a screen of an exceedingly light and open character.

To increase the importance of the apse, now, for the first time, seen from a distance, as well as to obtain more room for the congregation, the stalls which occupied the arch nearest the apse are transferred to that next the dome, leaving the easternmost arch open, so that a kind of transept is formed north and south, in accordance with the form of some of the early Basilican churches with several of our own cathedrals—as Canterbury, Lincoln, Ely, and Ripon—and not used for the purpose, with an early design of Sir Christopher Wren, the stalls have also been brought down to a somewhat lower level, by which the general appearance of height and breadth has been increased.

A general impression has prevailed that the interior of St. Paul's was not worthy of its exterior; but the increase of apparent size obtained by these alterations, and the development of the general proportions, will lead indisputably to the conclusion that adequate and suitable colour and ornament alone are wanting to remove this unfavourable impression, and to place the interior on a level with the exterior, for with the already acknowledged magnificence of the exterior.

The choir has been desired exhibited for many years, but has been due since last summer. Four of the leading City companies—viz., the Goldsmiths', the Merchant Taylors', the Fishmongers', and the Skinners' Companies—have generously funds sufficient for, adding the sum of £5,000 arising from the dome and their contiguous saulings, extending about twenty-six feet from the dome, and this work is now rapidly proceeded with. The Goldsmiths' Company also have voted a similar sum for the choir, to that of the Fishmongers' Company, and the Brewers' Company have given a smaller, but liberal, donation. The work is soon for the completion of all the City companies in gilding the saulings and arches alone. Besides the magnificent organ screen, two small pedestal windows, and a memorial pulpit for the dome, have been presented by friends of the house of the same kind. A great organ is now being erected in the south transept, and will stand directly for one of the piers, that, when sufficient funds shall have enabled it to be finished with a handsome case and a suitable number of pipes, this organ will prove not only of great advantage for Divine worship under the dome, but also a splendid and appropriate ornament to the church.

If Sir Christopher Wren had been properly supported when the cathedral was built this work would not be left for this generation to do. He views of the interior of the dome and the saulings should be painted, and of the proper embodiment at its summit of the lantern and cross, which will be the crowning feature in the sun of the great architect.

The cathedral was built during the reign of William III. a second time, and could it have been carried on with rapidity during his reign, it would have been completed in seven years, and have enjoyed the confidence of the Court, and when he would have been allowed to embellish the work in his own way. The larger part, however, of the proceeds of the coal tax which had been set apart for and used in the rebuilding of the cathedral seems to have been diverted to the military expenses of the King; and, as the coal tax was not to cease Anne larger sums were devoted to the cathedral, during the latter part of that reign than in the earlier part of Wren's work, and ultimately was by the Commissioners appointed to administer the funds; and, finally, in June, 1718, was suspended from the office of Surveyor-General, and "one Benson," a creature of the new dynasty, put in his place. The decoration of the dome was intended to Sir James Thornhill, who has painted a work which cannot be commended, for in its way, but violently incongruous with Sir Christopher Wren's design. It was the pleasure of the second Hanoverian sovereign to in a manner now performed, to have beautified the inside of the cupola with the usual accompaniments of monarchy, and to have painted in the cupola of St. Peter's at Rome, which strikes the eye of the visitor at first with great magnificence and splendour in appearance. But, as this art was a great novelty in England, and not generally appreciated, it did not meet with encouragement is deserved. It was imagined also the expense would prove too great and the work of too long time for execution; but, though these and all objections were fully answered, yet this creature was so far flattering to royalty.

Has not the time now arrived for doing tardy justice to Sir Christopher Wren? It is quite clear that the £100,000 voted by Parliament should be as liberal as it was one hundred and fifty years ago? Has not the Corporation of London, who have received for various public purposes the proceeds of the coal tax ever since it was stopped from the bare and unfinished edifice, should feel that nothing could be more much to the glory of the City than to restore to the splendour of their cathedral. The City companies, which have already begun to do a very large hand—for memorials of their wealth to the nobles and gentry of the kingdom, whose ancestors gave large subscriptions towards the rebuilding to expend £60,000, while the posterity of the coal tax for the rebuilding of the cathedrals should still remain faithful in support of this great national work. There has been a subscription during the last twenty years for embellishing our cathedrals and ecclesiastical monuments, but London alone had to share this burden. It is a disgrace that the wealthiest city in the world shall have subscribed less than many of our provincial towns, not only relatively to the size of the city and the inhabitants of the metropolis to remove the reproach to which we are liable in the eyes of foreigners for the unfinished state of the cathedral. It does not lie with the Dean and Chapter to take the leading all these steps; but the capitular revenues, as it well known, have for many years been applied out of their control to Ecclesiastical Commissioners, too, are strictly limited by Act of Parliament as to the purposes to which their funds can be applied, and, therefore, for the maintenance of the cathedral, is barely sufficient for the annual necessary repairs.

A considerable number of noblemen and many of the London bankers and citizens have been, indeed, come forward with handsome subscriptions; but it is the mass that chiefly contribute to make up the importance of this appeal, that the number of moderate subscriptions may show how the people's heart is for the work—a work so important that, by suitably adorning a building dedicated to the worship of God, the glory of thousands of English and other visitors may be encouraged, and the glory of the metropolis enhanced by the improvement of the most splendid ecclesiastical edifice.

Our Engraving represents the interior of the cathedral as seen from the east end, from the new eastern transept in the foreground. The organ of the choir is seen on the north side. Behind the new organ screen (a point not yet decided on, as above stated) the dome is seen, with one of the new proposed pedestal windows, and the semi-circular triangular spaces between the great arches. The smaller cupolas of the roof are also seen, and are enhanced in a similar way to the view from east to west was hitherto entirely lost, in consequence of the interposition of the solid screen and organ, but it is now one of the most striking in the cathedral.

Divine service took place on Sunday week, at the usual hours, in Dean presiding at the morning and the Rev. Canon Gregory in the afternoon. The increased space did not seem to throw any additional strain on the voice of the preacher, and the effect of the alterations to the eye will be more fully appreciated when the hoardings, which at present shut off the dome and the new parts, are removed; but the Dean and Chapter were anxious to resume the services in the choir with the least possible delay.

DEPARTURE OF THE EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH.—Her Majesty and the Queen Consort, accompanied by Princess Alice, Prince Louis of Hesse, and Prince Christian, met the Empress of the French at Victoria Station. On the arrival of the Empress, after quietly surveying the wonders, and making herself comfortable in the royal waiting-room for the short journey to Dover, Mr. Gueglen, Holt Gueglen's Hotel at eight o'clock on Wednesday evening, on her return to France. Her Majesty's luggage, with the exception of her own, had been sent on by the morning mail, and arrived almost unobserved at the railway station. Mr. Tedder, the courteous secretary of the South-Eastern Railway, with Mr. Cooper, the manager, and Mr. Knight, superintendent, were in attendance to receive the Royal party and conduct them to the Imperial saloon in a separate train, composed of the ordinary right-hand train. The Empress was accompanied to the station by the Duke of Cambridge. As the train moved out of the station the custom of cheering baby the august traveller "Godspeed" on her journey homeward. Her Majesty was met at the railway platform at Dover by Mr. Lord, of Lord's Hotel, Eckington, conducted on board the Imperial Government steamer for France, at 10 o'clock on Thursday morning, amidst deafening cheers.

THE SYRIAN RELIEF FUND.—Lord Stanley, M.P., took the chair on Wednesday at a meeting of the general committee of the British Syrian Relief Fund, held at the Caledonian Hotel, to receive a report from the executive as to the condition and prospects of the refugees. It was announced that her Majesty's Government had made a grant of £1000 in aid of the subscriptions, and that the little proceeds a total of nearly £3,000. The report showed that 27,000 persons were in receipt of aims, the largest proportion being women, 17,000 of whom had been relieved in one day at Beyrout. A quantity of material for clothing had also been sent out, and the women and children employed in making it. Many touching illustrations of the approving of the report were agreed to unanimously.

LITERATURE AND ART

It is one of the blessed properties of Christmas that it has something intimately to do with everybody. This is a very homely way of expressing the fact that the great festival abstinence is universally relished by our "everybody" we meant everybody in the realm of England. It is not a religious ceremony is performed on Christmas Day, and all the rejoicing and merry-making, the feasting and the giving are reserved for the first day of the new year. With us Anglo-Saxons Christmas Day is merely Christmas Eve. The Scotch, as well as the very highest, are comforted at that genial time. If her Majesty at Windsor has her loyal household to dinner, the Princess carvers, and Dukes and Earls at their palatial seats rear Christmas-trees for the German children. The Queen's turkey and "goose-chic," the purpose in the union workhouse is regaled with an extraordinary dinner, and the poor children have nuts and oranges in the evening, and the very convicts in the prisons have their Christmas fare of plum pudding. Yes; Christmas comes home to everybody, and everybody is delighted with the advent of the universal holiday. Even the poor author now being crammed with meal in Norfolk with a view to Leadenhall market, "fattening" for Christmas, is, we dare say, not unwilling and gobbling, what fervid invectives would they not pour forth against the inhuman process of fattening on Christmastide!

For persons connected with literature and art, of whom in their vast numbers there must be some thousands in London, the three weeks preceding Christmas Day are a season of unmitigated toil and trouble to which the labours of the crank are but a feathers, and the agonies of the tread-mill are mere child's play. Messrs. Cassell and Co., William Beverley and his brother scene-painters never think of going to bed on Christmas Eve, and Messrs. Judd and Glass, on the twenty-sixth of December, One good night's rest to a scene-painter would be almost equal to the accumulation of the Christmas pantomimes on Boxing Night. Then consider the editors and contributors of the various periodicals that publish extra Christmas numbers. Think upon the draughtsmen, the wood-engravers, the lookbinders and the colour compositors, the publishers, and even the printers' devils. A negro in the Southern States may be worked to death, but a printer's devil is scandalously overworked by his "masse" were he to be compelled to undergo a tithe of the torments and mental and physical misery by the children of literature and art who, their work cuot over, are left to Christmas as best they can, practically as either fate.

Perhaps the most inventive, the most conscientious, taskmasters at Christmas time are the children. We don't mean in the way of toys or sweetstuff, but in the way of literature. Juvenile books are a fad on all those departments of trade. But just look at the children's Christmas books—the books that are to be "given away" when they have over such a glorious congress of rainbows of gay binding and dazzling colours as can be seen anywhere else any week of the year, except in Somerset House to St. Paul's? Animated nature, Sandford and Merton, Harry Bolyn's Pocket, The Arabian Nights, Count Hamilton and the Countess d'Aulnoy's Fairy Tales, Grimm, and Andersen's nursery rhymes have all been laid under contribution for the amusement of the young ones. The best writers for the young are paid handsomely for their books nowadays, and one so longer sees those atrocious libels upon children's nature which, in the days of Goldsmith, were current even after first our boyish fingers fluttered the pages of Mr. Fillikins and the Little Boy who Lived in a Barrel.

Our neighbours across the water have been quite as busy in the production of children's books, and we have been running over a pile of delightful Christmas cases, designed for the instruction and the rising generation of France. The French are ordinarily supposed to lack interest in the young, but the contrary appears to be the case, leading some little child's stories in French lately which Hans Christian Andersen would have been glad to have written. Madame Colomb, or Richard Doyle to illustrate. Here is a charming little story called "Un Conte d'Autrefois," translating tones. A good mamma tells her little girl that she must always go to bed early because she only has two prayers. "Yes, mamma," answers missy; "but mamma! I open them when directly afterwards I've quite forgotten what I've said."

De Keyser's "China," and "Le Tellers Eclisants et Curieuses" are now again at the head of the fashion. Gavarni, Daumier, Grandville, Isabey, Nanteuil, Tony Johannot, Staal, Meissonier, Gustave Doré, Mademoiselle Rosa Bonheur, Madame Colomb, and everybody is trying to "coach up" sufficient Chinese lore to figure in the Christmas Books. People whose acquaintance with the "Middle Kingdom" was confined our remembrance to the Chinese Junk in the Regent's Park grocers' shops now talk glibly of the mighty Foks, of the Imperial Dragon, of the Celestial Empire, and of the Yellow River. Even the "Gates of etiquette" of the Tchang'saking, or Street of Eternal Happiness, are familiar to everybody. Where, then, is the use of a good deal about China of late years; but the Dutch Embassy of Charles II., the Jesuit Fathers, are untivelled for minute details, while Mr. Sutherland Edwards, a young and promising Russian scholar, inform us how it is that the Russians, who have had for years an embassy at Pekin, are so much better acquainted with the Chinese manners and customs in that metropolis where they have had, as already stated, no embassy for years. The Russian language is sufficiently enough at appreciating popular literature; and such a work as the "Songs of the Chinese," translated by Mr. Bowring, may judge from the fact that Mesera. Trübner have in the press a Russian translation of "Must do our readers imagine, of all books in the world?—"Baron Munchausen!"

Still hanging on Christmas, can we deny a word of welcome to the extra number of the Illustrated London News? Why, "Christmas Day on the Sea"? The framework surrounding the ordinary round of Christmas fare is the Christmas Day spent by the crew of a Margate hoy—Ramsgate village, the chief character a "down-east" sea-captain, Silas Gorgan by name, who, as the reader will find, has the mystery a half-destroyed letter found in a bottle, and in which the writer, a lady, begs the finder to give to a doubt of the integrity of the father of a fine young Gallerman. Silas, with his favourite mate, Bill Bowsprit, and Tom Sail's a wonderful steward who, as he walks and talks, is interrupted by the "Ahoy!" of passing vessels, and, in the course of the narration, under all circumstances of distress, is that "people"—meaning passengers. Everybody is going to or when they first come aboard.

The curators of the Museum of the Louvre have just acquired a splendid triptych from the Daniell Gallery in Rome. It is the work in the pencil of one of the early Italian masters (name uncertain), at the close of the fifteenth century. The subject is the Adoration of the Magi, chalk drawing of a young girl's head, by Leonardo da Vinci, for 20,000 francs.

M. Dupont-White has translated Mr. John Stuart Mill's essay on Liberty, which, it is said, "has created a great light in Paris. Liberty" progresses over the water; and not the least remarkable contribution to the Anglo-French literature is M. le Comte de Persigny's remarkable essay, in the Revue Contemporaine, on the English constitution, English press, and the rigorous trammels by which journalists were bound in the days of Queen Anne and the Hanoverian kings.

A correspondent of Notes and Queries more than hints that the honour of the first invention of photography belongs to Lord Brougham, that extraordinary man having, so far back as 1795, in a paper read, illustrated by diagrams, distinctly entered into a disquisition on the changes undergone by a plate of silver exposed to the action of light when exposed to the rays of a spectrum.

There is a long and interesting essay in the January number of Macmillan; a new one shortly in Fraser; a new one, as men all know, in the Cornhill; and a new one in the Gentleman's, which is the first part of a melodramatic character, we hear, in the second number of Temple Bar. The "latest winter novelty" is to be called "The Seven Sons of Mammon."

OFFICIAL APPOINTMENTS.—Some diplomatic changes are announced in Tuesday's Gazette. St. Petersburg has been raised to the full rank of an embassy, and Lord Napier, who is Minister at the Court of the Netherlands, has been appointed to the post of Ambassador. Sir John Crampton, our present Ambassador in Russia, has been appointed to represent England at the Court of Spain; and Sir Andrew Buchanan has been transferred from Madrid to the Hague. Mr. Lumley is appointed Secretary of Embassy at Berlin, and Mr. Layard, Under Secretary of State for India has made the following appointments in his Council for the ensuing year—Vice-President, Sir James Weir Hogg; Chairman of Committees, Mr. Arbuthnot; Military Secretary, Major-General Sir Robert Vivian, K.C.B.; Financial Secretary, Mr. Grant; Legislative, Sir T. Erskine Perry; Public Works, Mr. Rivers Wilson; Political, Mr. Edmund Hammond; Political, Mr. W. J. Eversfield; Public, Mr. J. P. Willoughby.

MUSIC.

Balfe's new opera, "Bianca, the Bravo's Bride" (the successful production of which we recorded last week) continues to be performed to the overflowing houses; and it deserves its success, not only from its intrinsic merit, but from the care and splendour with which it has been brought out and the excellence of its performance. The libretto, from a practical point of view, Mr. Polgrave Simpson, is founded on a forgotten melodrama, called "Bagnating; or, the Bravo of Venice," by "M. G. Lewis, Esq., M.P." The once-celebrated author of "The Monk" The subject is full of improbabilities, and is sometimes tedious; but it gives room for abundance of stirring incidents and striking scenes, and has enabled the author to write effective and spectacle. The hero of the piece is a certain Prince of Verona, who is under the influence of the daughter of the Duke of Ferrara. The Prince is a romantic gentleman, who desires to be loved for himself, and therefore adopts the plan of a humble name and obscure adventure, in which character he gains distinction, and also the love of the Duke's daughter. Having broken up a formidable band of robbers, he obtains from their dying chief a revelation of a conspiracy against the Duke, to which the brigand was an accessory. The Prince personates the brigand (Portogruaro by name), and in this disguise obtains access to the confidence of traitors in order to counteract their designs. In this enterprise he is successful. After a variety of adventures, in which he appears sometimes as the brave Portogruaro, and in the course of which he saves the life of the Duke's daughter and her father and brings the conspirators to justice, he at length brings about the denouement by proclaiming his own name and rank, and thus explaining the motive of his mysterious doings:

> I vow my fate to bind to her alone,
> Whose love for me transcendes all my throne.
> Should love me for myself—what'er betide—
> Then I will be a Prince—if not, I'll die a Bravo!

All this would be very well in an Adelphi melodrama, but it has not the strong situations necessary for a great serious opera. Balfe, departing from his usual style, has emulated the grand manner and intense passion of Meyerbeer, forgetting that such music ought to have a corresponding subject. The appropriate music of Balfe is the "airs" or the "Prolettes" becomes overstrained and exaggerated in a merely melodramatic subject. Nevertheless, there are many passages of real beauty in the music of this opera. He has adopted a larger and loftier style than that to which he is accustomed. In the scenes in which numbers of persons are grouped together on the stage, the concerted music—the combination than he has ever produced before, which, melodious often beautiful, and instrumentation is always masterly and full in varied and effective colouring. There is no instance of a single set piece of Balfe, which cannot fail to become generally popular. The best of them, we think, are two duets, "Sweet Bianca, hark!" and "I was my only thought," sung by Miss Louisa Pyne; and "The hope I ever forget" sung by Miss Louisa Pyne and by Mr. Harrison. The performance is admirable in every respect. We have never seen Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison in greater advantage; and the other principal characters are excellently represented by Miss A. Mary, Mr. Aynsley Cook, Mr. Lawrence, and Mr. Wharton.

The Christmas performances of "The Messiah" at EXETER HALL have begun. The first took place on Friday last week, and the second will take place on Friday next. The first performance had its usual grandeur and sublimity in the choral music, which is a vast assemblage, who listened with the deep attention due to the awful solemnity of the words. The principal vocalists were Madame Lemmens Sherrington, Miss Edith Wynne, Mr. Lewis Thomas, and Mr. Santley. The singing was great simplicity of style and execution made a great impression on the audience. It would be difficult to assume the pre-eminent position as a singer of sacred music which was long held by Mario and Tamberlik.

An interesting and successful concert was given at the Store-street Rooms, on the evening of Thursday last week, by Miss Clara Doria, who displayed much talent and very fine voice. The programme presented an excellent selection of vocal pieces, glees, duets, and glees, by Mrs. Sunderland Barbaree, Wallace, Hatton, Balfe, and other favourite composers, chiefly of the last century. The principal singers were Miss Wood, Miss Stabbach, Miss Chipperfield, Miss Poscoda, and Signor Mario Tedesco. Miss Doria also played with much talent as a pianist by performing Mendelssohn's beautiful and difficult "Rondo Capriccioso." The various performers were warmly applauded by a numerous audience.

THE THEATRES.

ADELPHI.—A new piece, called "The Ugly Customer," has been produced here. The action is mainly supported by Mr. J. L. Toole and Mr. C. Selby. The plot is extravagantly absurd, and depends on mistakes and misapprehensions. A gentleman with a hook on his eye, whose portrait has been exhibited at the Royal Academy, one Mr. Corkscrew Simpson, demands satisfaction of Mr. Cockbill for the depreciatory remarks he had made there on the picture, whereby the former had lost his chance of a wife. Circumstances compel him to get married in a week, and he insists on Cockbill giving his daughter to him. Unfit the young lady is previously engaged. Ultimately the soubrette (Miss Fanny Josephs) makes an experiment. She gets hair of boots belond the window-curtains, the feet of which are visible These are perceived by Mr. Simpson, who, with immense simplicity, grows jealous. As a Government contractor in the Crimea, Cockbill is naturally supposed to have accumulated copper funds; he has committed; hence he concedes to his absurd demands. At the last moment Corkscrew discovers that his supposed visit to India with his regiment is deferred, and, therefore, that he has not need for a wife so urgent as it was. Accordingly he surrenders the young lady to her original lover, and the curtain descends amid roars of laughter. The success of this farce, which is by Mr. Williams, depends on Mr. Toole, whose acting, as the elder Cockbill, is a marvel of drollery. A variety of humorous detail that reconciled the audience to the improbability of the plot. "Villikins and his Dinah" still continues to attract, and the theatre was crowded.

LYCEUM.—Mr. Drew, the excellent Irish comedian, appeared on Monday in a new piece, entitled The Coast of Clare, written by "The Irish Ambassador," which he performed with considerable effect. The piece is not a new one, but it was so successful an effort as his Handy-Andy. Here he had to enter the lists with Mr. Toole. Power more directly than in his former part, and could be expected to come off only second best. In the first act, in the Shelmalier costume, he was inimitable; and Mr. Drew, though a quiet humorist, is more of a low comedian than Mr. Power, consequently more effective. However, brought out some new traits in his acting which further developed him in the appreciation of the audience. He seems to be superior to his competitors in the finish and general completeness of his performance.

PRINCESS'.—"The Corsican Brothers," with alterations, was reproduced here on Saturday for the purpose of affording an opportunity to Mr. Fechter to appear before an English audience in his original characters. Of Mr. Fechter's acting we may speak truly in the highest terms; but of the performance in the pieces we cannot express our approbation. The simultaneous scenes of the duel and its spiritual appearance to the brother are now, as we think, injudiciously reversed. In the duel Mr. Fechter is too much in love with natural appearance, and so far defeats the supernatural impression. It does more. He should not dispose of his sword after the scene of the duel, and after the first act only unmitigated gloom and horror. The drama is remarkably well got up and acted; and we are grateful to the management for having given us an opportunity of seeing Mr. Fechter in his original parts. In the duel-scene he acted with equal energy and elegance, and throughout displayed uncommon intelligence in the distinct and highly-characteristic portraiture of the twin-brothers.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Mr. Edmund Phelps appeared on Monday in a second character—that of Leonardo Gonsago in Knowles's play of "The Wife"—and further confirmed the good impression which he had made in Ulric. He acted, indeed, with much grace and feeling.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE Racing Calendar returns, as collected by the Life, place the following horses at the head of the winners in the respective ages:—Fokkstone, 2 yrs., £20071; St. Albans, 3 yrs., £9139; Mouravieff, 4 yrs., £30124; Admiral dam, 5 yrs., £1237; Hepatica, 6 yrs., £3079; and yrs., £30124; Admiral dam, 5 yrs., £1237; Hepatica, 6 yrs., £3079; and yrs., £30124; Admiral dam, 5 yrs., £1237; Hepatica, 6 yrs., £3079; and Master Bagot, aged, £1191. Sir Williamson Booth's racing stud is to be put up to Monday next at Tattersall's, and Gladiolus is said to go to Mecklenburg-Schwerin. The fat, 10lbs. has taken the place of Sat. 7lbs. at a few meetings, and we hope that the condition for the coming January entries will show a more universal readiness to shed avoirdupois. The first instalment of public money, £2000, for the Jockey Club should have started the idea and only adopted the change in time to secure it one of their own meetings. The Royal Agricultural Society settled on Tuesday last to give a £100 prize for the best, and £25 for the second best, thorough-bred colt or gelding hunting &c. Other prizes of £50 and £25 are offered for the same class of sire, but the same horse cannot be shown in both classes. It may, however, be remembered that a number of valuable colts do not care to send them to be exposed to the public gaze for four days unless very much favoured stallions are entered, and so there we are at Middlesboro'. The Royal cannot do better than imitate the arrangements there, and let the public see the colts in their own horses and cattle as well. Beginning at eleven o'clock, or even twelve o'clock, they would have ample time to finish before six; and the exit of the public would be quite as orderly as now. The Society could add £500, as the very least, to the funds. If the tickets were ten shillings, no one would grudge it in addition to their subscription.

The Duke of Rutland's had a good hunting run of an hour on Saturday, with a brush at the end. Monday's meet at Belvoir was a most satisfactory day on Monday, although the scent was good; and on Tuesday Mr. Chaplin's had a splendid run of an hour. Tom Sebright has been laid up from a fall, but is, we believe, in the saddle again, and the continued rain has rather interfered with the scent in that country. The Southwold have had a capital run with a fox on the morning they left their kennels in the fifteenth parish, and only touched two small coverts all the way. On Saturday they ran two hours and a-half, and had a slipped fish with an afternoon fox, racing into him from scent to view, when Jack Morgan and five others left in it entirely behind them.

The coursing meetings for next week are as follows:—Bryn-y-pys and Worcestershire Club (Cheaney), on Monday; Cheney (Tuesday); Malcombe, on Tuesday and Wednesday; Chinbury (Salop); Churchdown (Southport), and "Northumberland and Durham," on Wednesday; Ince, on Friday; and Burnsterfield, on Friday and Saturday. In consequence of the ground at Thorney being completely saturated, the meeting has been put off for the present.

THE FARM.

BAKER-STREET has so completely swallowed up every other interest during the past week that anything else than the Smithfield show is out of season. York had a good Christmas Show on Saturday; but, as a proof of the uncertain nature of the Christmas meetings, the fat ox, Richard Booth's heifer, Soldier's Bride, which is still under two years old, and nicely to be the standing menace of Wrinkley against "the Cumbo tribe" till July, best very much in the Duke of Cleveland's great Queen of the Isles—I hopeless subject as far as breeding is concerned—and among them, and under the same roof, with the Queen has brought her from Mr. Booth, but subject to her going to the fat show at Darlington, where she is entered to-day. We hear that the white bull calf by Hopewell, from Campfollower, is bound to the West Barton pastures. Lightfoot's Hopewell cow is in calf to the same chalice, and secured at one time equally hopeless, is shortly to calve to Prince. Among the sweet Tyrwhitt calves are Frederick's Faithful, own sister to Frederick's Fidelity, and Royal Butterfly's heifer, from Young Barrington Rose. Aylesby Garland has had her ninth calf, which has been christened Bachelor's Button, by the same remarkable Rowsley breeder. Mr. Majoribanks's has a sister to Harkaway, the winner at the bull-calf class at York, and Mr. Stephenson's heifer did lately, and will have no calves, of which, however, there is a very promising lot at Bushey by Cossack, Lord Dacre, Lord Feversham, Devon cows, Beautiful and Bewsing (a Royal, Cark and West of England first-prize winner last year) have produced Prince Frederick heifer calves which have been respectively named Princess Ida and Besswas.

It is rather a remarkable fact in connection with Mr. Mogridge's Smithfield heifer that she is the first that gentleman ever fed for Smithfield. She is the fifth by the Duke of Oxford, the first Smithfield, and a great granddaughter of Mr. James Quartley's ten-year-old Napoleon, whose stock have had most wonderful success. Indeed, a steer from her dam, Young Spot, won for his Royal Highness the Prince Consort at Smithfield two winters ago. The Smithfield Club have adopted Mr. Torr's suggestion that the office of president an annual one, with the proviso that no one may be re-elected within three years, and the first gentleman on the first choice has fallen on Lord Berners. About £300 more is to be added to the prizes for next year, which will make the £600 in 15 classes, from a tabular statement before us, that in 1857-59 some 95 Downs, 57 Herefords, and 125 shorthorns were entered, and the wider Islington space will no doubt bring somewhat more. Mr. Torr's cattle-bell has finally meeting, and Mr. Samuel Sydney moved the adoption of the report. We suggest the arrangement of the Club dinner on a much wider division: but a second prize of £5 is added both in the bull-calf and heifer-calf classes. Mountain shows are to be encouraged, and whether the Leeks and Herefords will, no doubt, "feel fat their ancient grudge," Mr. Torr says he has 4961 names on the roll of members, and 11472 is the shape of subscription arrears.

The members of the Smithfield Club had their annual dinner on Wednesday, under the presidency of Lord Berners; but, owing to the recent death of the lamented Duke of Richmond, the songs were omitted. The dinner was delivered by Mr. Stephens of Littleton, and Mr. Torr confined himself more especially to the breeding of stock. Mr. Fraser also proposed "The Health of the Prince of Wales," and "The noble Chairman;" and Mr. Gibbs, the secretary, received his annual and well-merited welcome. Mr. Gibbs, in the Mark Lane Express, (in which the late Mr. Shaw pressed the idea of such a society upon the landlords and farmers years before Sir Robert Peel "had the high honour," as he said at the dinner of the Club on it. birth,' was appropriately called upon to propose the toast of "The Royal Agricultural Society" and acknowledged it in a few words. Spencer to keep his Lordship's example steadily in view, and let the fat of the second nuisance to be a ring-fence of excellence in cattle, sheep and implements, not only to Great Britain and her colonies, but to the whole civilised world. Mr. Robert Smith, the well-known breeder of Kinnoor cattle, and the writer of the admirable report for the Society in 1858-59, responded. Mr. Sydney proposed the labourer, but no toast was left present to speak to it, and we hope that Mr. Thistlebone at their bankers' at £2599.

The Queen have held a most successful poultry exhibition. Of game fowls there were 130 pens, and of Hamburgs, 129. The China Silk Cockins were rather out of their element in the cheir plumage, but their skin is yet black, and their bones, when cooked, have a white hue. The Sebastopol geese were smaller and uglier than the English; and the finest pair of rabbit ears in the 80 pens measured 22 inches.

There is some talk, according to the Russian journals, of a horse traction-railway in Perm, from Teheran to Tearis, to facilitate the means of transport for passengers and merchandise on the Black Sea, with extension to Teheran, or by Ispahan and Tabs to Pol.

The Builder states that the council of the Institute of Architects are proceeding to have the considerable collection which he adopted that architecture may be completely illustrated, and consecration fully represented, in the Great Exhibition proposed to be held in 1862.

In reply to a petition of two hundred and fifty Hebrew congregations, a declaration has been published by the Prussian Government intimating their intention for the future to avail themselves of the services of men in the various departments of the State. This is carrying out the spirit of the law enacted in 1848, but which hitherto had been almost a dead letter.

The Prefect of the Seine brings forward the great question of the new system of paving; he hesitates between porphyry and bitumen, but evanescence irrevocably the fall of Macadam. He founds his objection upon the incessant expense attendant on this method of paving, and on the mole of mud and filth in which the streets remain throughout the year.

According to the Dublin Evening Post, the National Board of Education has issued a recommendation in view of equalising the Protestant and Catholic elements in its constitution.

Letters state that the mass of the population of Rome is now suffering great distress, and that the Papal Government is engaged in a series of acts which are being adopted by public and private charity to supply food for the poor.

The Queen has approved of Mr. Daniel M. Hocking as Consul at Santander, and of Mr. Frederick Lamb as Vice-Consul at Don Benito Gonzales Zobala as Consul at Malta for the Queen of Spain.

The Queen has appointed Sir Thomas Robertson, Esq., of Ladykirk, Berwickshire, to be her Majesty's Lieutenant and Sheriff Principal of the shire of Berwick, to which office he was first of Lauderdale, deceased.

By the ancient law of Hungary, a man convicted of bigamy was condemned to live with both wives in the same house. The ordeal was, in practice, found to be extremely severe.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

THE long-talked-of British Loan has actually made its appearance, but in a modified shape. Instead of the large original amount of £15,000,000, the sum now required is only £8,000,000, and this is to be paid for in Consols, which advantage the Government states that the issue is to be obligations, or bonds, of £20 each; the sticking point of the Loan is the necessity of paying the money in advance, and as the Treasury bonds are not sold for the payment of both interest and principal. The loan is fixed at Paris, according to the Bourse, Brussels, Amsterdam, and Hamburg; and the whole amount will be required by the 26th of April, 1861, a deposit of 10 per cent having been required on the 15th of January. At the time of the notice, we are of opinion that a very small portion of the loan will be taken up, as the terms are not sufficiently liberal to induce the capital required will be raised on the Continent.

The events of the past week in the City have been confined to the effect that monetary affairs have had upon the Stock Exchange, but the information we have to give has been supplied. It seems to follow, therefore, that future shipments of gold from Australia will be made to the Bank of England instead of to Paris, and first announced at New York we have what seem very one million in gold. This week only £117,000 have been received, and this is supplied by the same house which sells us Saturday.

The rise which has taken place in gold has been purchased by the Bank of England; but the demand for the Continent is still somewhat extensive, about £300,000 having been withdrawn from the Bank for Paris, and the difficulty of transferring the two millions of silver from the Bank of France to the Bank of England continues to operate against the latter, which is required and will be required now that gold is returning to the Bank of France.

The Continental exchanges are still unfavourable to us, as remains active. In London-street, and at the large discount houses, the applications have been numerous, and the supply of money has been somewhat restricted. In the Open Market the quotations for the best commercial bills are as follows:—

Short Bills	.. 4½ to 4¾	Four Months' Bills ..	.. 4¾ to 5
Three Months' Bills	.. 4¾ to 4¾	Six Months' Bills	.. 5 to 5¼

Long-dated paper has been discounted somewhat freely, but the quantity on offer has been limited.

Advices from Australia state that two vessels, having £611,000 in gold on board, were to leave Melbourne on the 1st inst.

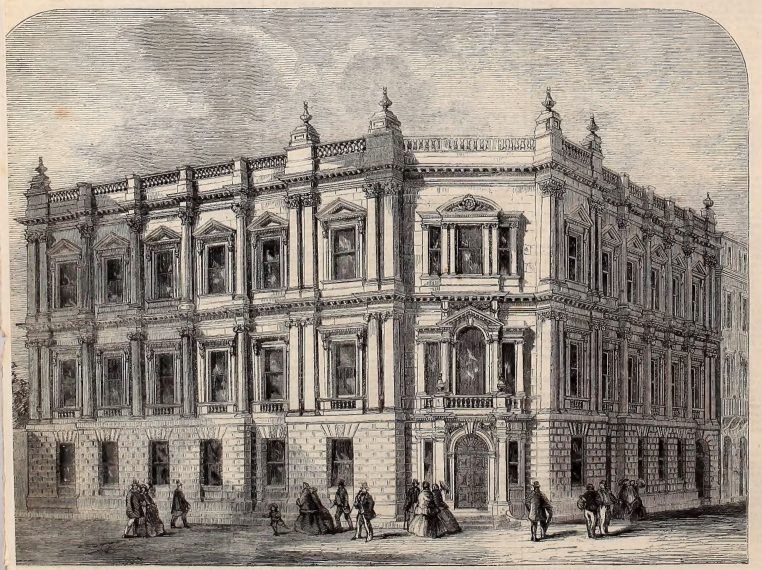
RALPH FARNHAM, ONE OF THE BUNKER-HILL HEROES.



Ralph Farnham 1860
born July 7 1775

the Prince of Wales was at Boston, United States, Ralph am (whose Portrait we engrave), the sole survivor of that valiant which fought at the battle of Bunker-hill, was introduced to his Highness by Mr. Everett. The interview is reported to have ost interesting. Mr. Farnham was accompanied by one of his ters, who is upwards of seventy years of age. Ralph Farnham rn in the town of Lebanon, Maine, July 7, 1756, and is con- tly in the 103d year of his age. He entered the American Army , 1775, and engaged in the battle of Bunker-hill on the 17th of the same year. He was also present, on guard, at the surrender goyne.

THE LUMBERERS' ARCH AT OTTAWA, ERECTED ON THE OCCASION OF THE PRINCE OF WALES'S VISIT TO CANADA.

THE most singular of all the arches erected in the British provinces of North America in honour of the Prince of Wales's visit was the Lumberers' Arch erected near the Chaudiere Bridge, Ottawa, of which we give an Engraving. It was sixty-five feet in height, and eighty-two feet in length, and was composed of 180,000 feet of lumber. Not a nail was used in its construction, nor a plank spoiled. It was massive and imposing. Few ornaments were placed upon it. To its size and simple design it owed its magnificent appearance. From the way in which the boards were piled, small pieces having been placed between each, the light passed through, producing a peculiar and pleasing effect. There were three archways. The largest was fifteen feet in width and twenty-five feet high. The side arches were seven feet and a half in width, and fifteen feet high; round at the top, and simply cabelled. About ten feet above the top of the arches the width varied from eighty-two feet to sixty feet; and above that again to forty feet; so that three successive stages rose one above the other. In front was an immense plank, thirty-four inches in width, bearing on it the word "Welcome." The arch was suggested by Mr. James Skead, and designed by Mr. D. Scott. The lumber was shipped from the mills of Messrs. Pattie, Perry, and Co., at whose expense in conjunction with Messrs. Merrill Baldwin and Young, and Harris Brownson and Co., it was erected It was much admired by the Prince and his suite. Such an arch was very appropriately erected at the head-quarters of the lumber trade, and gave his Royal Highness some notion of the magnitude of the interests involved in its welfare.

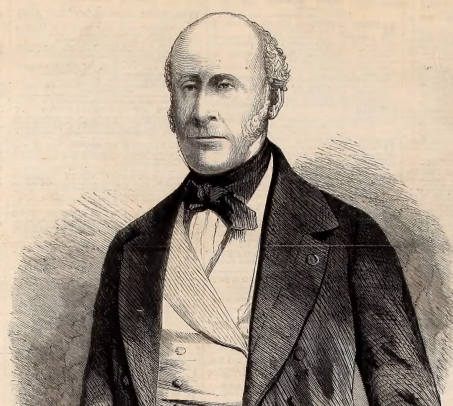
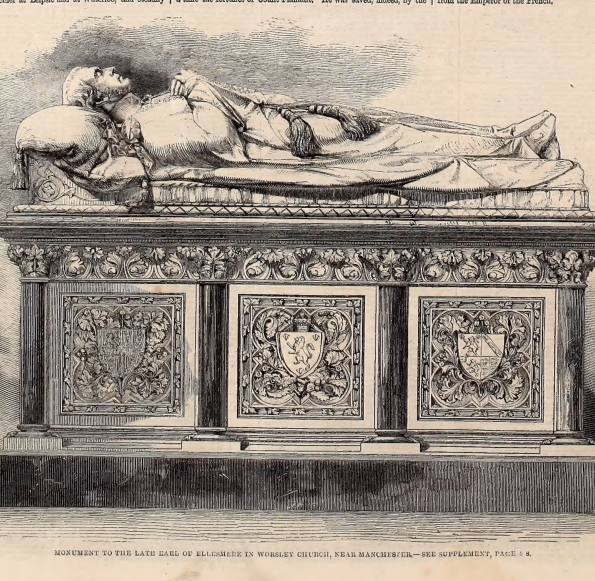
COUNT FLAHAULT,
THE NEW FRENCH AMBASSADOR IN ENGLAND.



THE appointment of a new French Ambassador to the Court of St. James's, in consequence of the late Imperial decree in favour of an extension of political liberty in France, may be looked upon with great satisfaction in England, more especially as the successor of the Count de Persigny is a gentleman known to possess the perfect confidence of the Emperor Napoleon, and is also one of the most liberal supporters of the Imperial dynasty, whose cause was espoused at a very early age by the present representative of France in this country. His intimate relations with the Emperor, and his connection by marriage with Great Britain, offer a guarantee that the Count's sojourn amongst us will be characterised by a conciliatory conduct tending to cement still more closely the interests of the two countries.

Auguste Charles Joseph Flahault de la Billarderie was born in Paris on the 20th of April, 1785. The family of Napoleon have had no abler or stancher friend than the statesman who now, at the age of seventy-five, enters upon functions not less important than those of the most responsible bureau in the Home Administration of France. Born under the tottering régime of the Bourbon Monarchy, he must have heard with a child's passionate sorrow that his father, who was a General in the French Army, had perished by the revolutionary guillotine. His mother, herself distinguished by her accomplishments and literary powers, fled with him to England, and here, like many eminent Frenchmen of that generation, he received the rudiments of his education. At the age of fifteen he entered the French Army in a corps of mounted volunteers, and accompanied the first Consul in the Marengo campaign. He was present at several of the great battles of the Empire—Austerlitz, Friedland, and Wagram, and was successively Aide-de-Camp to Murat, Berthier, and Napoleon himself. In a single year, 1813, he received the rank of Brigadier-General, of General of Division, and the title of Count, the former in consequence of his brilliant conduct in the Russian campaign, the two latter after his services at the battle of Dresden. He was by the side of his chief at Leipsic and at Waterloo, and steadily supported Lucien Bonaparte in advocating the claims of Napoleon II. during the last of the Hundred Days. His numerous military achievements won for him the honour of having his name inserted in the long list of Imperial Generals inscribed on the Triumph Arch which adorns the Champs Elysées. The fall of the Imperialism, of course, ruined for a time the fortunes of Count Flahault. He was saved, indeed, by the intervention of Talleyrand fro being included in the famous ex nance of proscription issued on t 24th of July, but he was official recommended to leave the countr and did not permanently return Paris till 1827, or resume his mi taryand senatorial position till 18



It was during this blank interv in Count Flahault's life that he co tracted those relations with Gre Britain which have made him so w known among us. The resignati of his rank in the French Army v not an act of political retributi but the consequence of his m riage with Miss Elphinstone, n sequently Baroness Keith in t own right, daughter and sole heir of Lord Keith, the distinguis Admiral. Strange and romar alliances were among the first fr of the Thirty Years' Peace, and was not among the least strik coups de théâtre that the soldier Moscow, Dresden, and Water should be established in a Sco castle, and contribute to keep that singular connection which so long subsisted between Nc Britain and France. No one can how much these intermarriages tween the highest families in republic of European nations r have softened the antipathies race and politics, and kept a a spirit of kindly sympathy mutual forbearance. The ma plied relationships of Princes r not always have been for interest of their subjects, but t have at least preserved a kind common understanding between crowned representatives of the g European Powers, and prever national ignorance and prejuc in their lowest and worst fo from dictating the conduct foreign affairs.

The later career of Count Flah has been scarcely less active t his military life. He was not a great speaker in the Chambe Peers, but he consistently v against laws in restriction of libe He was at one time accredite the Court of Berlin, and held post of Ambassador at Vienna f 1842 to 1848. Previous to this had been attached to the house of the Duke of Orleans, and been presented with the Gr Cross of the Legion of Honou the Government of Louis Phili It was natural that on the rest tion of the Napoleonist dynast should be called to the Senate, we believe he has since been or the most devoted, as he is certainly one of the most honourable, of Emperor's personal followers.

Count Persigny on Monday week delivered his letters of reca the Queen at Windsor Castle; and on the same day Count Flahault an audience of her Majesty to present his credentials as Ambass from the Emperor of the French.

FANE'S AND PROBYN'S HORSE.

THESE corps of irregular cavalry occupy a notable position in the expeditionary army to China. They form an admirable exemplar of that system of training the natives of India for the military service of the Government which has been found to answer so well. The plan is to throw aside all notion of drilling the native recruit into that somewhat stiff and unreasoning machine which is usually supposed to be created out of the raw material of which the British Army is composed, and which system is necessarily still less adapted to the habits of an Asiatic, and to leave the soldier very much to his own manner of using his arms and managing his horse. This mode of training has been found to be so consistent with all the requirements of discipline that a very small number of European officers have been found quite sufficient for all the purposes of command in the regiments of native irregular cavalry. Of the efficiency of these corps in the field we have had numerous instances, and in the present campaign in China they have been found to be peculiarly qualified for the service in which they have been engaged. The system of irregular native corps in India has hitherto answered so well that it is generally believed that in the reorganisation of our Indian Army the native portion of it will consist entirely of that description of force.

A correspondent of one of the newspapers speaks thus of our light cavalry in China:—"Probyn's Horse" and "Fane's Horse"!—"What a beau-ideal of light cavalry these irregulars afford, and how their marches would astonish our so-called light dragoons! Probyn and Fane started nearly at the same time from Cawnpore and Lucknow to embark at Calcutta. They marched one against the other and performed the distance—710 miles—in less than a month. Probyn outmanœuvred Fane by leaving the main road about 200 miles from his destination and making a flank march across country; but he only won the race by a couple of days." The Times correspondent, writing of the Sikh Irregulars in China, asks:—"Why do not the military authorities utilise these Sikh Irregulars elsewhere than in India? They have no prejudices of caste or race; they will eat and drink whatever you give them, are hardy and robust, accustomed to a climate much like our own, and, when properly looked after, not inordinately given to loot. Their conduct here has been exemplary, and they are the very men for outpost and picket duty. France has her Spahis and Russia her Cossacks. The Sikhs are superior to either, and India will afford many a Probyn and Fane to lead them.'

We give in the accompanying Engraving portraits of some of the British and native officers of Fane's Horse serving in China. Commencing at the left hand, we have Lieutenant Carnac, of the 1st Bengal Cavalry, attached to Fane's Horse. Next to him is Nia Sing, an Afghan Subidar of great proportions. The third is Lieutenant Cartley, third Commandant, honourably mentioned in Sir Hope Grant's despatch as having gallantly led the charge of Fane's Horse on the left flank on the 18th of September. Then comes a Sikh Subidar, wearing the Order of Merit. The celebrated Resildar (native Captain), Nuxban Khan, an Afghan, follows. He stood firm to the British in the mutiny at Benares, and wears the first class of the Order of British India and first class of the Order of Merit. Lastly, we have a Resildar of the third troop, a dashing youth of twenty. He is a Sikh, and bears the Order of Valour for distinguished conduct in the field during the mutiny, for which also he was promoted.

A small body of Fane's Horse signalised themselves during the attack on the Sinho camp on the 12th of August, when a body of eighty or ninety Tartars rushed from their front to take Stirling's battery in flank. Captain Stirling had barely time to fire two rounds of case when they were within 100 yards of the guns. There was only a guard of twenty-five of Fane's Horse, under the command of Lieut. M'Gregor, attached to the battery. Lieutenant M'Gregor gave the word to charge, and away went the Sikhs in most gallant style. Only half the Tartars met them in full shock. The effect was instantaneous. The Tartars dispersed in every direction, the whole affair lasting little more than a minute.

PADRE GIOVANNI

ADDRESSING THE NEAPOLITANS.

DURING the fêtes given at Naples in honour of the entry of King Victor Emmanuel into that city a boat, constructed by the fishermen of Santa Lucia, emblematical of the one from which Garibaldi landed at Marsala, was paraded about the streets by torchlight, and manned by red-shirted Garibaldini. It remained stationary for some time in the square in front of the Jesuits' College, and while there Padre Giovanni, who had followed Garibaldi throughout the whole campaign, was hoisted into it, and in a few fervent words stirred up the enthusiasm of the people for their new King and the great kingmaker. The scene has been happily hit off by our Special Artist.

JAPANESE MYTHOLOGY AND RELIGION.

THE accompanying Illustration with which we have been favoured by a valued Correspondent, represents a favourite subject in Japanese mythology—the descent of the war-god Mars (whose name has a strange resemblance in that of the same divinity in Roman mythology) on the holy boar—the emblem of his force. Little as yet is known of the inhabitants of the Japanese islands by the veil that has so long hidden them from the rest of the world, and even from their near neighbours, the Chinese, little fain to be lifted in our day. The expedition under the late Commodore Perry, sent thither by the Government of the United States in the year 1852, and which was regarded in the interpretation of the Japanese mission to England in 1854, has done more than any previous researches to increase our knowledge of this important and highly-civilised people; and the time must be approaching—hastened not only to America, but to the Governments of Great Britain and France—when the Japanese will no longer be more closely united, and when Christian civilisation shall be as well informed of the manners, customs, and religion of the Japanese empire as it is of the civilisation of the Mohammedan countries nearer home. But such are the contradictions among the several writers on Japan upon the subject of the religion of the people that it is not easy to discover the truth; nor is this discrepancy much to be wondered at, for since the extirpation of Christianity in the Japanese islands there is probably no topic on which a Christian would find it more difficult to obtain from a Japanese any accurate information than on the subject of religion. There are, however, certain particulars in which all writers agree, and are, therefore, correct. The only the great majority of the people are Buddhists, the original national religion, which has still many followers, is called Sin-Syu (from sin, the gods, and syu, a sect), or Sinshiu, signifying the Kami sect. The Kami, at least, is the statement made by some writers; but Siebold says the proper spelling is Kame—the Japanese word for Kamen—which is way of the Kami, or gods. This the Chinese have translated into Shin-tao, a term the Japanese have adopted in common with Sintoo. It is said the only object of real and supreme worship among the Chinese is their ancestors, who are looked upon as under the patron divinity of Japan; but there are thousands of inferior deities, called Kami, of whom the greater number are canonised or deified men. In the temples of these deified men, besides the prayers are made to the sun-goddess, who is too great and holy to allow of her being approached by mortals, the Kami in question are supposed to be their descendants. But, with all these divinities, the Sinshiu have no idolatry. Many of the Kami have their temples there are images, indeed, of these Kami; but, as it is argued, not for the purpose of worship, but amusement, however, is very questionable. The only decorations of this old temple were a mirror, the emblem of purity of soul, and many sticks of wood, pierced into which were slips of white paper, the emblem of purity. Siebold thinks the image of the Kami introduced into the temples is a comparatively modern invention, and dates its introduction of Buddhism. The numerous Kami he considers as analogous to the saints of the Roman Catholic religion. But as the Sinshiu worship at this day so thoroughly permeated with Buddhism, Meylan would make the chief religion of Japan a pure theism. It is not easy to say what it was or is. As to the future state, the Sinshiu teaches, according to Siebold, are some vague notion of the immortality of the soul and a future state of existence, somewhat of purification. Sorgdrager, however, declares that the Japanese believe that the soul, after the dissolution of the body, is either exalted to perfection, and, purity of soul, heart, and body to be cherished—the first by the glorious dictates of reason and the latter by the light emanating from whatever deifies. 3rd, Observance of festival days, which are numerous. 4th, Pilgrimages, which, at certain times in the year, are frequented, and, lastly, 5th, The worship of the Kami, both in temples and in private habitations. Impurity may be contracted in various ways, by the commission of what are considered great crimes or wicked language, by eating certain meats, and by coming in contact with blood or a dead body. For all these impurities there are certain modes of purification.

Sewejyo, or Sintoism, inculcates no particular faith, and can accommodate itself to any, whether true or false; in some of his features it borders closely on Pantheism. It is supposed, and we presume correctly, to be a compound of the Kami understanding of most of the moral precepts of Confucius and some high, mystic, Buddhist creeds. It has no religious ceremonies peculiar to itself. There are five great points which characterise it: they call them Dein, Gi, Jin, Rei, Sin. Dein teaches to love mankind, to be kind to them, and act justly with everybody: Re, to be civil and polite; Tei sets forth the rule for a good and prudent government; and Sin treats of a free conscience and upright heart. Nearly all early European writers say that by far the larger number of the learned men of Japan belong to the Sintoo sect, which is remarkable for the absence of Buddhist idolatry. When Christianity was driven from Japan the Sintoists were suspected of a tendency that Buddhism, the religion professed by Japanese was required to have in his house an idol of some kind. Meylan, the Dutch official at Decima, speaks of the Sintoo temples, which coexisted with these three previous to the introduction of Christianity. The story is that, about A.D. 50, a Brahminical sect was introduced into Japan by Xaka, who declared himself to be born of the world by the son of a virgin, who died to expiate human sin, thus ensuring their salvation. Buddhism, it also taught, was not only immaterial person, constituting one eternal, omnipotent God, the author of all things, who was to be adored in spirit and in truth. Soon have become inferred (what certainly is not impossible) that Christianity may have been introduced into Japan before the time that Japanese was required to have in his house an idol of some kind. THE ANGLESEY COLUMN STATUE.

To the early part of 1859 several friends and admirers of the late Marquis of Anglesey expressed a strong opinion that there should be some permanent memorial of that distinguished nobleman, and, it having been suggested that crowning the column erected to him in 1816 close to the Menai Bridge with a colossal statue would be a graceful tribute to his memory, a subscription list was opened, which was quickly filled, and Matthew Noble was intrusted with the execution of the work. The statue, which is of bronze, is in the full costume of the Hussar of the beginning of the century, is not only a striking likeness in face, figure, and mien, of the noble Marquis, but is likewise, as a work of art, one of the happiest efforts of that eminent sculptor. It was cast successfully cast by Messrs. Robinson and Cottam.

The figure of the bronze statue having been decided upon, and the weight calculated to be about from two to three tons, it became necessary to consider how such a statue was to be placed on the column, which stands upon a precipitous rock, near to, and at an elevation of 250 feet above, the Menai Straits, the top of the column above the base being 92 feet, and the height of the statue 12 feet. The total height, therefore, of the statue above the Straits is 351 feet.

No sooner was the raising of the statue spoken of than several suggestions, models, plans, and specifications were submitted and carefully considered; one of which was a very light and comparatively inexpensive scaffolding designed by Mr. J. S. Hallen (since deceased), eldest son of Mr. Haslam, of Carreg Bran, Anglesea. This model having been approved of, steps were taken for its erection in September last.

The scaffolding may be thus described:—Two lower masts, 65 feet each in length by 16 inches square, were set upright near the column on the north side, leaving ample room for the statue to pass between them and the column while the operation of hoisting was going on. The lower ends or feet of the masts were stepped into and well secured to a strong timber 26 feet in length, and they were also supported perpendicularly with six diagonal shores or stays, each 40 feet in length. At the lower ends the masts were 5 feet apart on the heelpiece, and at the heads 14 inches. At 10 feet from their tops the lower masts were firmly secured together by "crosstrees," and at their tops by a cap leaving sufficient space to allow an intermediate or "topmast" to be run up between the two lower masts from below. The latter had to be so fitted above the cap or heelpiece on the ground was 113 feet. Both the lower masts and topmast were secured and kept perfectly steady by wire-rope stays, shrouds, and guys, fastened with lanyards received through eyebolts set in the works at the base of the column. At three feet from the head and 110 feet from the ground the topmast was fitted with a strong frame to support the north ends of two traversing beams placed parallel to each other, and leaving sufficient space between for two double purchase-blocks attached to a carriage to traverse without friction. The other or south ends of the traversing beams were supported by an upright mast 28 feet in height, the foot of which was stepped into a piece of timber embedded in the solid part of the abutus of the column. The height of the framework on this mast was upon the same level as the masts which rested on the rocks below, the space between the heads of the upright masts was 16 feet 8 inches. On the head framework of these masts the two traversing-beams rested, pinched to each other, and perfectly horizontal; and on these beams a carriage was fitted to run on cast-iron rollers from mast to mast, passing right over the centre of the pinnacle of the column from north to south. To the carriage were suspended with strong wrought-iron work two double purchase-blocks so fixed as to work freely with the carriage, both backwards and forwards, along the parallel traversing-beams. This carriage and beams were calculated to carry a steady weight of ten tons.

On the arrival of Admiral Lord Clarence Paget and Mr. Noble, the sculptor, on the ground the two purchase-blocks were hooked on to the statue at the foot of the column, being secured with two 9-inch Manilla falls, each upwards of 600 feet in length, and the hauling parts were carried to two cylinder-head fixed at the foot of the north masts. There was also a 6-inch hawser-tie of Manilla rope to act as a "preventer" lest the statue was going up—one end being made fast to the statue, and the other carried over a pulley attached to the traversing-carriage on the top beams, and also through a sheave fixed between the ends of the beams overhanging the opposite or south side of the column, by which end another set of double purchase-blocks was attached, the hauling parts of the fall being worked by a crab-winch at the south side of the column. This tackle acted while the hoisting was going on as a "preventer"; and when the statue was raised 100 feet off the ground the falls of the two purchase-blocks were "racked" and a slight strain kept on the hawser, which had the effect of drawing the carriage and the suspended statue directly over the bed prepared for the reception of the pedestal upon which it was raised, amidst the hearty cheering of a "thousand rejoicing voices," on the 24th of November, 1860.

The whole of the arduous work of erecting the scaffolding and raising the statue was performed by Welsh carpenters and Anglesea sailors, the time occupied in hoisting, lowering, and fixing, being about an hour and twenty minutes.

THE BIRMINGHAM DOG SHOW.

EVERY denomination in the range of nature, from the bull to the canary, has been made the subject, individually or collectively, of a show, but until 1859 dogs seemed quite left out of the question. In August of the year the long-talked-of hound show became a reality at last at Redcar, on the Yorkshire coast, and the first of a long progeny of one more universal in its character. The same experiment was tried at Newcastle, and now Birmingham has taken the original idea pretty nearly to ripeness, in only its second essay. To Messrs. Burdett and Coutts' spacious and well-arranged Agricultural Hall, we owe the praise is especially due; and Messrs. Brailsford, a celebrated body of gamekeepers, who were engaged during the last three weeks to superintend the arrangements, and the arrival and departure of the canine dates, lent more important aid. Unfortunately, the society thought it most prudent not to sever themselves from the cattle show, and hence, instead of getting Bingley Hall, they had to be content with the very limited gallery accommodation which Bretherton's Repository could furnish. It would have been well, too, if the dogs could have been arranged on raised platforms, instead of lying on a level with the floor, as the space between them was not more than sufficient to accommodate one creature. Still, with all these disadvantages of space and difficulty of sight, it was a grand success. The dogs were polite to the last degree; and, although they had occasionally a battle royal among themselves, we only heard a rumour of one man having been bitten. Great was the disappointment that it did not continue open for another day or two; and, as for some weeks back pointers and spaniels have had pretty nearly a holiday time of it, it is a pity that the usual notice, "by special request," did not adorn the door-way. As it was, about 7800 persons attended, and brought nearly £500 to the funds.

When exactly 100 pointers and forty-three setters were entered, other parts of the list presented a very meagre aspect. The two pugs never put in an appearance at all; and the Blenheims, King Charleses, and Italian greyhounds only mustered two entries apiece. Great things were predicted of Lord Bagot's bloodhounds; but Mr. Jennings's winner, of the Faversham, Woodwell, and Rothschild blood, flung them completely into the shade, and sat up, a very king among dogs, lazily blinking over his shoulder. The foxhounds were a mere nine, both in quality and number, and, considering how many kennels there are within an hour's ride of Birmingham, it was rather strange that a ten-guinea cup and three other prizes should not have roused the masters and huntsmen into action. Warwickshire held its own with Lord Ourzon's "Watchman," and Cheshire with Fatima, and, as these were the only two kennels present, nobody was disappointed. The Notton harriers were alone in their glory, without a prize, and so were the Windsor beagles, either justly or not is another question. Other hounds there were none, as the journey was too far for the Dulwine men, and Colonel Ingo's deerhound was a grand winner in a class which was quite unworthy of him; and his companion, "Brunetta," had the same honours. Moreover, the rise of some good winners, as the elegant-crested Saltburn, did not discredit to the world of the leash; and the pointers of Jurpe sire were bravely headed by a liver-and-white dog belonging to the Rev. H. W. Powys, well worthy of his Edge heraldry, and with only one failure, viz., that he was five years old. A capital lemon-and-white of M. Smallwood, who was, if we mistake not, second last year, came fifth this, and the whole class was highly commended. Such a sweeping eulogium on forty-four saves a great deal of trouble, but we should have thought that a little more sifting might have reasonably reduced some from the H Cinto the Cranks. In judging the opposite sex, the Rhadamanthuses, Messrs. Moore, Leigh, and Lort, were equally sweeping in their condemnation; and, although their opinion was pretty generally endorsed, it seemed to us that they might have found a second. Dunbrewster's winner was very unluckily entered in the catalogue with no pedigree, and at £30; and we believe that she changed hands. The show, however, were very disappointing, and £150 was the sum total. Considering the season, and that sporting dogs were the great staple, we can hardly wonder at such a result. In the pointer dogs of small size, Mr. Henry Gilbert of Kensington came to the fore again with the well-known lemon-and-white. His champion, "Bob," is the son of "Nell," with which he won here last year, and a great beauty he was, too. The Earls of Derby and Lichfield were second and third in this class, in which Mr. Samuel Ashworth showed Clever "Sancho" and "Rob," although neither was commended. The same three owners were the first three again in a very strong companion class; but this time Mr. Gilbert found the Lord of Lichfield at the head of him. Mr. Gilbert considered his "Venus" better than her brother, and her expressive head and beautifully-turned outline made her pretty nearly perfection. The setters were not somewhat in any way; the stamp of the old English setter which we remember twenty or thirty years ago seems to have very much departed; and the blue-belled Irish setter was the very model of his kind. The retrievers also boasted of two grand specimens; but many of the Humbers were out of condition.

The beaconsfield hardly carried out our ideas of Wolverhamptons, and, with the exception of one cream with a black muzzle, the sandy tuffs fell below the regular John Bull type. The Newfoundlands were clever, but wanted size; in fact, we saw nothing there to the eye beyond twenty-six inches, and in spite of their true St. John beauty we longed for one or two of that height to go out and mingle with Mr. Goater of Hammersmith was so proud of breeding. Toddy, from Rugby, was a clever little foxdog. The waning Italian greyhound seemed very nice, as far as we could see it, but, like the spotted dogs, it curled itself coyly round in its cage and refused to show itself to the public. It would be an immense advantage if toy dogs could be seen out of doors, for their pert most probably their owners would never consent to such an exposure, and the owners of such valuable little sires may well be chary of having them stroked all day, in a promiscuous fashion, by a capricious inner pocket. Considering how well the Leicestershire and Warwickshire sheepdogs muster at Spuddenhoe each September, we did expect to see their class better filled; but England had only a moderate delegation, and a very-haired Scotch lass, with a face intelligent enough to know a Southdown from a Leicester and all the cross-bred sweeps and webfers into the bargain, walked off with the £2 to Henley, Warwickshire. Neither the Oxban mastiff, nor the Maltese lion dog, nor the St. Bernard, was a very favourable type; and as for the poor white Esquimaux, it was the merest chance we saw him at all in his window retreat.

There is nothing like going to head-quarters: and hence the editor of the Field—in whose paper the idea of a dog show was originated by Mr. Stretton three years ago—and who was the judge of "toys," &c., on this occasion, shall tell of them in his own words:—"It is true that there were a few good specimens of toy dogs; and the prize black-and-tan terrier and her keeper from Liverpool—as well as the Italian greyhounds from London, were extremely good of their kind. The toy spaniels were, however, below mediocrity; and the Scotch terriers were so inferior that no one could be selected as really an unimpeachable specimen of its kind. The dog which obtained the prize in this class was very beautiful, and showed all the characteristics of the Skye terrier except colour, which was a pure white: but its compactness, so to speak, its symmetry, its carriage of tail, in length of leg, and in texture of coat, that there could be no comparison between them. The bulldogs were equally defective—the white bitch which obtained the prize being, on the whole, the best, but still very inferior, in all points but tail, to one of her competitors, which was deficient in this respect, having a very short tail, hardly two inches long."

The prizes altogether amounted to £240 (including the value of eight silver cups), and as a fourth of this was cut off last year, there is a good nest egg for next year. With such a strong council, and such efficient officers, the success of the experiment is assured. It has won a name already, and when it has fitted from the Repository, and taken up its local habitation in Bingley Hall, and in a more genial season of the year, it will be quite as much a Birmingham institution as the great Cattle and Poultry Show, the Townhall organ, or John Bright himself. Our Illustrations embrace several of the best specimens and, with the exception of the Maltese lion dog, all of them won first prizes.

THE PRÉ CATELAN, IN THE BOIS DE BOULOGNE.

A PRESS of important matters has hitherto prevented the publication of our View of the Pré Catelan, in the Bois de Boulogne, Paris. In this wood of woods, where clear and beautiful lakes, fairylike islands, pretty chalets, and charming promenades for visitors, either on foot, on horseback, or on horseback, offer a succession of enjoyments, there exists also the fashionable resort represented in our Illustration, open in the daytime for a small exterior fee, and at night, in the fine summer season, for concerts and theatrical performances in the open air, the ballets being witnessed in a theatre composed in a great measure of flowers, which surround and embellish the forms of the fair spectators. The finest military music is performed here at intervals throughout the day; and there are, moreover, various games for the amusement of visitors; but the Pré is mostly resorted to as an genial summer retreat when it is brilliantly illuminated, and attended by an immense number of wealthy Parisians and foreigners.

Our Engraving represents a day fete at the Pré Catelan, and depicts very exactly the scene of this charming inclosure, with its numerous chalets, theatres, tents, and refreshment-rooms crowned with flags and innumerable floral decorations. The merit of the creation of this delightful spot is due to M. Jay, who organised it on a scale worthy of the elite of Parisian society by whom it is attended. The Pré Catelan has been described as unique in Europe, and nothing can be more truly delightful than the aspect presented by the performance of a ballet there on a night of the height of the season. The present year has not been favourable to the success of the speculation, owing to the continual prevalence of bad weather, and to the superior attractions of the Garden of Acclimatisation.

The Pré Catelan (Catelan Meadow) owes its name to the circumstance of its being situated on a meadow remarkable as the scene of an assassination, by mistake, by a distinguished but criminal courtier, of a domestic named Catelan, of one of the Louis, the bearer of a parcel of exquisite perfume, the composition of which was known only to the Monarch. The peculiarity of the perfume ultimately led to the discovery and punishment of the assassin. To commemorate the sad fate of Catelan his name was given to the meadow, and a small stone monument, still in existence, erected on the spot where his body was found.

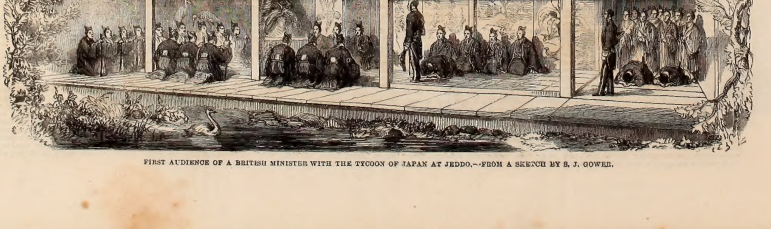
THE BRITISH ENVOY'S AUDIENCE WITH THE TYCOON OF JAPAN.

We are enabled, by the kindness of a correspondent, an amateur artist, to present our readers with an Illustration of the first audience of a British Minister with the Tycoon of Japan at Jeddo. This important event in the history of our relations with that country took place on the 25th of August last, at the hour of nine in the morning, the time appointed for the delivery of the Queen's letter accrediting Mr. Alcock as her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Jeddo. The artist has seized the moment for his sketch when the Minister is addressing the Tycoon in a short speech conveying the desire of his Sovereign to cultivate relations of friendship with the Ruler of Japan. On one side, with his head to the ground, is one of the Governors of Foreign Affairs, licensing, acting as Master of the Ceremonies. Beyond him, on the right, are members of the High Council of State, kneeling; while opposite are three of the Ministers of State, one of these being the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The audience took place in the Palace of the Heir Apparent within the castle moats, the Palace of the Tycoon having been burned down last year. The palace is large and handsome, in a certain sense, yet deserving none of the extravagant terms which Kempfer and other writers bestow upon it. Like all other Japanese houses, it is devoid of furniture of any kind or description. The ceilings are not very high, but divided into compartments, lacquered, gilt, and painted in flowers, with very good effect. The walls are sliding screens covered with designs on a ground of gold upon which are depicted trees, flowers, and the much-esteemed stork, the symbol of longevity and happiness in Japan. The floors are matted—clean oblong mats, all six feet by three feet, and bordered with an edging of figured silk. This completes the inventory—carved ceilings, lacquered or painted sliding screens for walls, and matted floors; not for the upholstery part—nicente.

A Japanese Lord, like his serf, sits on his heels, eats off a little lacquer tray standing a few inches from the ground, and sleeps on the mats, with a pillow of lacquer or of wood. And thus they comfortable themselves that they preserve the Spartan simplicity of their great ancestors, contents with the same simple fare, and requiring no foreign luxuries.

It is something, however, that with all this exclusiveness, carried even into their political economy, the day has arrived when a British Minister can take up his residence in Jeddo, and is received by the Tycoon, not as were the Dutch chiefs of the Dutch factory crawling on their hands and knees with their heads to the ground between the rows of their tribute goods, while an attendant announced to some blank screen, behind which the Tycoon was supposed to be seated, "Hollonda Capitan," and no sooner uttered than the bold captain was required, crablike, to crawl his way out again; and for the painful and costly journey of some six weeks had to be taken once in every three years. Not thus are foreign representatives now received. The Minister on his arrival at the entrance of the palace was received by some of the governors of Foreign Affairs, all kami or nobles by virtue of their office if not by birth, such as in Russia. One of these, with a large escort of officers, had previously conducted the Minister's cortege the whole way from the Legation, and all the streets were kept by the man-equi and Tycoon's guards, or in the official quarter by Damios retainers, a distance of some four miles, no one, not even a Damio, being allowed to cross with in the line; and the same order was preserved on his return. When within the palace he was ushered with his suite into an elegant room, elegant at least in comparison with the Chinese barns in which Viceroys and the highest Mandarins live, where chairs had been provided expressly for the visitors. Here the powdered tea boiled up and frothy—the tea of ceremony—was handed round, reminding us of the brick tea pounded and boiled at this day by the nomade Tartars. The several Governors of Foreign Affairs, of which there are eight, then came to pay their respects—almost unrecognizable in their strange travesty of an ancient Court costume. On their shaven heads a sort of truncated hood turned bottom up, and lacquered, was perched; while, in addition to the usual flowing robes and wings of gauze, they each wore trousers so immoderately long that they floated behind them like a train, and they had to shuffle on, their feet being covered and hampered by the legs of the trousers on which they necessarily had to tread.



As things are ordered at the Tycoon's levee, nothing can exceed the general simplicity of the arrangements. The suite of rooms and corridors being unincumbered with furniture, and the former opening their whole width on the latter, are filled with officers and attendants in their costume of ceremony, all kneeling, five or six deep—mute and motionless. Not a sound is heard, except at stated occasions, when a general hissing—impossible to describe—seems to circulate through the whole building: it is a sort of sibilated "Hish—hi" and is supposed to indicate some movement or act of the Sovereign bespeaking reverence and a hushed attention.

Through these kneeling and sibilating courtiers and attendants—immediately after one of these rustlings of the breath of reverence, pointedly signalising the Tycoon taking his seat in the audience chamber—the British Minister, followed by Mr. Ensden, his acting secretary and Dutch interpreter, was ushered along the corridor by his shuffling guide, who, as he came to the edge of the council-room, instantly dropped on his knees, with his face bent to the mats, along which he advanced on his knees and hands until he reached the second, followed by the Minister, who walked by his side, the secretary remaining at the entrance with the Queen's letter until the Minister was announced, which act the prostrate Master of the Ceremonies accomplished in a language not known to grammars, English, Chinese, or Japanese,—probably an attempt to imitate our own title of "English Minister," but which sounded altogether strange on his lips. Here the Minister, bowing, advanced two more mats, and bowed a second time, and again to the sixth mat from the entrance—the third from the entrance to the inner chamber, where the Tycoon was seated in state, on a kind of square pedestal or throne of the simplest appearance, but raised many feet from the ground, and only a few paces from the spot where the Minister made his third reverence, and addressed his Majesty. The Tycoon replied in a few phrases, also of congratulation; and, Mr. Ensden advancing with the Queen's letter, the British Minister delivered it to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who rose to receive it.

The Tycoon then bowed, as the signal that the audience was over, and the Minister retired, bowing as when he entered. The Tycoon's appearance was that of a stout, full-grown youth of sixteen, wrapped in an ample robe of silk. In an adjoining room the Envoy received the compliments and salutations of the great Council of State, and by ten o'clock the whole ceremony was over, and the cortege was on its way back to the Legation.

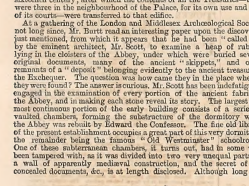
THE SMITHFIELD CATTLE-SHOW.

ALTHOUGH the evening of Monday was wet, the signs of the afternoon, and were away without bringing King Frost to preside at the great fat carnival, the meat producers from the shires had, as times go, a pretty pleasant week of it. We never saw the private view so well attended, and the dons of the stock and the agricultural implement world lingered in the main avenue for a parting peep as the gold medallists, long after the clock had tolled forth its ten o'clock curfew. In point of numbers, the show was somewhat short, and the Beauty's Butterfly, or Victoria, for Pusch, exactly took up a position as the reigning beauty, but still nearly every class was up to a good standard. The array of shorthorn oxen and steers was fifty per cent better than last year, and the Sussex reds, stimulated, it may be, by the Herd Book reform which has been made on their behalf, were also out with their more fashionable compeers. The Devon heifers were the cream of the whole; but still there was little room for complaint in several classes. No second prize was given in class 1, which chat celebrated feeder, Mr. William Heath, carried off with an ox of the purest Devon blood; and Earl Leicester was placed third, with a somewhat uneven animal, which found fewer admirers than the second prize ox. In class 3 Mr. Heath again won the first prize honours, and with the only Devon that he ever bred. Great hits are generally made by accident, and here lies the exception to the rule. Mr. Heath is the world's best calf among a grazing lot of twenty, and this future winner run by her side in size and muchine, and got but little in the ranks. But we will care behind the shoulders, but plainer about the rump, and there was certain coarseness which made us fancy that Mr. Heath would have rather recent date. Mr. Farquharson's Birmingham winner, whose pretty form was found on "nurses" in the whole of the class, was rather patchy, and so some cockneys term it, "colorado," but with a beautiful coat; and Mr. Booker's, which came next, did credit by his remarkable touch to the Earl of Derby's

Relics of the Past.

COFFERS OF THE ANCIENT ROYAL TREASURY.



We lately referred to some recent discoveries in connection with the Royal Treasury at Westminster, and are now enabled to lay before our readers representations of the larger and very scarce "cists" and "coffers," in which relics, or documents of importance were once put away preparatory to their deposition there. These are drawn from actual examples now remaining in what is called the "Pyx Chamber," in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey. This chamber was of old the storehouse of the Royal Treasury, and had been so from the period when the reigning Sovereign occupied the Palace close at hand. As such it remained till the beautiful Chapter House of the Monastery had been seized upon at the general crush of ecclesiastical establishments in the sixteenth century; after which the contents of all the Treasuries—there were three in the neighbourhood of the Palace, for its own use and that of its courts—were transferred to that edifice.

At a gathering of the London and Middlesex Archæological Society, not long since, Mr. Burtt read an interesting paper upon the discoveries just mentioned, from which it appears that he had been "called in" by the eminent architect, Mr. Scott, to examine a heap of rubbish lying in the cloisters of the Abbey, under which were known to exist original documents, many of the ancient "skippets," and other remnants of a "deposit" belonging evidently to the ancient treasury of the Exchequer. The question was how came they to be in a place wherein they were found? The answer is curious. Mr. Scott has been indefatigably engaged in the examination of every portion of the ancient fabric of the Abbey, and in making such stone reveal its story. The largest and most continuous portion of the early building consists of a series of vaulted chambers, forming the substructure of the dormitory when the Abbey was rebuilt by Edward the Confessor. The fine old library of the present establishment occupies a great part of this very dormitory, the remainder being the famous "Old Westminster" schoolroom. One of these subterranean chambers, it appears, had in some way or been tampered with; as it was divided into two very unequal parts by a wall of apparently mediæval construction, and the secret of the concealed documents, &c., is at length disclosed. Although long the storehouse of the Sovereign's wealth and the nation's most sacred archives, steadied, too, upon consecrated ground, and partly in the keeping of the wardens of the abbey, the Treasury possessed temptations sufficient to awaken cupidity even in its very guardians. Edward I., it is known, had for years been there storing up the sinews for carrying on the war in Scotland in a manner so rigorously that the entire wealth which in the year 1303 was transferred thither turned his authority in that country. In addition to the Royal jewels and plate, item of immense value, land cash to the amount of £100,000—equal to at least £2,000,000 of our present money—at one time accumulated in this repository. The King had scarcely crossed the borders of Scotland before he heard that this enormous treasure had been stolen. The details of the plundering and execution of the robbery, in which, as we have said, some of the abbey and palace servants were concerned, the remarkable confessions of some of the robbers, and the pursuit and punishment of others, are fully described in the official records of the period. One very striking circumstance, showing how systematically this piggery was carried on, seems the fact that early in the spring (the robbery took place in May) some of the monks had access to the cemetery of its abbey with hemp, for the purpose of ensuring a power which to storm and spoil they might not at the moment have facilities to remove!

After this dark page in the annals of the Treasury there is a blank in its history for some time. It was soon, however, occupied as before, though doubtless, strengthened, and its extent reduced by the interection of a wall which shut out several dampperous apartments, a small portion of the apartment cut off by this wall was the chamber of mystery, in which the "deposit" referred to was discovered.

In our previous observations on the ancient "skippets" and "hanapers" we drew attention to entries in the Calendar Rolls of the year 1323, relating to those of larger dimensions, in which the smaller were often enclosed. The larger of the accompanying Engravings exhibits a "Cist," as it was called, about four feet long and eighteen inches square. This is a perfect specimen of the curious and characteristic "signs" or figures designating its contents, but was probably one of those described in the Rolls of Exeter's quaint Calendar, as Cesse plenus cistes, ferris ligatus, cum quatuor serveris (a plain cist, bound with iron, with four locks). It is divided into three compartments, to each of which is a seperate lid. Many portions of the ironwork—the hinges and flaps of the locks especially—are delicately tooled with a graver, and the general character of the engraving is a very singular one. It was called a "forcer," is nearly round, and about two feet in diameter and one foot in depth. It is made of stout leather, bound with small bars of iron, disposed to give it the greatest strength, and is secured by a lock which has as many notices in the old Calendar—of the "forcerium corveium, ferro ligatum" ("a leathern forcer, bound with iron"). As in the case of the "cists," the "forcers" were usually distinguished by a sign; but the specimens before us is merely covered with small devices of the fleur-de-lys impressed upon the leather, and is therefore not to be identified by the references in the general descriptions of such places of deposit. In both "cists" and "forcers" the ironwork is remarkably without any particular distinction. It is certain, however, that the Royal plate was usually stored in the Pyx Chamber, and in the accounts of the great robbery it is stated that some of the boatmen of the abbey ferried over certain of the monks who lied with them just such a "forcer" as that which has been a great weight, but they knew not what."

Fragments of ironwork—exactly such ironwork as would have bound one of these forcers—were found amongst the heap just turned up in the portion of the Treasury, that was cut off after the robbery; and the most likely solution of the "find" is that, the contents of this apparently discarded portion were left in large period quite lost sight of or recklessly neglected. Possibly, the remains of human skin that have been detected under the crossbars of the doors belonging to this division of the Treasury, indicate the fate of one or more of the criminals concerned in this gigantic theft.

As to the "cists" and "forcers," those curious and almost unique relics of the olden time, let us hope that all which the "Pyx Chamber" still contains will be most carefully preserved.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

D. V. W., F. L., J. B., and others.—Too true: the omission of an important piece in Mr. Bilson's beautiful problem of last week renders the proposed solution impracticable. Our readers will be good enough to remedy the defect by adding a White Bishop at the White square on K. B. 3rd.

J. B. of Bedford, BISHOP, T. HATSEY, F. R., G. F. W.—Your problems shall be examined.

JUVENIS.—They have never been published collectively.

QUICK PLAY.—No; some of the finest game problems extant are the compositions of players of very inferior ability in the game. 2. Too, will find a complete account of the Paris Tournament in the forthcoming number of the Illustrated London News.

B. C.—Mr. Mollett is now in Paris. 2. Mr. Staunton has not yet returned to England.

A. K.—If competitors or problems would be kind enough to adopt the simple plan of writing the initials of the name in the corner of the diagram, they would be very frequently assisted, on occasions when that is our first enquiry would be of almost impossible occurrence.

F. C. D. L.—We cannot undertake to answer questions by letter. If your solution of problem No. 874 was not acknowledged, you may be sure that it was wrong, or that it arrived too late for insertion.

G. V., Spa.—Your correspondent will find a full account of the Paris Tournament in the forthcoming number of the Illustrated London News.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—A correspondent submits that as there is a spacious modern high-room at the Crystal Palace it would be a boon to resuscitate visitors if the directors would allow the Chess Club to hold its meetings there. 2. We fear that the proposal would be too difficulty to fulfil, as the Committee of Management refuse any partial to the game to organise a "Crystal Palace Chess Club." We agree with him, and recommend our correspondent to join the Metropolitan Club.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 1065.—VOL. XXXVII.] SATURDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1860. WITH TWO SUPPLEMENTS AND COLOURED SUPPLEMENT 1s.

CHRISTMAS DAY.

We have reached once again the porch of winter. We have immediately before us the gloomiest season of the year. There is a happy appropriateness in the coincidence that our most charming festival occurs when we most need its cheering influence. How should we manage to plod through dreary winter were we deprived of "merry Christmas"? From the closing days of autumn we look forward to it with complacency; to the opening days of spring it cheers us on with pleasant reminiscences. Like a brilliant light close to the entrance of a dark tunnel, it sheds its beams backwards, to lure on our lingering steps, and forwards to guide them far into the new year. Welcome, ever welcome, Christmas!

Welcome in any guise—even when he ushers himself in, damp and dripping, with wreaths of mist about his head, and raindrops thick upon his garments, and splashes of mud upon his feet—even then we are right glad to see him! The fouler the weather the less disposed are we to miss the guest. But should Old Christmas come, as he often does, in the costume which best befits him—should he wear, as seems most natural to him, the snowy habiliments of winter—should he invite us to go forth with him and look upon Nature in her silent sleep—we hail his appearance with a still heartier greeting. Our forefathers saw him oftener than we do in this hale condition. But we have no reason to complain: what we lose in one way we more than gain in others. High cultivation has toned down our climate; and, on the whole, we have no reason to regret that we are less exposed than were our predecessors to its extremes.

Christmas Day, quite irrespectively of the great fact which it commemorates, makes the blood of most people bound more joyously through their veins for the simple reason that it is a holiday, to an immense number the holiday of the year. There is a greater moral significance in this statement than appears at first blush. Where continuous daily work, whether of the muscles or the brain, is the condition of life—as it is with the vast majority of our countrymen—a day's holiday, temperately and rationally spent, is to the soul what a bath is to the body—refreshing, cleansing, invigorating, gladdening. It washes away the dry and dusty coating which monotonous toil and incessant cares deposit upon the surface of the mind; calls into play a host of suppressed, or, at any rate, unused susceptibilities; makes us conscious of a more elastic, a fuller, life than that with which we are and gives a healthier tone to all the powers of the will. It is quite a mistake to suppose that work is necessarily more ennobling than recreation. Each is beautiful in its place; but the one, no less than the other, is injurious in excess. In this busy country the prevailing tendency is to overtax the bodily and mental faculties, not so much by severity of toil as by its long continuity, and the result is a comparative numbness of the better feelings and the higher affections of our nature—a limitation of life to an unvarying and almost mechanical routine, and a gradual closing up of the pores through which the kindlier and more refined sensibilities of humanity derive and express satisfaction. We wish there were more national holidays than there are. We rejoice that some abridgment of the hours of toil, and some recognition of the right of both body and mind to stated recreation, is growing more and more into public favour; and we hope that, before the lapse of many years, the balance between what is due to business and what to rest and enjoyment, will be fairly struck. Meanwhile, we cherish Christmas Day as a precious possession—how precious, who can calculate! For which of us can compute the amount of restorative energy it diffuses through our social system, in the sympathies it awakens, the affections it brings into play, the diversion from care it effects, the soured feelings and ennobles, and the quickening impulse it gives to the pulse of ordinarily conversant, and more enjoyable general life?

To most of our readers, however, Christmas presents charms peculiar to itself, as the season set apart by custom to family reunion. It would seem to be a special characteristic of the Teutonic race to watch with deepest interest and tenderest solicitude over the sanctities of home, and Christmas has been consecrated by them, from time immemorial, to the performance of domestic rites. May it ever continue to be so! The collection round the festive table of members of the family scattered, perhaps, throughout the year over a wide extent of country; the hearty greetings, the loving inquiries, the fond reminiscences, the interchanges of affectionate expression; the mingling together in hilarious enjoyment of old, and young, frosty-headed grandparents and toddling infants; the good cheer, invariably the same—the fat turkey, the noble sirloin, the plum-pudding, the snap-dragon; the buoyant mirth, the games and romps, in which age and childhood meet for the nonce on the same level; the very garniture of the rooms, the holly and the mistletoe—light and warmth within, and perhaps burly winter without—taken altogether, what a freshening influence they exert upon the heart! To any one who is far away from home and its associations, what touching memories does the recurrence of this day conjure up before him! In all our colonies and dependencies, in sunny India, in every quarter of the globe, what myriads there are of English kith and kin, over whom Christmas Day sheds a hallowed light specially conducive to the strengthening of the ties which bind their affection and allegiance to the old country! No one would conjecture, until experience has revealed the secret to him, what heaps of fuel for the home affections Christmas Day annually stores up in the heart.

Aye, and it is a merry Christmas that we wish one another—not only a benevolent wish, but a wise one. The festival is of a kind that invites mirth to preside at it, and they who wilfully banish her from her proper place know not what they lose. On such an occasion she is the aptest and most genial mistress of the ceremonies. She melts down, by the witchery of her smile, the icy rigidities which insensibly congeal upon the surface of the feelings during long periods of absence from one another. She puts hearts en rapport with incredible ease. She smooths away all the little asperities of temper, and rounds off all the angularities of individual character, which prevent even members of the same family from quickly coalescing. Under her benign influence, just in proportion as it begins to tell, you may see black cares and venomous jealousies, and brooding suspicions, and young enmities trooping away into their native darkness, and the space they have vacated promptly and joyously reoccupied by the tenderer sentiments, sympathies, and affections which they had expelled. Few peacemakers are so successful as mirth—few do their gracious work so unostentatiously. Genuine laughter, especially when they who share in it are known to each other, is a sovereign medicine, a specific remedy (if only applied in time) for the uncomfortable and discomforting evils which grow out of an atrabilious condition, and no agent is more potent in routing out from the bosom the "creeping things" which sometimes find shelter there. Commend us, therefore, to a "merry Christmas," as one of the best alteratives that can be taken at the close of a toilsome year—and if, happily, children are the chief provocatives of mirth, so much the better. Their freshness is like the freshness of the morning air—strangely reviving. The effect of their exuberant hilarity is like dew upon the spirit, wholesome and cooling to minds fevered and made restless by daily anxieties. We cannot wish our readers a kinder wish than that of a "merry Christmas" in a well-rounded family circle.

There is a shady side to this picture, we are aware. The severed tie, the vacant place, the altered circumstances, the irremediable dispersion, will often tinge with sorrow the festivities of the day. Many a closed wound will bleed afresh in presence of observances in which bad blood once have formerly assisted. But the pain is not without its alleviations—certainly, not without its purifying uses. It is on such occasions we place an immortelle on the tomb of the departed, and leave with it part of our own selfishness. Our very sadness opens our sympathies, as the shades of evening open certain fragrant flowers. Our fond regrets remind us that we are not all our own—that we belong, in part at least, to others.

But what we have, as well as what we miss, should teach us this same lesson. At no season more than at Christmas are we reminded that others have a claim upon us—at none is that claim more urgent—by none is it more eloquently and impressively enforced. Our very jollity regarded as Christmas-tide as peculiarly her own. We cannot enter into the spirit of the season without gladly recognising the fact that man, especially man in want, belongs to the brotherhood of which we are members. A call is made upon us by the law of our common humanity—no less than by the genius and precepts of the religion we profess, to dispense generously to such as lack them the superfluous means we may ourselves enjoy. The consciousness that we have put it within the reach of the poor that poor legend of "Merry Christmas" will enhance the pleasure of our own festivities. To diffuse gladness is the surest way to increase gladness. We make that most our own which we sympathisingly distribute to meet the necessities of others—of it is a grand truth, proved by uniform experience, that "it is more blessed to give than to receive." "Remember the poor" is the practical exhortation of our festal day—an exhortation to which we should give the more earnest heed because, as the old song has it, "Christmas comes but once a year."

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Emperor has decided that from January next, and by way of reciprocity, Englishmen coming to France shall be permitted to enter and travel through the country without passports.

The Moniteur announced week—the "Life of Cæsar"—is already in the press, and is expected to be out by the middle of January.

The Empress of the French arrived at Paris on Thursday at night, accompanied by the Emperor, who went to meet her at Fontainebleau. The health of her Majesty, so much shaken by the loss of her sister, is now much more satisfactory.

On the 1st of January next the Emperor will receive the diplomatic corps, the constituted bodies of State, and deputations from the National Guard and the army. A general amnesty will be granted on the 1st of January.

M. Billault, Minister without portfolio, has been appointed Minister of the Interior during the absence of M. de Persigny, who has paid a visit to his estates.

Last Saturday's Moniteur contained a decree organising the Ministry of the Interior into two departments under Directors-General. The office of Secretary-General to the Ministry is suppressed. The decree also contains the appointment of eight Prefects and several Councillors of State.

M. Troplong, First President of the Court of Cassation, has been appointed President of the Senate for the year 1861, in the room of First Vice-President; and Marshals Baraguay d'Hilliers, Regnaud de Saint Jean d'Angely, and Pelissier, Vice-Presidents.

France has a new Minister, two Secretaries of three varieties—viz., the Ministers with portefeuille, or acting Ministers; the Ministers with portefeuille sans parole, or speaking Ministers; the Ministers with neither portefeuille nor parole, and who are known as the fac-simile Ministers. The first class of M. Rouher, Vice-President of the Senate in the Cabinet as President of the Senate), and Vaillant (as head of the household).

The Moniteur contains a decree reducing the number of officials in the Imperial Courts of Rennes and Poitiers, augmenting the number of tribunals, and in some towns and districts reducing the number. The Moniteur also publishes a decree suppressing the prohibition against the exports from Algeria of barley for horse consumption.

M. Emile Ollivier, the deputy for Paris, has lodged an application for leave to start a new weekly paper, to be called either Le Libéral or Le Suffrage Universel, or L'Electeur.

SPAIN.

The Government will submit the project of the new tariff to the Cortes in January next. The project of Expenses has been voted. The Lean Español announces that General Narvaez has retired altogether into private life.

Disastrous inundations have taken place in Granada. Several buildings were overthrown at Motril and Velez Rubio. The losses are very heavy, and many children were killed and injured.

The Espana says:—"The chiefs of the Moderados have deliberated on their future course of conduct. Senor Gonzalez Bravo stated the necessity for the party to coalesce either with the Absolutist or Revolutionary party, when the proposition was discussed, expressed his intention of joining the Revolutionary party."

ITALY.

Telegrams from Naples stated that a fortnight's armistice between the combatants at Gaeta had been brought about by the joint representations by Baron Brenier of England and Count Ludolf of Prussia. It was further stated that the French Emperor has intimated to the King of Naples that if at the expiration of the fifteen days he should persist in his useless defence of Gaeta, he must withdraw from Gaeta and leave him to his fate. For three days, it appears, hostilities were suspended. Later advices, however, state that the bombardment of Gaeta would recommence, in consequence of the refusal of Francis II. to accept the conditions offered him. The King has issued a manifesto, calling upon the Neapolitans to support him. The commission on summary, and military Parliaments for the Two Sicilies; and intimates that, even if at present defeated, he will still retain the hope of returning to his dominions.

The Italian National Fund Committee have received information from Brigadier-Colonel Peard, commandant of the British legion, that he is making arrangements for the embarkation of the whole British legion from Salerno for England. He has chartered the Melazzo, the vessel in which the London committee sent out the first detachment of the exacuniates to Cagliari, to bring home 250 of the men whose homes lie in the south of England; and the Euphrosine to bring home the remainder of the men, whose homes lie in the north of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Colonel Peard has requested Captain de Rohan, the agent of the London committee in Naples, to charter the Melazzo and Euphrosine, and report upon their fitness for transport.

Sardinia and Savoia, unable to contend with the force of international politics, have proceeded mutually to recall their diplomatic representatives.

From Rome we hear of the death of Cardinal Gazola. Several Bishops, those of whom are suburban, have been appointed. Benevento is lent to the Holy See. Reactionary movements have often place at several places in the March provinces and in Umbria. The Zouaviral Zouaviresse have re-seasoned Rome.

AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY.

The Wiener Zeitung of Saturday contains four Imperial autograph letters. The first relieves Count Goldschmidt of his functions as Minister of the Interior. The second appoints Baron Schmerling Minister of the Interior. The third nominates Herr von Plener Minister of Finances. The fourth confers the Grand Cross of the Order of St. Stephen on Herr Reichberg and Goldschmidt.

The Baron F. Richter has been found guilty of bribing Field-Marshal Eynatten, who committed suicide, with railway shares valued at about £2000, "to induce him to be partial to the Austrian Government relative to the supplies of the army." He is acquitted of a direct fraud of £40,000, but convicted of insufficient proof of having made fraudulent financial statements and reduced the quantity and quality of a large supply of coffee. Eynatten's suicide is alleged to have been implicated in this last transaction were also acquitted. For the latter offence Von Richter is to be imprisoned for a year, to fast three days on bread and water; and to pay the sum of £2500 to the Government fund for the city of Vienna; also the costs of the trial. The value of spirits taken by the soldiers in Austria-Hungary is not more reasoning. The Countess generally are exasperating themselves by their own folly. Russia is one of more complete constitutional reforms. Some further rich have also taken place, consequently the Industrial exhibition of Pesth is delayed. The laws of 1848 are everywhere recognised as the basis of Government, and an independent Ministry for Hungary is at hand. The conference at Gran sits on the 16th, and special resolutions of the same character.

The Congregation of Arad has convoked a general assembly of the Arad Comitat for the 29th of December, on the basis of the law of 1848, for the purpose of considering the election to the seats in the committee, and of electing the officers of the Comitat. The parishes are to elect one representative for every thousand inhabitants, and not to be responsible for the maintenance of peace and order.

The Wanderer publishes telegrams from Zara, dated the 16th and 17th inst., announcing the violent stamp-duties and agitation prevailed in that city, and in the provincial towns of Dalmatia, against the administration of Count Wickenburg, Governor of Croatia, against the project being first submitted for the approval of the Dalmatian Diet.

RUSSIA.

The Russians have experienced further defeats in Circassia. The mountaineers were victorious at Tchoubek, Mahadi and Mémaut Bey.

According to the Deutsch Post, Deutsch has dispatched a threatening letter to Prince Gouza, and concentrated 12,000 men in Bessarabia on account of the preparations making in Moldavia and Wallachia for a suppressed union of the several principalities, embracing, among others, Hungary and Poland.

TURKEY.

Twelick Effendi has been appointed to replace Mouskar Pasha as Minister of Finance.

An angry discussion has taken place between the Porte and the Sublime Minister, on account of some Sardinian vessels having left for the Danube with arms for the Servians, and also for the Bulgarians of Servia. Three of the vessels were stopped by order at Sulina, but have been released, and will take their cargoes of munition back to Genoa.

A commission of inquiry has been sent from Constantinople into Syria.

New commercial treaties are being negotiated between the Porte and England and France, and Belgium.

By the advice of the English and French Ambassadors, a Byzantian commission of inquiry has been appointed, under the presidency of Ismail Pacha, of the Danube.

General Hahn has left Constantinople.

The Sultan has commenced retrenchments in the expense of the palace.

Letters from Pelgoritza states that a conflict had taken place between the Turks and the Montenegrins.

The official list of the Roumelian Commission have been nominated. The Principalities are tranquil.

The Mixed Commission is shortly proceed to Master of Syria.

The question of the occupation of Syria was still being discussed. The Porte appears likely to consent to the occupation being prolonged.

UNITED STATES.

The second Session of the thirty-sixth Congress commenced at Washington on the 4th inst., when President Buchanan delivered his annual Message to both Houses of the Legislature. The Times says:—After the reading of the President's Message the following announcement was received at the office of the Associated Press:—"That so much of the Message as related to the perilous condition of the country for months past, was received throughout the House with tears from each State."

In the Senate, after the reading of the Message, Mr. Clingman, of North Carolina, in moving its publication, opened the discussion upon the disunion question, and expressed strong Secession views. Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, replied in a speech of conciliation. The Senate soon afterwards adjourned.

The Message was followed by those of extreme opinions from both North and South.

There is not much news from the South relative to the Secession movement. A despatch from Alabama states that the disunion feeling is rapidly gaining ground, and that one-half the counties will be represented fully by Secessionists. The Grand Jury of the Federal Court in Montgomery, before adjourning, presented the Union as a nullity, and declared that the only hope for the salvation of the Union was the President's Message has taken the people by surprise. They expected him to be more decided and energetic. The Legislature approved his determination to send no more troops to the Charleston forts, and stated that the compromise must be done on the basis of non-intervention. The Breckenridge members of the Virginia Electoral College have resigned, and allowed the whole State vote to go for Bell and Everett. The Georgia Convention will meet on the 16th inst. Secession of the Southern States. This was received as an indication that Georgia would secede.

The powder-magazine of a Spanish frigate has exploded off Brooklyn. Three persons were killed and twenty wounded.

INDIA.

The 5th Europeans have mutined at Dumpore, and have been disbanded. One man was shot.

The commissariat reported the income tax continues to be maintained in Bombay.

The Government of India have published an important despatch, enumerating no fewer than 16 public works postponed or retarded for want of funds. It is stated that the Court of Directors have sanctioned all for these projects, but the means are not forthcoming at present. The Government of India has also decided that from the 1st of July next no incomes above £50 a year, a quarter of a million this year, and half a million next year.

AUSTRALIA

The meeting of the Melbourne Parliament had been postponed to the 25th of September. The Victorian revenue was progressing, and the force numbering 5000 men. The yield of gold had slightly decreased, and in the gold-fields revivalism was increasing, with its usual rightful results.

At Sydney the Land Bill was under discussion in the Assembly, and in the Council the Bill for the Abolition of Transportation had passed.

The problem as to the possibility of crossing the continent from south to north has been virtually solved, and no end to the others that a bad transit may be opened up available, not only for the general purposes of commerce, but for telegraphic communication. Mr. Stuart, who started from Adelaide about last March on an exploring expedition, with two companions and a number of horses, has returned, after a journey of 1800 miles, to Adelaide. He left the 1600 miles from Adelaide and to within 200 miles of the Victoria River. He found the country to be of a very favourable character. On the had already reached 100 miles further north than the point to which Gregory's expedition in 1856 descended from the Victoria, the continent may be considered, by the joint results of these surveys, to have been virtually opened up as one end to the other. Instead of an arid desert, it is described to be a practicable country throughout. The Parliament of South Australia has voted £2500 to enable Mr. Stuart to start again with a larger and more strongly organised party. Mr. Stuart and his companions suffered terribly from want, not only of water, but food, and also from an attack of scurvy. The part of the route in which water was totally absent, however, was only 60 miles in length, and the blacks generally were splendid men and other trees, including at least four kinds of palm. A very large salt lake was also discovered in the interior, supposed, from its blueness of its water, to be of great depth. At Adelaide, the general impression was that a number of new provinces would ultimately be formed in the territory thus explored, and that meanwhile the line might be made available almost forthwith to facilitate communication with India, and especially the export trade in horses.

NEW ZEALAND.

The news from New Zealand is to the 13th of October, General Pratt had returned to Taranaki to protect it from the anticipated attack by the Waikatos, who were expected in about a week. On the 11th of October a fight took place at Waitara, but from the small palm in accession. Not a man was killed on our side, but several were wounded, and among them Captain Paley, of the Royal Engineers, severely, but not dangerously.

The New Zealand Examiner states that the Government is taking active measures to raise troops and supplies in New Zealand. In addition to the Norwood, which sailed last month with a battery of horse artillery and six Armstrong guns, the ships African and Lord of Mar and Kellie are under orders to sail with a large quantity of miscellaneous stores in the course of a few days, and the Mersey is also to be despatched shortly. We are also given to understand that a considerable commissariat force will shortly be dispatched.

The successor of the late Bishop Selwyn has been elected in the person of the son of Wherowhero, who has been elected, and has assumed the title of "Potatau II."

PRESIDENT BUCHANAN'S MESSAGE.

The following are the principal passages of President Buchanan's annual message to the United States' Congress. The document itself is a very long one, occupying nine columns of the New York journals:—

"Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives,—Throughout the year, since our last meeting, the country has been eminently prosperous in all the material elements of wealth. Our fields have been made to yield more abundantly than ever before, and general health has been enjoyed. Our commerce has been abundant, and plenty smiles throughout the land. Our commerce and manufactures have been prosecuted with energy and industry, and have yielded fair and ample returns. In short, no nation in the tide of time has ever possessed a greater amount of general prosperity than we have done until within a recent period. Why is it, then, that discontent now so extensively prevails, and the Union is in danger? I answer, with all truth and sincerity, in the general and universal belief that a sectional party, acting in the name of and exclusively for the benefit of the Northern States has at length produced its natural effects. The different sections of the Union are now arrayed against each other, and the time has arrived so much dreaded by the fathers of the country, when the passions and prejudices of the North and South, founded upon geographical distinctions, have become too violent to be allayed by the ordinary influence of fraternal feelings. The honest and violent agitation of the slavery question throughout the North for the last quarter of a century has, at length, produced an malign influences on the slaves, and inspired them with vague notions of freedom. Hence a sense of security no longer exists around the family altar. This feeling of peace at home has given place to apprehensions of servile insurrections. Indeed, a sense of general insecurity exists throughout the South, calculated to weaken the bonds which unite us together. Should the apprehensions of many good men prove to be well founded, and should such a calamity befall us as the overthrow of the Union, it is impossible to conceive that we could escape from the loss of our liberties, and the civil and religious blessings connected with them. In such a case we should be the most miserable people on the face of the earth. We could not long maintain our existence as a nation in all our present territorial limits. We should soon be divided into two great confederacies, or perhaps into four or five, each one of which would be exposed to the invasion of some foreign foe. Long before this period our youthful population would be converted into armies, and military chieftains would rise up in every part of the country, who could command them. Liberty could never long survive such changes. Limited as has been the power exercised by the Federal Government during the existence of the present generation, it has conferred upon us and the nations of the earth more substantial benefits than any government of equal power which has ever existed in the world. Under its auspices our country has risen to the first rank among the nations in all the elements of material greatness. Our people have been free and happy, and the energies of the human mind and heart have been developed to an extent unknown in any other age. Nor can we contemplate the past without admiration and gratitude. Our fathers, in establishing the Federal Constitution, builded wisely and well for themselves and their posterity. Their deeds will be remembered and their names revered as long as the world shall endure. Their patriotism and wisdom will be the subject of history and song to the latest generations of mankind. Is it possible, then, that we, the degenerate children of such an ancestry, can be engaged in the work of destroying the most perfect system of government ever devised by man? Can we be accessory to the overthrow of the fairest fabric of human wisdom? Can we be willing to extinguish the fairest light which has ever illuminated the pathway of nations? Can we be ready to quench the fairest hope which has ever animated the human heart? Can we be ready to destroy the labours of the wise and the good of former generations? Can we be willing to blot out the memory of our fathers? Can we be willing to forfeit the good opinion of mankind? Can we be willing to become a byword of reproach throughout the earth? Can we be willing to commit political suicide? Can we be willing to commit national suicide? I trust in God that we are not. Our Union must and shall be preserved. It shall endure as long as the earth we inhabit, or the heavens which bend over us. Let every man who loves his country and desires to transmit to his children the blessings of liberty, proclaim this sentiment in a voice of thunder, and let the echo reverberate throughout the land. Let the abolitionists hear it, and cease their agitation. Let the Disunionists hear it, and abandon their treasonable designs. Let the politicians hear it, and change their sectional platforms of party. Let the people hear it, and responding to the voice of millions, declare that the Union shall be preserved.

"Our relations with Great Britain are of the most friendly character. Since the commencement of my administration two despatches have been received from the British Government, complaining, mainly from the right of search carried by the British cruisers on board of vessels under the American flag. The discordant constructions of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty between the two Governments, which gave rise to much of the discussion on the Nicaragua aspect, have resulted in a final settlement entirely satisfactory to the Government. Thus, one by one, the causes of complaint between the two great civilised nations, and especially to those engaged in foreign commerce, that the claim on the part of Great Britain to search ships on the high seas, under pretence of searching for slaves, or for the right of visitation, has been abandoned. This proposition, in the form presented, was never before made by any minister which has existed since the war of 1812. Whilst it remained pending, it was calculated to embarrass our friendly relations. Happily, it was the only question of any importance still remaining open in the department of foreign affairs. Our relations with Great Britain are now in the vicinity of Washington territory. As this question is still under negotiation, it would be improper for me to make any statement in regard to the advance to the subject. The recent visit of the Prince of Wales in a private character to the United States will be productive, in all future time, of great good. In consequence it cannot fail to increase the kindred and kindly feelings which, I trust, may ever exist between the two countries, and to strengthen the political and social intercourse with each other.

"The Government of France continues to maintain our relations continue to be of the most friendly character.

"Our relations with the great empire of Russia are all that we could desire. Between no two countries could there exist a more cordial friendship, and, dangerous, character than they have been for many years. Our citizens have long been in the habit of visiting Russia, and numerous Russians visit Government. These have been ably urged for a series of years by our successive diplomatic representatives, and without bringing forth success. It is more than probable that the final adjustment of these claims will devolve upon my successor. I have, however, recommended in my last annual message of December, 1858, and repeated in that of December, 1859, in favour of an appropriation of a sum not exceeding five per cent. to prevent the slave trade throughout the world, and especially on the coast of Africa. In this connection I believed that the transfer of Cuba to the United States, upon conditions highly honourable to both parties, would forever banish the slave trade from the western hemisphere.

"Between the emperor of Austria and the remaining Continental Powers, with the exception of Spain, our relations continue on the most satisfactory character.

"The friendly and peaceful policy pursued by the Government of the United States towards the empire of China has produced the most satisfactory results. The treaty of Tien-Tsin of the 18th of June, 1858, has been faithfully observed by the Chinese authorities.

"Our relations with Mexico still remain in a most unsatisfactory condition."

The financial condition of the country is briefly discussed. The President refers to the pressure of retrenchment contained in his first annual message, and shows that it has been redeemed by a considerable reduction in the annual expenditure during the last two years.

"It is with great satisfaction I communicate the fact that since the date of my last annual message not a single slave has been imported into the United States in violation of the laws prohibiting the African slave trade."

The message concludes with some remarks about the necessity of modifications in the tariff.

CHINA.—CONCLUSION OF THE WAR.

Intelligence was received at the Foreign Office last Saturday afternoon through St. Petersburg from Pekin, up to the 9th of November, stating that peace was concluded on the 26th of October, and the ratifications exchanged. On the 5th of November the allied forces evacuated Pekin, and the Emperor was expected immediately to return to his capital. This intelligence was communicated by the Russian Government to Sir John Crampton at St. Petersburg, and by him transmitted to the Foreign Office.

A similar notice appeared in Sunday's Moniteur:—"The Ambassador of the Emperor at St. Petersburg announces, by a telegraphic despatch dated to-day (16th), that the Russian Government has received intelligence that Baron Gros and Lord Elgin entered Pekin on the 24th of October, and that peace was signed on the 25th. The ratifications were exchanged on the same day. The Emperor of China, who on leaving for Mantchouria had given his brother, Prince Kong, the necessary power to conclude this treaty, was not willing to return to his capital, which the allied forces had begun to evacuate."

A telegram was received at the Foreign Office on Sunday from our Minister at Pekin, announcing that the Russian Government have received no news concerning the fate of our missing countrymen, Messrs. Bowlby and Brabazon.

Several important despatches (for which we regret we have not room) have been received from Lord Elgin and Sir Frederick Bruce, correspondence which passed between Lord Elgin and the Prince of Kung, and a highly-interesting memorandum. The Prince opposed Kung is a highly-interesting memorandum. The Prince opposed Kung is a highly-intelligent man, and Lord Elgin should understand that he was no be very anxious, for the safety of the British prisoners, as he was responsible for the illtreatment of the Russian prisoners. From his unwillingness to part with Consul Parkes, it is obvious that he wished to turn this publication to as much account as possible in the way of prestige. Mr. Lock's narrative of the capture of himself, of Mr. Parkes and the other members of their party, and of the treatment they met with, Lord Elgin comments in one of his despatches upon the difficulties of his position in regard to the prisoners; and contrasts with the firmness he has given up, and the tone he has preserved, the extreme weakness which he would storm Pekin, their lives would, in all probability, have been sacrificed. It is surprising to learn, from Mr. Lock's narrative, that Mr. Grant, that the missing prisoners have been taken into the interior, and were seen on the road.

We have received a batch of illustrations from our Special Artist in Pekin, which will speedily appear in our pages. One is a large sketch—an engraved on pages 582 and 583 of this week's Impression.

The Daily News correspondent writes from the "Camp before Pekin, October 25," as follows:—

"The Chinese authorities in Pekin appearing disposed to temporise and to endeavour to evade the fulfilment of the conditions of peace, the gate of the city should be occupied by our troops, batteries were constructed, and the walls, which were commanded by our guns, breached at 100 yards from the north wall of the city. Last evening those batteries being to the English were armed with four 68-pounder guns and two 8-inch mortars, and the Chinese were informed that unless the gate was thrown open at noon to-day the guns would open fire. They had offered no resistance to our walls being breached, and had evidently had neither means nor desire to prolong the conflict. Accordingly we paraded this morning at eight o'clock precisely, and at twelve o'clock the gate was opened to us and occupied by detachments of the French and English divisions. The Russian troops are now upon the walls, and the English and French flags are flying over the gateway. It is anticipated that the ratifications will probably be exchanged and the army be on its way back to Tien-Tsin in ten days. The greater part of the force will remain in Pekin. There is not intended that the troops should enter the town beyond the gates; indeed, it is thought that such a proceeding would lead to universal tumult, of which the mob would take advantage to pillage the Chinese city. Various prisoners—six, eight, or ten, I believe—of the late French soldier, were brought in and given up yesterday. They are the remains of a party of fifteen who were sent together from Tien-Tsin in March last. Twelve thirty of forty days ago, I believe, of these men and one sowar. They were very badly treated, and there is no doubt that their hardships were caused by some of the Frenchmen and five sowars. Of the first party, poor Anderson, O. Norman, and one more died; and of the second party, two Frenchmen a tilt against all whom the world has been accustomed to regard as authorities in the matter. In this he differs widely from the great majority of writers on art of the present day, and notably from one whose extravagant pretensions have made some little noise in his time, but have already begun to settle down into the neglect and contempt to which they are fully entitled.

As an instance of his calm, argumentative style we may refer to what the author says on the subject of the arch, which the majority of authorities consider to have been unknown to the Greeks, but which, by reference to various writers and existing remains of antiquity, he contends to have been used long before the time of the Greeks—as by the ancient Assyrians, Egyptians, and others, fifteen centuries and more before the Christian era. This argument is an important one, as it is upon this foundation that Mr. Falkener justifies a plan for the restoration of the Pantheon put forward by him, in which a vaulted ceiling, with a hypæthral opening, is a distinguishing feature.

So also in regard to the much-disputed question as to whether the ancient Greeks coloured their sculptures, he places the arguments on both sides very dispassionately, the result of the whole being to establish a modified case in favour of the practice. "While," says the author, "we defend the application of polychromy to sculpture, we must remember that the instances which have been mentioned may rather be considered as exceptions, and that even where colour was applied it was applied with the utmost delicacy." In the flesh it appears to have been but sparingly used, whilst in draperies and accessories it was more fully employed. The colouring, as regarded the flesh, probably went little farther than a toning, to subdue the intensity of the white marble, which, left to itself, would produce a disagreeable harshness in the shadows. There is the authority of Pliny and Vitruvius for the facts that not only in architecture but in sculpture such was done, other by means of milk and saffron or wax and oil, even where more positive local colour was not resorted to.

Mr. Falkener is a stanch adherent to classic art, and to the ideal as an essential of classic art, and he supports these views eloquently and soundly. On the other hand, he points out the decrepitude of modern art, and speculates upon the causes of it in a way which shows at once profound observation and sound logical powers. Though he does not, apparently, take delight in finding fault, there are some abominations in our modern street art which he cannot avoid visiting with severe rebuke.—the Wellington statue, for instance, and that other abomination, styled the Angel of Victory, recently set up as an experiment by Baron Marochetti at the flank of the grounds of Apsley House facing Rotten-row.

Mr. Falkener's book is full of good sense and fine taste admirably expressed, and we cordially commend it to the attention of all who pretend to any knowledge or love of art.

DAEDALUS: OR, THE CAUSES AND PRINCIPLES OF THE EXCELLENCE OF GREEK SCULPTURE. By EDWARD FALKENER. Longman and Co.

IN reference to the title of this volume the author tells us in his preface—"The name of Daedalus carries us back to the very infancy of art, to the time of Theseus and Hercules, before the Trojan War, when history is concealed in a veil of myths and legends. The very existence, then, of Daedalus has been denied by some, though I am bound to believe that he was an Athenian by birth, the son of Metion, and grandson of Erectheus, King of Athens." And in apology for arrogating to his humble offering so great a name—

Dedalus ingenio fabre celebrimus artis—(OVID, Met. viii. 159)—

he states—"It is not by choice, but by necessity, that it is so named, for in consequence of his great celebrity all statues were named after him δαιδαλα; and therefore a work on sculpture can bear no other name." Conceding this rather fanciful postulate, we proceed to the substance of the work, which we find to be written in a tone of gravity becoming its importance, and with a ripe knowledge of the subject. Indeed, what we most admire in Mr. Falkener, and what cannot fail to recommend him to all thoughtful and unprejudiced readers, is that, with very strong convictions of his own on certain points, he treats with respect the written evidences and opinions of those who have preceded him, seeking rather to reconcile his views with theirs by a careful consideration and comparison of their statements than to obtain a vulgar and transitory triumph by running

THE MUSEUM OF CLASSICAL ANTIQUITIES; being a Series of Essays on Ancient Art. Edited by E. FALKENER. Longman and Co.

This is another valuable contribution to the literature of the fine arts by the author of the preceding. Originally published in quarterly issues, it now appears in a completed form, and comprises a series of most able essays on the remains of ancient art in all parts of the world, copiously illustrated by engravings. We have read with particular interest the papers on the Mausoleum at Halicarnassus; another on the Paintings of the Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi; one on the Collections of Ancient Art in the Museums of Italy, the Glyptothek of Munich, and the British Museum; one on the Tree Site of Calvary, and various on the architectural remains in Naples and Sicily.

The Leisure Hour.—The volume of this periodical, complete for 1860, has been published. Among the popular serials of the day this essentially keeps up its character as a family journal of instruction and recreation. There is palpable progress in the letterpress department, while on the illustrations great pains have been bestowed; and the fact that many of the engravings are taken from the works of such artists, among others, as John Gilbert and Samuel Read, is of itself a sufficient guarantee of their quality.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1860.

The decree of the Emperor of the French by which the passport system all over his dominions is abolished in favour of the subjects of her British Majesty, is, probably it may, in some degree, take the English public by surprise, seems to us to be a judicious, if not a necessary, sequence to the arrangements under the commercial treaty. No doubt, the removal of that which was an obstruction, and to the roving inhabitants of these islands the most vexatious of all obstructions, is felt and acknowledged by mere travellers, using that term in its more pleasurable meaning. But, if there be anything in the intent and object of the convention by which the Emperor has pledged his word, as it has been by which the Queen has, to remove frequent and regular commercial intercourse between France and England, the displacing of a restriction on the movements of persons moving about the former country on matters of pure business is incalculable advantage, tending not to send materially to facilitate personal interchange. In the trade operations which, we trust and believe, are about to ensue between the mercantile sections of both populations there will now be no difference in regard to locomotion in France and that which pertains to England. Until now, supposing that a matter of trade between a house in London and one at Lyons required the presence of an agent of the English merchant, and the person selected had not a passport by him, it would require, before he could set out, to procure one, in which, in which might, perhaps, tend to neutralise the effect of the transaction. Henceforward, in any case of this kind, the English trader will have nothing more to do than to put himself into the train and proceed to Lyons, as he would do if he were about to start for Manchester, and quietly proceed to his destination in France without let or hindrance. Again; we have in England a system of commercial travelling, technically so called, which will probably be extended to France, and the absence of passport regulations will act very materially on the facility for coming and going, and the rapidity of movement, which is essentially a part of the machinery of the commercial locomotion to which we allude. Then, although it may be considered a small matter, the saving of expense in reference to a passport is not to be thrown out of consideration. The sum expended in this respect may be small in itself, but it represents a species of tax on commercial intercommunication between the two countries, and its abolition is another contribution of the principles of free trade. Of one thing there can be no doubt—that, in all things great and small, the policy of the Emperor of the French is directed towards the interlacing and interweaving of the interests of his country and our own. Whether, however, the policy of Mr. Pitt, capable of common feeling and intimate connection is of service towards the ultimate attainment of such a state of things as will render hostility between us and our nearest neighbours as nearly impossible as it can be made, is a question for future discussion; for it will be only by an impulse of passionate and unreasoning folly, if all goes as we believe and expect, that on either side of the Channel cause can be given or accepted for animosity, with its consequent action. It will be strange, too, if the people of France do not recognise in the course now pursued by the Emperor in reference to the internal government of his people the influence of that feeling which dictates his policy towards England; for his conduct in both respects must originate in one idea of what is wise as well as just. Free trade is inconsistent with slavish institutions; and the adoption of the one is but a forerunner of the dissipation of the other, in obedience to a harmonious law which is founded upon truth and justice. As we have indicated, we are confidently persuaded that the abolition of passports is part of a great scheme of liberality which all things tend to show is at work in the mind of the Emperor. But, be that as it may, this at least is certain—that his recent decree is a personal compliment to the British nation, and, in its fullest sense and meaning, will be so accepted by this country.

While the Cabinet was in council upon the subject of the important news from China, and was probably discussing the best mode in which Lord Elgin could be maintained in the difficult position in which he had been placed by the cowardly folly of Sir Hope Grant, the news of the capture of Pekin had exposed to an enemy, news arrived, by way of St. Petersburg, that the problem had received an extraordinary solution. The telegram announced that peace had been made, that the ratifications had been exchanged, and the Emperor Kien-Fung (whose flight was euphemistically described as a hunting expedition) would return to Pekin, and that the Anglo-French forces would evacuate the city. For reasons, the weight of which is not very evident, the French have seen fit to discredit this news, and the London organ of the Tuileries endeavours to prove that it is unfounded; but it is accepted by our own Government, and will be acted upon. We may therefore assume that Christmas holidays as at peace with the only enemy we had. We must await details; but, from the energetic conduct which Lord Elgin has displayed since he was roused to indignation by the treachery of the Tartars, we may be allowed to believe that he and Baron Gros have made terms which will be satisfactory to all moderate persons. An enormous demand will, of course, have been made upon China for reimbursement of the expenses of a war forced upon us by the violation of a treaty. What atonement can be made for the treacherous murder of all the Englishmen, the murder of two, and the probable murder of two more (St. Petersburg has no information upon this point), it is hard to say; but, inasmuch as by Mr. Parkes's evidence it is clear that the Tartar General, San-ko-lin-sin, was not only aware of the outrages, but was instigated to them by his presence, it would not be too much to demand that the fate of Haman should be his, in token that, though England has no hatred for a brave enemy, a cowardly torturer can expect no mercy at her hands. A severe example will place the lives of many thousands of English subjects within the power of the Chinese, it is most necessary that they should be taught that we never permit innocent blood to be shed unavenged. We are glad to perceive that something like justice was done by the country as regards the spoil taken. The French plundered right and left, in accord with the Napoleonic theory that "war should maintain war;" but, although we have no desire to see that maxim adopted as a rule by England, it would be both impolitic and atrocious to deprive the soldiers of their lives and of their country some increase of gain when a grand or important deed has been done. The events recorded in Lord Elgin's latest despatches confirm the view of those who, from knowledge of the Chinese character, believed that the best, the only means thing to be done, when we are forced into conflict in the East, is to show that we are, and will be, masters. The rest is then easy, but concession is ruin.

President Buchanan's Message has been transmitted, and it will be read with unusual interest. As matter of mere composition it is inferior to the carefully-written State papers which have preceded it from the White House. But its importance lies in the difficulty of the situation of the United States in consequence of the subjection of the anti-slavery President, Mr. Lincoln. It was not for Mr. Buchanan to cast oil on flame, and he must not, we submit, be too severely judged if it be thought that the address is of an ambidextrous character. He begins by condemning the agitation of the North, which for years has given the negroes a vague idea of liberty, and has thereby caused a sense of insecurity around the "domestic altar" in the South. But he does not think that Mr. Lincoln ought to be punished for the encouragement he has given, which, relative is never very powerful, and in the present case is rendered still less so by hostile majorities in both branches of the Legislature and adverse opinions in the highest legal tribunal. On the other hand, he denies the right of any State to secede, of its own will, from the Union, though he seems to encourage the idea that, if such secession took place, the Union could properly do what the United Kingdom would assuredly do if Ireland declared itself independent—namely, send over an armed force to the seceding portion of the Confederation. Some platitudes about the right of every citizen, in certain cases, to resort to arms as a protection against tyranny, have probably been thrown in as bonbons for Southern orators; and, in short, the whole Message appears to be a mixture of legal and literary production, it seems to us, after careful perusal, to be a judicious document, intended to keep both sides quiet until agitation shall have calmed down. Let us add that there is a graceful reference to the visit of the Prince of Wales, an event which Mr. Buchanan must have calculated to increase the good feeling between the Republic and our country.

Proclamation is made for the assembling of Parliament for business on the 5th of February—about the usual date. Whether a Reform Bill is to be one of the measures to be presented is much doubt. Mr. Gilpin, who holds a subordinate office in the Ministry, has intimated his belief that there will be such a bill produced, though he is very emphatic in assuring the public that his colleagues have sold him nothing, and that he speaks only as a member of Parliament. On the other hand, a usually well-informed Conservative organ states itself to be in possession of the fact, learned from the enemy's camp, that there is to be no Reform Bill, and that measures of law amendment will be the principal work of the Session. A violent speech by Mr. White, the member for Brighton, will probably displease even the most advanced Liberals. He made, at Plymouth, a fierce attack upon the Court, which he described as hostile to reform; and, though he indulged in some self-saving clause in reference to the most illustrious person in the realm, he, with singularly bad taste, assailed the Prince Consort, and declared that to approach the Court it is but necessary to crawl upon the ground. Language like this is as coarse as the statement is untrue. Lord Stanley has attended a meeting upon the subject of capital punishment, and has signified his dissent from the views of those who would abolish it. We are not aware that any other creature of importance has interrupted the universal felicitations of the great holiday by imparting his political sentiments.

Probably Lord Palmerston's selection of a new Bishop will give satisfaction to a larger number of persons than any of the late appointments which with the Earl of Shaftesbury is credited. The Bishop of Worcester is Dr. Philpott, who has held University office with much satisfaction to those over whom he has borne sway, who is a distinguished scholar, and whose views are understood to be those of the Broad Church—that is to say, are moderate and practical.

Gaeta has not yet surrendered, and the ex-King continues his rebellion against the Government of Italy. The advice of the Powers that he should abandon a useless defence appears to have been received with the same contempt which rewarded their interference when his throne might have been saved, and we presume that all future arguments must be addressed to him through the eloquent mouths of battering cannon. The world have been pleased to record Lamoricière as he had ceased, and that the Italians had been permitted to solemnise Christmas as the first religious festival of an entirely freed nation. It may yet happen.

THE MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.

BY THE QUEEN—A PROCLAMATION.

VICTORIA R.—Whereas our Parliament stands prorogued to Thursday, the 3rd day of January next: We, with the advice of our Privy Council, do hereby publish and declare that the said Parliament shall be further prorogued, on the 3rd day of January, next, to Tuesday, the 5th day of February, then next following, and the Chancellor of that part of our United Kingdom called Great Britain to prepare a Commission for proroguing the same accordingly. And we do hereby further, with the advice aforesaid, declare our Royal will and pleasure that the said Parliament shall, on the said Tuesday, the 5th day of February next, assemble and be holden for the dispatch of divers urgent and important affairs: and the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the knights, citizens, and burgesses, and the Commissioners for shires and boroughs of the House of Commons, are hereby required to give attendance upon their attendance accordingly, at Westminster, on the said Tuesday, the 5th day of February next; and all persons that are to treat with us, the Queen, in the face of our Lord, 1860, and in the 24th year of our reign.—GOD SAVE THE QUEEN.

THE COURT.

The Queen has had a busy week of official duty, preparatory to the gaieties of the Christmas holidays. On Monday her Majesty performed the gratifying duty of presenting the Duke of Cambridge with the Order of the Garter, which his Grace has so well earned by his distinguished services in the Crimea, and which he has so well sustained by the British North American gentlemanly and graceful manner in which he has represented the Queen in those provinces. An investiture of the Order of the Bath took place on Tuesday, as well as a Privy Council, during the week. A Proclamation was issued, summoning the Parliament to meet for the dispatch of business on the 5th of February.

On Saturday last the Queen rode out on horseback, accompanied by Prince Alfred. The Prince Consort, with Prince Louis of Hesse and Prince Leiningen, also took equestrian exercise. The Queen arrived from Osborne Cottage on Thursday and joined the Royal dinner party.

On Sunday the Queen and Prince Consort, with the Prince of Wales, Princess Alice, Prince Alfred, Prince Arthur, Princess Helena, Princess Louise and Prince Leopold of Hesse, the Royal household, the Court, and the domestic household, attended Divine service in the private chapel. The Rev. Arthur Penrhyn Stanley preached the sermon.

On Monday the Prince Consort, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, Prince Louis of Hesse, and the Prince of Leiningen, rode out on horseback in the morning, after the investiture of the Order of the Garter, the Queen and Princess Alice having driven out in the carriage. The Queen and Prince Consort had the honour of being invited. The dinner was served in the centre of the table with the plates and other portions of the table were displayed a selection of the most beautiful and magnificent specimens of art and ornament of which, in gold plate and in china, the Royal Scandalarium at St. George occupying the centre. The invitations included, among others, the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, Prince Arthur, the Speaker, Lord of Hosse, the Princess of Leiningen, the Prince of Leiningen, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Duke of Cambridge, Earl Granville, Earl Clarendon, Lord Shrewsbury, the Duke of Newcastle, the Marquis of Exeter, Marquis Camden, the Marquis of Normanby, the Earl of Carlisle, Lord Ashburton, Lord Wrottesley, Lord Panmure, the Earl of Clarendon, Viscount Palmerston, the Earl of St. Germans, Viscount Sydney, the Marquis of Aberdeen, Earl Spencer, Lord Wodehouse, Lord Lyttelton, the Bishop of Oxford, Sir Augustus Clifford, Sir Charles Young, Lord Foley, the Duke of Argyll, and the Marchioness of Normanby.

On Tuesday the Queen and Prince Consort, accompanied by Princess Alice and Prince Alfred, rode Park Phaetons in the morning, and visited the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary.

On Wednesday the Queen and Prince Consort, accompanied by Princess Alice, Prince Alfred, Princess Louise, and Prince Louis of Hesse, left Windsor by a special train on the South-Western Railway, and proceeded to Farnborough, where they were met by Mr. Emly Cubitt, the Hon. Horatio Stopford, Major-General the Hon. C. Grey, Major-General Seymour, Major Du Plat, Major Teesdale, &c.

The Countess of Gainsborough has succeeded the Duchess of Athol as Lady of the Bedchamber to her Majesty. The Baroness has succeeded Lord Charles Fitzroy as Equerry in Waiting to the Queen.

ORDER OF THE GARTER.

The Queen on Monday held a Chapter of the Most Noble Order of the Garter. The following Knights Companions attended:—The Prince Consort, the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Newcastle, the Earl of Exeter, Marquis Camden, the Earl of Clarendon, the Marquis of Normanby, the Earl of Carlisle, Viscount Palmerston, Lord Ashburton, the Dean of Westminster, the Duke of Devonshire, and the Earl of Harrowby. The Duke of Newcastle was introduced a Knight, was invested by her Majesty with the Garter in the usual manner.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and Prince Alfred arrived at Cambridge Cottage from Windsor Castle on Sunday last to luncheon with the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and Princess Mary.

His Excellency the Prussian Minister and Countess Bernstorff have received Lord Russell House from visiting Mr. and Lady Elizabeth Drummond, at Cadlands, Hants.

The Countess of Fife and family have arrived in town from Scotland. Lady Agnes Duff has also returned to Eaton Square from a home to Witton-crescent for a few months.

Viscount Ashbrook arrived in London on Tuesday from Windsor Castle. The noble Lord and her Ladyship afterwards left town for Brocklands.

The preliminary reports of Sir Leopold M'Clintock and Captain Allen Young on the North Atlantic Telegraph Survey are published. The former says the explorations afford much encouragement for the national undertaking. Captain Young says the survey is favourable to the practicability of the undertaking. There need be no apprehension as to laying the cable, for there will always be opportunities of laying it in clear and open seas as the ice disperses; and, once laid, no drift-ice can injure it if the shore ends be perfectly secured. Dr. Rae reports that the land line is practicable, and that the shore ends can be submerged without difficulty. The Danish delegates confirm these opinions.

The authorities in Croatia have issued a political programme, covered with thousands of signatures, demanding a representation in connection with Hungary as the Diet of Zsath.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

A short time since a gentleman residing at Putney, in which is was asserted that about five o'clock in the evening a gentleman, in passing under one of the railway arches at Putney, fell down in a fit, and a lady of the neighbourhood very generously gave away after a severe struggle. The matter has been investigated by the police authorities, and Lord Mayor stated last Saturday that the result of the inquiries went to show "that the gentleman in question had been drinking, and was walking in a state of intoxication, and that in the rush of people through the arch to save the minutes at the Post Office he was unintentionally jostled."

A distribution of prizes recently put up and won by members of the West Middlesex corps took place on Saturday evening, at the Greyhound Assembly-rooms, Hammersmith, the Commandant, Lieutenant-Colonel Cubitt, in the chair. The prizes were presented by Mrs. Cubitt, and consisted of a number of the brilliant accomplice of Indian and gentlemen in the neighbourhood, who had kindly contributed to the encouragement of the regiment. The chair was occupied by Lieut.-Colonel Radstock, who was attended by the officers by a numerous body of influential friends of the volunteer movement.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 1052 boys and 991 girls were registered in London, making together 2043. In the corresponding weeks of the years 1850-9 the average number was 1626.—The deaths were 1203 males and 1200 females, making together 2403, which is that for the last week of November. In three successive weeks the deaths were 2403, 2403, and 2403. In the last week the deaths were 2 less, as derived from returns of weeks corresponding with that week in the years 1850-9, the average number was 1405.—Registrar-General. In the present return is therefore less than the result obtained by calculation by 152.

The Court of Queen's Bench, sitting in Banco, on Wednesday, at the Middlesex Sessions, opened on Monday, at Westminster, sixty-six stood in the dock, charged with various offences. Amongst the prisoners were Samuel William Giles, aged seventeen, lately in the service of Mr. Henderson, bookseller, Leicester-square, charged with stealing a box containing 63 carriage, 2 diamond crosses, 491 gold rings, 204 brooches, 36 bracelets, 50 lockets, 12 watches, 1700 sets studs and sleeve links, and a large quantity of other articles. The prisoner was sentenced to two years' hard labour. One of the prisoners was a woman named Mary Ann Hall, who had a family of six children. Your guardians—Sidney Mann, William Smith, James Hall, and Mary Ann Hall, were charged with stealing 1 lb. of tea, the property of Messrs. Kingsbridge, grocers, Kentish-town. The prisoners were sentenced to be imprisoned for one month hard labour each, and Mann eighteen months. A Fellon named Joseph Williams, aged 21, was charged with stealing a quantity of haberdashery and other articles, the property of Mr. Hall, a draper, in the Kingsland-road. Guilty. Sentenced to seven years' penal servitude, and Moss Lyons to six years' penal servitude. Guilty. Sentenced to seven years' penal servitude. In the Second Court, William Price, a third-prisoner, was sentenced to six years' penal servitude for stealing a quantity of lead.

The December session of the Central Criminal Court were opened this day by Lord Chief Justice Campbell. The calendar contains the names of 58 persons for trial, but the principal of the offences were of a trivial nature. Robert Henry Bowyer, a middle-aged man, was charged with having brought a false and forged bill of exchange to the Bank of England. He was found guilty, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment. A young married woman, named Jane Hannah Lewis, was charged with having feloniously received property sold in the face or her husband with intent to injure him. She was found guilty, and sentenced to be imprisoned for one month. Her husband was ordered to be bound to between the parties. In the New Court, George Catt was found guilty of having obtained money by false pretences. He was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour. Thomas Hall, a boy, and a man named George Huntington, who pleaded guilty last session to feloniously making counterfeit coin, were brought up for judgment. The former was sentenced to three years' penal servitude, and the latter to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour. Mr. Ballantine, who prosecuted, stated that the prisoners had been in custody since the session, and he had communicated with the leather trade, frauds being postponed to the January session.

In the Bankruptcy Court on Tuesday a further adjournment for a month was granted in the case of Mr. Thomas Bowlby, of Cornhill, and of Gresham House, whose liabilities are £50,000, and assets uncertain. Thomas Bowlby, examined, stated that he passed his final examination.—On Wednesday the proceedings in the great case of Lawrence, Mortimore, and Schroder, the banker forgers of Lombard-street and Lincoln's-inn-fields.

At the Westminster Police Court on Tuesday John Chapman was examined relative to the charges preferred against him by Mr. Lumley and Miss Wagner, fraudulently pretending to sell an annuscan and next presentation to a living Professor was given by the Rev. Mr. Dowden, Vicar of Spreyton, whose living it was that the prisoner had professed to have in his disposal, showing some transactions between himself and Chapman, when the latter was known as Captain Howard. Ultimately, the magistrate expressed his opinion that the prosecution could not be carried any further, and the prisoner was accordingly discharged.

A commercial traveller named Ayling recovered £1000 damages against the South-Eastern Railway Company by action in the Court of Common Pleas yesterday week. He had been injured in a collision on the Margate branch, and during the trial it was suggested and agreed to that the company's medical men should examine him. They found that he had been seriously injured, and the result was a verdict for the sum claimed.

THE WESTMINSTER PLAY.—The second performance of the "Trinummus" took place on Tuesday evening at Westminster School, with a still greater degree of success than that which attended the first representation—a success perfectly well deserved by a production so conceived by an epilogue, both of which were received with the greatest applause. The performance was well attended, the venerable dormitory being crowded with a distinguished audience, including among other notabilities the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Principal of King's, the Provost of Eton, Archdeacon Lane Fox, Colonel Sir Alfred Horsford, K.C.B., Dr. Phillimore, Dr. Page, Sir William Jones, Bart., Henry Chester, Esq. The performance was repeated on Thursday.

THE 1ST HON. ARTILLERY COMPANY.—The officers and members of this ancient company, of which his Royal Highness the Prince Consort is Captain General and Colonel, assembled on Monday night in the spacious and fifteen anniversary of the revival of the regiment by King James I., by a procession up Bishopsgate-street, through St. James's-square, and back, and arranged for 450, six tables stretching at right angles from the top table the entire length of the room. The chair was occupied by Major-General Dunne, supported by Major-General Lord Rokeby, K.C.B.; Major-General Sir Richard Dacres, K.C.B.; Colonel Lord Templetown; Colonel Sir Alfred Horsford, K.C.B.; Colonel Sir Edward the Hon. C. H. Lindsay, and others. The company were all in military uniforms.

SOCIETY FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE FINE ARTS.—The lecture course at this society commenced in attractive form on Thursday evening. Mr. Albert Gilbert delivered an interesting lecture "On Carl Maria von Weber, and his Opera 'Der Freischütz,'" with vocal illustrations. The lecturer first described the works of the great composer in his various styles, and afterwards gave a sketch of those which had been written by some his successors; the whole being wound up with a brief sketch of personal biography. Among the vocal illustrations were the overture to the opera, played by the eight-part choir of the Arion Club, accompanied on the harmonium, which Mr. A. Gilbert directly conducted. The "Huntsmen's Chorus," from the opera, by Mdme. Gilbert; a song from "Euryanthe," by Miss Graham; and the whole concluded with the "Bridesmaids' Chorus." The next lecture announced is one which occupied a little more than two hours, afforded complete satisfaction, but was wisely published.

MILTON SOCIETY FOR IMPROVING THE SOCIAL POSITION OF THE BLIND.—A meeting was held on Monday last at the Horns Assembly-rooms, Kennington-lane, to celebrate the completion of its first year of truly Christian existence—William Hampton, Esq., M.P., filled the chair, and, in a humorous clerical and lay quakers, duly advocated the claims of this society to a more extended support. The secretary, Mr. Gardiner, read the 84th Psalm, and in the age of Prescott, it need scarcely be said that many of the blind could do much to benefit themselves and others. The Milton Society, with its small annual powers were not permitted to exercise their benefit influence. Nor is it merely sufficient, as in the case of the deaf and dumb, to impart instruction; they require sympathy, and also mental instruction carefully adapted to their individual capacities and wants. The religious and secular educational machinery undertaking for the blind by this society, dedicated to our immortal Milton, as well entitled to the sympathy and support of the British public. The society is first established on the Sunday side of the Thames, by a blind gentleman, and Alexander Mackay, the blind author of "The Elements of Geography," and principle to meet the many and peculiar wants of the blind, irrespective of sect or party, and on the widest possible." It is stated that the receipts are quite inadequate to carry out this truly philanthropic missionary work.

Mr. Bright, a few days ago, three brothers, all of them boy in the same year, presented themselves to the authorities to be inscribed as members of the Middle Temple. The eldest of the three is twenty-one, and was then eleven months after them. The young men are sons of a tetter-carrier, who has six children.

The Persian army, according to intelligence received from Tehran, dated November 1, has been nearly annihilated by an overwhelming Russian force. It is reported that the Persians, relying on their late great victory over the Turcomans, and supposing they were incapable of further resistance, have attempted to march on Herat, but have suffered severely in the experiment.

A letter from Melbourne by the last mail mentions that a cake of gold worth £9000, the produce of the crushing of only ten tons of quartz at the Ballarat Gold Mining Company recently arrived in Melbourne—but less sold to the Bank of New South Wales. This bank has also purchased a still larger quantity, and it is stated that the produce of thirty-five tons of quartz; and it is affirmed that the same reef will produce 1 oz. to the ton for many hundred yards.

UNITED STATES' FINANCE.—The public debt, which, on the 4th of June, 1857, amounted to 28,699,831 dollars, on the 1st of June, 1859, to 58,734,650, on the 30th of June, 1860, to 64,769,703, and there is no prospect of the Government being relieved without further borrowing. The late loan was sold at a traction over par. Since the sale the public opinion and other securities have declined 5 per cent, and that and any large sales would drop them further. The Customs revenue for the current year, ending 30th of June, is estimated at 49,000,000 dols., and 56,000,000 dols. next year at 60,000,000. But it is easy to see that these estimates may be much in excess by prolongation of the present or by addition of a war.

THE SHIP "COLONSAY," of Glasgow, which was on a return voyage to Australia, after having touched at Capetown, Port Phillip, and near the Falkland Islands at two o'clock in the morning of the 16th of August last, when in a gale of wind, struck on a reef of rocks, of the existence of which unknown, and at daylight saw land two miles ahead, which they reached. It proved to be Inverloch Bay, where they remained seven days, with the ship on shore, they could catch. When the weather grew calmer, the captain and a few of the crew which continued on board succeeded in getting off in the pinnace with a tender of fifty miles, met a sailing schooner, by means of which the remainder of the crew were taken off, and safely landed at Melbourne.

THE BRITISH AND THE FRENCH NAVY COMPARED.—A correspondence has recently taken place between Mr. Baxter, M.P., and Mr. James Peter, of Montrose, respecting a statement made by the former gentleman that the number of persons employed in our Royal Navy is greater than the entire mercantile marine of France, both counting and foreign. In his letter Mr. Baxter proves conclusively the truth of the assertion which he had made. He shows by figures taken from official documents that, while the number of men this year in our Royal Navy is 84,000 persons, the number of persons employed in the mercantile marine of France is only 80,000. He further shows that in the French Imperial Navy there are only 30,000 able-bodied men against 77,000 in the English Royal Navy, and in the French mercantile marine, only 80,000 persons against 240,000 in the English mercantile marine.

THE FRENCH ATTACK ON THE BRIDGE PA-LI-CHIAN, EIGHT MILES FROM PEKIN.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST IN CHINA.

BATTLE NEAR PEKIN.

Sir J. Hope Grant, in a despatch to the Secretary of State for War, writes as follows respecting the engagement of the 21st of September, near Pekin—two striking incidents of which, from Sketches by our Special Artist accompanying the allied forces, we have engraved:—

Head-quarters, Camp near Tang-Chow, Sept. 22.

Sir,—I have the honour to report that after the action of the 18th instant I remained in Chang-Tsia-Wan for two days, during which time the 1500 French troops left at Hossiwroo joined us, and some convoys arrived in camp, together with intelligence of a flotilla of junks coming up the Peiho with further supplies. From reconnaissances on the 19th and 20th we had ascertained that the Chinese army was encamped in very large numbers about four miles off, on the road between Tang-Chow and Pekin, and on both sides of the canal which runs from the Peiho to the latter city.

At daybreak on the 21st I marched from Chang-Tsia-Wan, and, parking the baggages in a village two miles in front, was there joined by the French, who advanced on the right. Soon after passing Tang-Chow the French troops got under fire of the Chinese works thrown up to protect a fine bridge crossing the canal, and on the Imperial high road to Pekin. At this point the enemy's infantry appeared in considerable force. On the left the Tartar cavalry showed in large masses, and advanced rapidly until within 200 yards of our guns, which, hastily unlimbering, drove them off with a fire of canister, assisted by skirmishers thrown forward from the 2nd (Queen's). The cavalry brigade, which I had kept échelonned away on the left to guard that flank, was now moving up, and the enemy's cavalry, driven away from the right by our fire, lying in large masses on our left front, affording an excellent opportunity for our cavalry to charge, which they promptly seized, the King's Dragoon Guards, under Lieut.-Colonel Sayers, in particular inflicting a very heavy loss on the enemy. On their left, Fane's Horse charged a similar body with great gallantry, while the 1st Sikh Cavalry, under Major Probyn, supporting Fane's Horse, effectually turned the right of the Chinese army.

The enemy, though defeated on the spot, yet still remained in front, in clouds of horsemen, who, though constantly retiring from the advance of any party of our cavalry, however small, never allowed more than 1000 yards to intervene between us, and showed a steady and threatening front. At this time I had with me the cavalry, the 4th Infantry Brigade, and three Armstrong guns; the rest of the artillery, with the 2nd brigade, having been left in the centre, with directions to feel the French left. With the three Armstrong guns, under Captain Rowley, we first occasional single shots on their thickest masses. These shots, fired singly, at slow intervals, served admirably to illustrate the good qualities of the Armstrong gun; not one failed to strike the thick masses of the enemy, at once dispersing them from the spot.

Thus advancing, the cavalry was brought to a check by the fire of a camp, which was taken by the 99th Regiment, under Major Dowbiggin, and which proved to be the head-quarters of some of the Imperial Princes. This, with several others in the neighbourhood, was burnt by our troops, and the Chinese army retired upon Pekin.

We then rejoined our right, which had kept in line with the French, who had carried the bridge, inflicting much loss on the enemy.

Forty-three guns were taken during the action, and the loss of the Chinese was very severe. On the right and left were their heaviest losses, but all along the centre small groups of dead showed the effect of the artillery fire, which had followed their movements till they finally retreated. Our loss is two killed and twenty-nine wounded—chiefly slightly.

I should wish most particularly to bring to notice the very excellent service of the King's Dragoon Guards. The country is extremely unfavourable for cavalry at present, partly from the number of ditches, and partly on account of the crops of maize and millet having been recently cut, leaving sharp-pointed stubble, injurious to horses, and rendering their rapid movement very difficult; their charge was, however, most effective, and they surmounted these obstacles in a creditable manner.

J. Hope Grant, Commander of the Forces.

LITERATURE AND ART.

THERE are among reading Englishmen but a very few, earnest and thoughtful, who have studied the works of Honoré de Balzac, and who thoroughly understand and appreciate that wonderful series of novels which, in their entirety, were called by Balzac "La Comédie Humaine." The lifelike pictures drawn by the author of the "Père Goriot" and "La Cousine Bette," the extraordinary tableaux of French life, character, passions, and manners, so vividly delineated in a long roll of fictions, have been imitated as to their general outline and plan by the great painter of the "Human Comedy" in England, Mr. William Makepeace Thackeray. Let us be under no mistake. Thackeray's people may be, and often bear the name of Balzac, but to their great majority he is only a remoter, if the "grandest second," to Balzac's supreme first. Even Miss Sukey, like George Sand, like the two Dumas — father and son. Very few, indeed, are those who have not read, with delight and amusing dissections of character in "La Comédie Humaine." So with Mr. Thackeray. The ignorant and unlettered, as are we behind the scenes, are fascinated by a series of lively sketches of society, but they pass by the astonishing dexterity and facility with which, and with one set of characters, the author of the book, in one novel after another, interest and excitement sufficient for the most insatiate appetite for the marvellous. The fact is, that our author, like Balzac and Eugène Sue, has a great French imagination, and Addison's works is but an act in the great Drama of Human Life, and which they have both witnessed, and in their own peculiar manner, have described. Thackeray has given capacity to interpret.

The Jouenny number of the Cornhill contains the opening portion of "The Adventures of Philip," a story, not dramatic personæ of so many of Mr. Thackeray's fictions over and over again. Thus, Mr. Dr. Pendennis, Mr. Dr. Goodenough, Mr. Dr. Firmin, Mr. Dr. Adhemar," the painter, Andrew Finch, and his wife, the ex-widow Carinichcrigan, are few. A shabby genteel story," published many years ago in Fraser; and the very father of Philip, a certain Dr. Firmin, figured in it more; and the very father of Philip, a certain Dr. Firmin, figured in it more; and the very father of Philip, a certain Dr. Firmin, figured in it *more

THE FARM.

Time increasing crush each year at Baker-street makes it more and more imperative on the Club to shift their quarters into a larger arena, for the sake both of the animals and the spectators, who, at certain hours of the day, get wedged into solid squares in the crowd. Every beast is said to have been sold to the butchers, with the exception of the Hereford heifer; and at the great cattle market the following Monday the 780 beasts placed fell short off those bespoken by nearly a thousand. Of the farmers, Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Cambridgeshire furnished 3200, and Devonshire about 800.

The system of sending animals to Baker-street which are to go home again, and perhaps become breeding cows, has reached its climax of absurdity at last. Victoria and Rose of Towerby both went back, and one, if not both, of them will be found to have had part of the beef-fed prizes in her class, and the cups for the best in the show, both at York and Darlington, with Soldier's Joy, a half-bred heifer, and a cup for the full preparation for the two year-old heifer class at the Leeds Royal. Captain Grey's Moss Rose was a cow of great merit, but she had calved, and she has been shown by her purchaser, Mr. Atherton, up and down the country as a breeding cow. It is a fair thing to go afterwards of fat shows and put a stop to this sort of work, as it is deeply unfair to the bona fide Christmas feeders. The Royal ought to take some notice of it as well, and not to allow cows to be sold which have shown as fat stock in the winter to come out as professed breeders in the summer, and thus, in some cases of long fell the delat of winning prizes, to which it is most probable they can never come by good their claim. Something of the kind will have to be done, and it will also eventually come to this, that the committee of fat shows will refuse to allow animals to be sold at all, and decide that the animal has been duly slaughtered within a certain time, and will never allow any animal to come to the same show twice. Fat shows were established to ensure a good supply of Christmas meat not to enable breeders to put animals to breeding animals and then "dairy" them again, that they may be fed for the butcher in summer and winter. Queen of the Isles was beaten again at Darlington by a beast of Mr. Cudlewick's, of Durham, and Messrs. Lord and Thomas Booth, of Killerby, brought out a splendid sow, and defeated the York winner, which had come on circuit from Bilton Park.

Lord Berefield's steward has very unduly remonstrated in the Mark Lane Express against the exclusion of her Ladyship's pen of pigs (which were awarded by the judges to be a highly meritorious lot of ground than one of the litter was older than the rest. Of course, evidence from such a quarter is good for nothing, and he cannot but Professor Symonds's teeth test not only by stating that there are no other pigs which possess the full number on the turf, but that high feeding at an early age has, to his knowledge, the effect of making them change teeth. Professor Symonds protested against the eligibility of the pen of pigs at Battersea, and the decision was overruled him. There is no doubt that the test has been most efficacious, but on this occasion it is equally certain that it has failed, and that the Shropshire sheep men are not satisfied with some of the Birmingham decisions, and more still of the very extraordinary way in which under twenty-two months, which got no prize, as 8 ft. 10 in., by 6 ft. 9 inches. The splendid Shropshire tup, for which Mr. Holland, M.P., paid about £50, at Canterbury, and twice over refused 200 gs., died about two months since.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

SEVERE weather has stopped many of the strings in their work, and those turtles who do not make "dog-hooks" are what is called rest. There is not a steeplechase fixture before New Year's Day, and Liverpool does not open her grand-stand gates until January 7. Newcastle (£700) is still in the markets, with four others of his Lordship's, and no one believes Marston (150 gs.), Rosicrucian (100 gs.), Lord Clifden, Napoleon, Arthur Wellesley, Commotion, Woolwich, Gamester, Comforter, Emperor (£500), Wildfire, Unlucky, Shilelah, and Tom Alderman, &c. The whole of Mr. Jacques's stud, headed by Weatherbit, is to be sold by private contract on the first week in next month, High Treason and four others in training, the yearling Who's Who, and two colt and six filly foals. Jack has gone lately not with purchasers of yearlings here and there, but with Mr. Merry's stud. Since Surplice, more than six good winners have changed hands this way, and more than cleared the whole cost of the establishment. Lifeboat, too, was within an ace of making a seventh. Nutbourne's retirement is announced, and Yellowplush's appearance in the Derby list stated that the Royal Stud, being unable to get Ethelbert, will fall back as much as they can on Orlando next year.

Bailey's Magazine of the current month contains an admirable engraving of the veteran Mr. Gully, who has been preceded since March by the Duke of Bedford and Baronet Lade, and will be followed by Mr. Sadler of Stetland, Derby, Glasgow, and Chesterfield, Admiral Rous, and Mr. Payne, who will complete with an appropriate portrait the features of the Sporting Magazine are a very clever mock examination-paper on sporting by "Uncle Scribble," and a continuation of the Life of a Sporting Hunting novel, of which the scene is laid at Market Harborough.

A better week's sport has been seldom known in Leicestershire. On Tuesday week Mr. Tailby's hounds met at Stapleford, and the Melton division were on the wrong side of the wood, and the Hon. Captain Morgan shot up full home in his place, and after a few efforts to catch them, and was glad to leave him in the best quarters he could find, and came to Melton as best he could. On Wednesday Lord Lonsdale was an excellent run from Coston Covert with the Duke's. Mr. Gilmour's Gratitude pulled the whole field, and he was the only one that had the hounds to himself; and but for a favourable turn, which let them up, would have had the day to himself. The Quorn had a capital day on Monday; run to Tuesley, Mr. Tailby's fox was killed in Ashby Lodge Wood.

Cousins and Attermire were both beaten in the Ridgway Challenge Cup, and Cazaubon in the Crocolne Picture, which was won by Parrish, a swimming son of Voltigeur. The Cup for Saddlers' Plate, rare little daughter of Jacobite, Trip-the-Daisy, whose running weighs 12 st. 10 lbs., was received for the Cup for Saddlers' Plate, which where Farmer's Daughter, from Myrtle, again helped to stamp Black Cloud as one of the most staring sires of the day. If the four pernals, David Harding stands for the Derby. Arnold (0) and Trelegos for Thursday, &c., and Pilling for Friday.

LIFE-BOAT SERVICES.—The brig Alice, of Middlesboro, laden with coals, when going out to sea in tow of a steamer, struck, during a heavy swell and veer from the westward, on the Long Sand, on which, after boards drifted on the North Caret Sand, on the morning of the 16th inst. The Ramsgate life-boat, belonging to the National Life-boat Institution, was put forthwith out out and launched opposite the vessel, and the brig's crew, seven in number, were taken off and landed at Margate, after having been thirteen hours in total wreck.—The schooner Ann and Ann, of Whitby, was wrecked on the Tarbet Scalp, north of Tarmouth, on the night of the 15th inst. The Scarborough life-boat of the National Life-boat Institution at Whitmer was launched, and, with eight men, successfully proceeded in search of them her perilous position. She was afterwards safely towed round to the Dowse.

The Thames Ironworks Company have received an order from the Russian Government for the construction of a screw gun-boat, not larger—say, 6220 tons, builders' measurement. Other vessels of the same class are to be built for Russia from the Clyde, and it is said that 100 boats with engines of 1200-horse power.

On the western border of New York State, at a place called Union Mills, some working men a year or two back observed a quantity of dark, oily matter floating on pools of water. They made a little chemical experiments led to the discovery that the oil is highly adaptable for illuminating purposes, and that by sinking wells to the depth of from 70 to 100 feet it can readily be obtained throughout a very extensive area. Indeed, it is said already to have been ascertained to be dispersed over 100 square miles. The proportion of oil in the liquid pumped up is about one-third, and the process of separation is very simple. Land in the locality has become exceedingly valuable, and the business is rapidly increasing. About 1200 to 1400 barrels are now daily produced, and the demand is, it is said, being rapidly met by the New York, where, when required, it sells for any quantity and price equal to its starting per gallon. When refined, it is very pale, which is described as being well for the manufacture of superior candles. Many shipments of the oil have been made to Australia. In addition to its illuminating capacity it is alleged likewise to be a thinker, when mixed with fish-oil, for the proper ness of lubrication.

THE SUPREME COURT OF MADRAS.

THE practice in the Supreme Court of Madras is similar to that which obtains in English courts of justice, with some modifications needed for the adaptation of the judge-and-jury system to the special requirements of the people of India. We give a few particulars respecting the way of summoning and swearing-in of jurors at Madras. One set of grand jurors consisting of European officers of service, merchants, and gentlemen of independent means Mohammedans and Hindoos. There are two sets of petty jurors, one for cases summoned by the Sheriff, who is appointed every year. The Judge, on the Bench, addresses the jurors, makes a few observations on the case, and delivers the calendar to the grand jurors, after they have been duly sworn. The oaths on the Bible, Mohammedans on the Koran, and Hindoos on some book of their religion, the performance of the last drops of water from the Ganges. A set of petty jurors, consisting of 12 Europeans, Mohammedans, and Hindoos (who are able to speak and understand English), is then impanelled, and take their seats in the jury-box. The evidence, as the trial proceeds, and the plaintiff's counsel opens the case, and calls his witnesses, who are duly sworn. The Judge, who is also the Chief Justice, calls by name the prisoner to the bar, and reads aloud the charge of indictment, asking him whether he is guilty or not guilty. If the prisoner should answer "Not guilty," he is allowed to challenge the jury, who are then sworn, and proceed to give their opinions and the case proceeds. The last session of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery in Madras for 1859 was held in October. None of the cases were of special interest. Our Engraving on page 585 shows the petty jurors in the Supreme Court Coconer at the bar, and Sir A. Pellerimer, Puisne Judge, on the bench.

CANADIAN WOODMEN.—When a portion of forest has been marked out for clearing, the trees are cut down close to the roots, and they find out a spot where water and other advantages are to be obtained. Here they build a log hut, and, if they intend to stay for any length of time, it would be called a "fort." It is without windows, and a good deal like an Esquimaux hut. The only outlet through the logs is a hole, and the smoke passes out through a hole in the roof. The sleeping-places of the men are all round the hut, and consist of a bed of spruce boughs, and the trunks of trees the men have cut down are piled up near them. In the winter these are burned, and they sit round the fire and tell stories when down the water. The axe-men are often of various nations, and, since they have been in Canada, the Irish have been the most numerous. The settlers and the police, it occurred to me that the shanties might often be the scene of disorders and quarrels, but I was told that they were generally places of peace and safety. No robbery or crime, I was assured, is ever heard of among them, and it is a rare thing for a murder or Lynch-law to occur. In fact, it would be safer than in the streets of New York. This, if true, is probably in some measure owing to the selected character of the men employed on the work, but also to the just and strict superintendence of the employers.—Knight's Travels in Canada.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK,

(From our City Correspondent.)

NOTWITHSTANDING that only a moderate business has been transacted in the market for the Government securities during the past week, owing to the arrival of news, vid St. Petersburg, to the effect that we have concluded peace with China, prices have ruled firm, and there is every reason to anticipate the confirmation through an official channel, and as much doubt has been entertained on the subject, a considerable rise will take place as soon as parties to operate largely. The Unfunded Debt has varied but little in price, and the Bonds in Chancery have been in fair demand.

The supply of capital in the general Discount Market is still large, and the demand for accommodation is moderate, at the nanexed rates for the commercial paper:—

	Per cent.		Per cent.
Short bills	... 3½ to 4½	Four months' bill	... 4½ to 5
Two months' bill	... 4 to 4½	Six months' bill	... 4½ to 5

The directors of the Bank of England have made no change in their minimum rate of discount, which remains at 8 per cent, since October last, and although the exchange at New York—102 to 103—still shows a steady tendency in favour of this country, the Bank has not purchased to any extent £200,000, and other large parcels are expected to follow. The packet for the Cape of Good Hope has taken £40,000, and £10,000 goes to Australia, £5,000 is gold for the Mauritius, and £6000 for Ceylon.

The Bank of Egypt, which has its London and London Shipping Company, the object of which is to establish a direct steam line of packets to Alexandria, and to carry on a general shipping business, with the Directors have, it appears, purchased several vessels for the line.

The demand for money in Lombard-street has been very moderate, and some portion of the recent imports from Australia has been sent into the Bank of England. The Bank's stock is now about £11,000,000 sterling of silver, received from the Bank of France in exchange for gold, have been coined into sovereigns, and are now returning to the Continent, where they are in demand.

The last instalment of 2½ per cent upon the last Russian loan contracted in London is due on the 31st inst.

It is pretty generally understood that the Stock Exchange will be closed on Christmas-day, as the Committee of Privileges have decided upon the abolishment of Monday.

The Bank has only a moderate business doing in the newly-formed undertakings; nevertheless prices have continued steady. Crescas Marine Insurance have realised 1 to 1½ prem.; Crystal Palace, 4 prem.; Equity, 1 to 1½ prem.; Universal Marine Insurance, 1 to 1½ prem.; London and Provincial Marine, 1 prem.; Agricultural Cattle Insurance, 1 prem.; Hotel Victoria, Egham, 4 to 5 prem.

The Corporation of Home Stocks on Monday was on the increase, when compared with the previous week; nevertheless, the transactions were by no means extensive. Consols for Money, 94¼ to 94½; Ditto for Account, 94½. The Reduced Three per Cents were 93 93¼; New Three per Cents, 93 93¼; India Stock, 220 to 222; Ditto Bonds, 97s to 99s; Ditto Five per Cents, 103 to 105; India Five per Cents, for Account, 104½; Exchequer Bills, 2s. to 5s. dis.; Ditto, small, 2s. to 5s. dis.; Consols for Account, 94¼; and Reduced Three per Cent. 93½. On Tuesday prices were fairly supported, but there was much caution displayed in the purchase of stock. Consols for Money, 94¼ to 94½; Ditto for Account, 94½; New Three per Cents, 93 93¼; Reduced Three per Cents, 93 93¼; New Three per Cents, 93 93 93¼; India Bonds, 5s. to 10s. dis.; Exchequer Bills, 2s. to 5s. dis.; Exchequer Bills, for Account, 2s. to 5s. dis. There was a marked absence of anything like excitement in the market on the following day (Wednesday), when Consols for Money were quoted 94¼ to 94½; Ditto for Account, 94½ to 93; Exchequer Bills, 5s., 2s. discount; in the value of Indian securities no change occurred.

The advices we had from the manufacturing districts are somewhat favourable, and although the demand for accommodation is rather limited, at the present time, the discounts, prices have had an upward tendency.

The Foreign Stock Market has been very dull during the week. The market, however, has continued firm, and prices generally have been well supported. The transactions have been:—Buenos Ayres, 6 per Cents, 89 90; Brazilian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 1839, 86½; Ditto, Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 1858, 86½; Ditto, Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 1859, 86½; Chilian, Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 85¼; Danish Five per Cents, 101½; Mexican Three per Cents, for Account, 20½; Ditto, Deferred, 20½; Peruvian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 84¼; Peruvian Three per Cents, 74½; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 93½; Ditto, Five per Cents, 1822, 103½; Ditto, Five per Cents, 1850, 103½; Ditto, Deferred, 92½; Spanish Three per Cents, 44¼; Ditto, Certificates, 6½; Turkish Six per Cents, 1858, 98; Ditto, Four per Cents, 1854, 86; Ditto, Four per Cents, 1855, 86; and Ditto, Four per Cents, 1858, 86.

Short-stock Bank shares have been in steady, but by no means active, demand, and the following quotations will probably have been realised 73¼; Bank of Egypt, 20½; Chartered of India, Australia, and China, 32½; Chartered Mercantile, 20½; Colonial Australian Land, 3½; London Chartered of Australia, 38½; Oriental, 47½; Ottoman, 10½; South Australia, 90½; Union of Australia, 96½; and Victoria Land, 3½.

Colonial Government Securities have ruled firm as follows:—New South Wales, 5 per Cents, 1871 to 1875, 101½ to 102; Victoria, 6 per Cents, 1871 Nova Scotia Sterling Debentures, 110; and Victoria Six per Cents, 108½.

In the Miscellaneous Market, Crystal Palace shares have been in active request, and prices have considerably improved; otherwise, the transactions have been only to a limited extent, at about previous rates. Australian Agricultural have been done at 2; Crystal Palace, 3½; Ditto Preference, 10; Reptile and Australian Copper, 3½; Great Ship, 1; London General Omnibus, 1½; Madras Irrigation and Canal, 5; Oriental Gas, 1; Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation, 2½; Phœnix Gas, 1; South Australian Land, 3½; Universal Marine, 1; and Victoria Land, 3½.

Railway shares have been done at 99; Great Central, 9½; Imperial Continental Gas, 1; Ditto, New, 2½; London, 98; Phœnix, 7½; Westminster Chartered, 7½; Ditto, New, 1½; Globe Insurance, 100, ex div.; Imperial Fire, 355; London Fire, 50; and Sunday Monday Trust, 1½.

A full average business has been passing in the Railway Share Market. Prices almost generally have advanced—in some instances fully 2 per cent—and the quantity of stock offered is moderate. The Stock Exchange Committee have resolved upon the abolition of the passport system for travelling in France, so far as regards British subjects, thus materially improving the value of the Sterling Eastern shares. The following are the leading quotations for the week:—Caledonian, 98; East Anglian, 1; Eastern Counties, 58; Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee, 82; Great Northern, 111; Ditto, A Stock, 106; Ditto, B Stock, 133; Great Western, 111; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 124; London and Brighton, 124; London, Chatham, and Dover, 54; London and North-Western, 109; London and South-Western, 96; Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, 44; Midland, 104; Ditto, Birmingham and Derby, 104; Norfolk, 85; North British, 67; North Eastern, Berwick, 91; Ditto, York, 91; Ditto, Leeds, 91; North London, 102; North Staffordshire, 15½; South-Eastern, 88; Ditto, Dover, 39; South Wales, 93; Vale of Neath, 96; and Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth, 96.

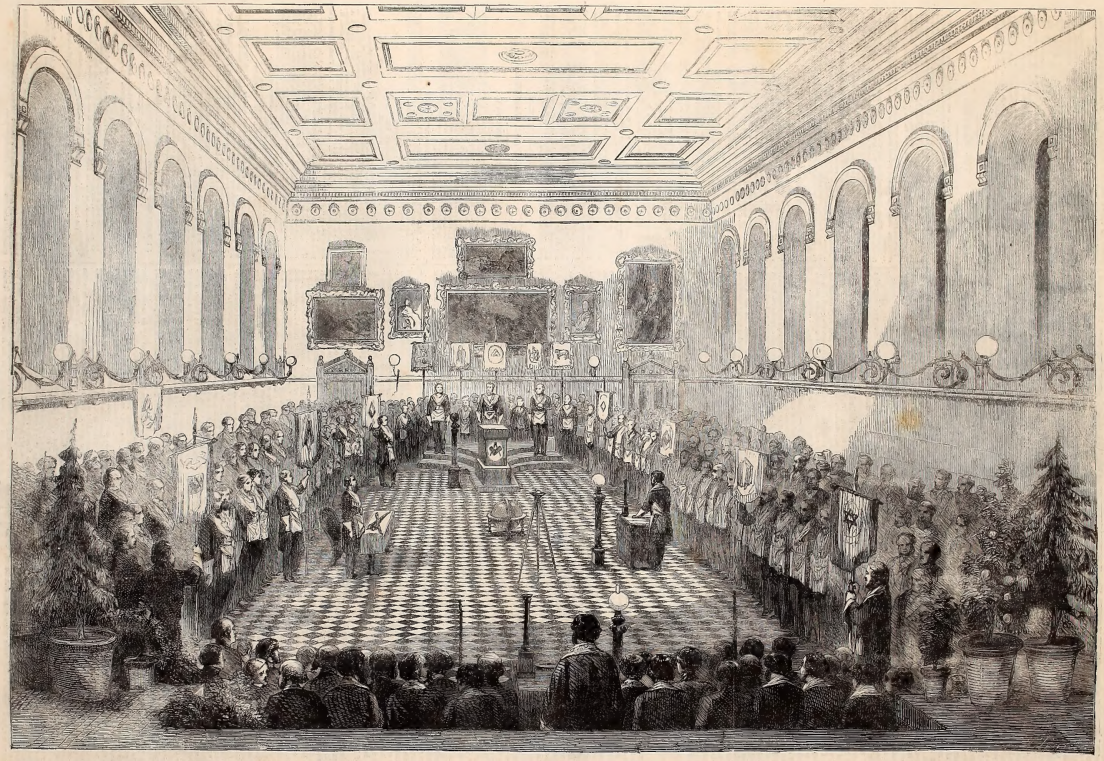
THE MARKETS.



CORN EXCHANGE, December 17.—Today's market was very moderately supplied with English wheat, chiefly in good condition. Rain set and white qualities meant of steadily. Foreign wheat—the show of which was large—was in good request, at 1s. to 2s. per quarter above the currency. Barley was in limited supply, and the turn dearer. Malt was in good request, at full prices. Beans and peas were in fair demand, at a steady tendency. Malt was quite to dose in last week, with a good enquiry generally. Oats were in good request, at full prices. Linseed cakes were in fair demand, at £7 10s. per ton. Rapeseed cakes were in good request, and 10s. per ton dearer. Cotton cakes were in moderate request, and 5s. per ton higher terms.

IMPORTS.—Five wheat, barley, and oats were in small quantity. Flour was in moderate quantities. Most other kinds of produce changed hands to a moderate extent, at about day's currencies.

AVERAGES.—Wheat, 57s. 4d.; barley, 34s. 8d.; oats, 24s. 8d.; rye, 36s. 8d.; beans, 36s. 8d.; and buckwheat, 24s. 8d. per quarter. Duty, 1s. per qr.; grinding barley, 10s. per ton; distilling ditto, 28s.; malting ditto, 28s.; malt, 36s. 8d.; flour, 2s. per sack; oats, 6s. per ton; Canada wheat, 1s. per qr.; other ditto, 5s. per ton; Canada barley, 10s. per ton; Canada oats, 6s. per ton; Canada beans, 10s. per ton; Canada peas, 10s. per ton; Canada maize, 1s. per qr.; Canada flour, 2s. per sack; Canada meal, 2s. per sack; Canada rye, 10s. per ton; Canada buckwheat, 10s. per ton; Canada linseed, 10s. per ton; Canada linseed cakes, 10s. per ton; town-made flour, 5s. per sack; town-made meal, 5s. per sack; Indian corn, 1s. per qr.; Indian meal, 2s. per sack; Indian flour, 2s. per sack; and Indian kidney beans, 10s. per ton.

SEEDS.—Our market generally is very inactive: nevertheless, we have no change to notice in prices since our last report.

LINSEED, English, crushing, 56s. to 58s.; Calcutta, 53s. to 55s.; baropeed, 46s. to 48s.; Mediterranean, 48s. to 50s.; Odessa, 46s. to 48s.; Egyptian, 46s. to 48s.; Bombay, 46s. to 48s.; Black Sea

MR. COMMISSIONER PARKES.

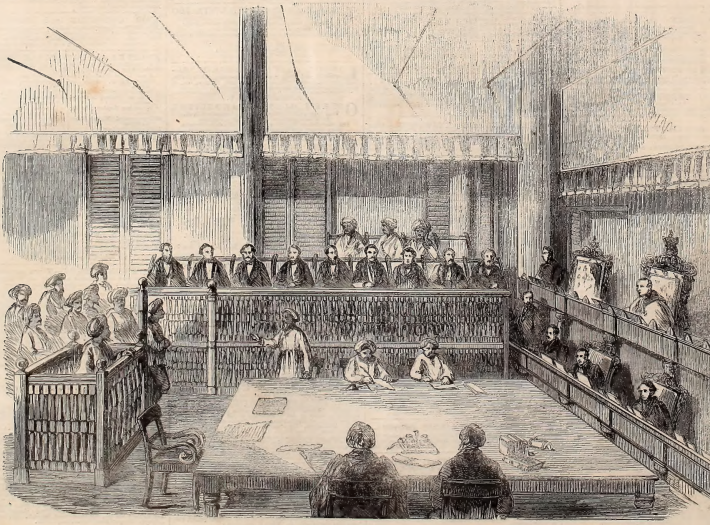
MR. HARRY PARKES, who has borne such a prominent part in the movements connected with British affairs in China since the affair of the lorcha Arrow in 1857, is the son of Mr. Joseph Parkes, formerly well known as professional agent for the Whig party, and who was some years ago appointed a Taxing Master to the Court of Chancery. Mr. Harry Parkes, owing to his knowledge of the Chinese language and character, as well as for his general ability, intelligence, and activity, has been attached to the suite of the British Plenipotentiary in China, and in that capacity has had his name brought very pointedly before the public, whether as an energetic Commissioniner or as a prisoner in the hands of the Chinese.

The following record of Mr. Parkes's services is from the Foreign Office List for July, 1860:—"Mr. Parkes was attached to Sir H. Pottinger's suite in June, 1842; acted as Interpreter at Koo-Chow-Foo, 1845 and 1846; acted as Interpreter at Shanghai, 1846, 1848; appointed Interpreter at Shanghai, April 19, 1848; appointed Interpreter at Amoy in 1849; sent to Formosa to distribute rewards to Chinese in 1851; served as Interpreter at Canton, November 21, 1851; appointed Consul at Amoy, August 10, 1854; accompanied Sir J. Bowring to Siam in March, 1855; arrived in England with Siamese Treaty, and returned with ratifications, January, 1856; was Acting-Consul at Canton from June, 1856, till September, 1858, and was transferred to Shanghai, December 21, 1858. Has been British Commissioner of the Allied Commission at Canton since January, 1858. Was appointed a C.B. December 6, 1859."

Mr. Parkes was born in the month of February, 1828, and was married, on the 1st of January, 1856, to Fanny Hannah, a daughter of the late Thomas Hall Plumer, Esq., and granddaughter of the late Sir Thomas Plumer, formerly Master of the Rolls.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE.

THE Right Hon. Henry Pelham Fiennes-Pelham-Clinton, Duke of Newcastle, Earl of Lincoln, was born May 22, 1811, and succeeded as sixth Duke, on the death of his father, on the 12th of January, 1851. He graduated B.A. at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1832, and in the same year was elected member for the Southern Division of Nottinghamshire, which he represented until February, 1846. In May, 1846, he was elected member for the Falkirk Burghs, which he represented until his accession to the Dukedom. In 1834-35, being then Earl of Lincoln, he was a Lord of the Treasury in Sir Robert Peel's short-lived Government. In 1841, on the accession of Sir Robert to office again, he was appointed Commissioner of Woods and Forests, which post he held until January, 1846, when he was appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland, an appointment he resigned in July, 1846, on the retirement of the Ministry to which he belonged. In 1852 he joined the Coalition Ministry, under Lord Aberdeen, as Secretary for the Colonies, with which at that time was nominally conjoined the Department for War. His administration of the colonies was such as to obtain for him no little credit and respect. At the breaking out of the Crimean War the Secretaryship for War was divided from that of the Colonies, and the Duke of Newcastle, having the option of the two offices, chose the Secretaryship for War. Unfortunately he had to encounter difficulties in the administration of a new and worse than unorganised department, and, although he applied himself to the duties of his office with a zeal, industry, and ability, which, be it said, very materially smoothed the way for his successor, owing to the objection taken by Lord John Russell to his continuing to discharge the functions of Minister for War, a dislocation of the Cabinet took place, which was not prevented by the resignation of the Duke. From that time until his return to office as Secretary for the Colonies under Lord Palmerston in 1859 the Duke took little part in public life; but, as is well known, he paid a visit to the Crimea in 1855 for the purpose of personally ascertaining the workings of the War Department. As Secretary for the Colonies he was selected to accompany the Prince of Wales in his recent visit to Canada and the United States, a duty which he performed with discretion and, on one occasion, with considerable firmness. His Grace has long been an advanced but judicious Liberal in politics, while as an official his assiduity and devotion to the labours of his department are unwearied. Besides his more important office his Grace holds the appointments of one of the Council of the Duchy of Lancaster, Lieut.-Colonel Commandant of the Sherwood Rangers Yeomanry Cavalry, and Lord Lieutenant of the county of Nottingham. The Duke has just been made a Knight of the Garter.



HARRY SMITH PARKES, ESQ., C.B., BRITISH COMMISSIONER OF THE ALLIED COMMISSION AT CANTON.
FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY NEGRETTI AND ZAMBRA.

The installation of the Duke of Newcastle, Provincial Grand Master of the Freemasons of Nottinghamshire, took place on the 7th inst., at the Mechanics' Hall, Nottingham, which was converted into a lodge-room. The occasion was one of no ordinary interest in a masonic point of view—the relation in which the Duke stands to the town of Nottingham—the respect in which he is held by all classes—his position as a Minister of the Crown—all these gave peculiar interest to the performance of the ceremony. The installation was attended by the Earl of Zetland, Grand Master of England; Sir Joseph Paxton, Grand Chaplain of the Order; Captain Boyer, Grand Master of Oxfordshire; and a great number of nobility and gentry were present, including representatives from the grand lodge, and numerous other distinguished members of the craft.

The brethren assembled at eleven o'clock, and at twelve the Provincial Grand Lodge of Nottinghamshire was opened for the transaction of business, the reception of the most worshipful the Grand Master, and the installation. On the lodge being closed and reopened in a lower degree, a levée was held for the presentation of mason visitors.

At three o'clock in the afternoon a banquet took place in the Corn Exchange, presided over by the Duke of Newcastle, supported by the Earl of Zetland, and a number of distinguished visitors from the most distant parts of the country.

In the evening there was a masonic ball in the Exchange Room, which was open to the general public, to commemorate the installation of the Duke.

TESTIMONIALS.

The great superiority of Alexandre's Harmoniums over all others is universally acknowledged by the instrumental profession, which has been given upon a trial side by side

From the FREDERICK GORE COUNSELLY, Esq., Professor of Music in the University of Oxford.

Sept. 1, 1860.

I have great pleasure in bearing testimony to the superior excellence of M. ALEXANDRE'S Harmoniums.

If I can be of any further service, I should certainly prefer them to the maker to all others.

FREDERICK GORE OUSELEY.

From Mr. GOSS, Organist of St. Paul's.

Sept. 1, 1860.

Morris, Chappell are authorised to state that Mr. Goss has never purchased any Harmonium but of ALEXANDRE'S manufacture.

ALEXANDRE DRAWING-ROOM HARMONIUM.

No. 2. Four stops, percussion action, additional blower, and in rosewood case ..... 55 gs.
No. 3. Sixteen stops, percussion action, additional blower, vox celeste, &c. (The best Harmonium that can be made) ..... 60 gs.

From Professor STERNDALE BENNETT, Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge.

50, Inverness-terrace, Kensington Gardens, W., April 24, 1860.

The Harmoniums by M. ALEXANDRE of Paris, which I exercise my best endeavours to import at the house of Messrs. Chappell and Co., exhibit the utmost perfection of mechanism and purity of tone.

Having had the opportunity, during the last twenty years, of trying nearly all the Harmoniums constructed by other makers, I have never failed to consider M. ALEXANDRE as the chief benefactor to the instrument, by the introduction of the percussion action, the swell, the vox humana, &c., and that his Harmoniums I have invariably called upon to select up to the moment they have been chosen from those manufactured by M. ALEXANDRE.

WILLIAM STERNDALE BENNETT.

From JAMES TURLE, Esq., Organist of Westminster Abbey.

Having carefully examined the Harmoniums now exercised manufactured by EVANS, DEBAIN, and ALEXANDRE, I feel no hesitation in giving the preference to those of the last named maker.

JAMES TURLE.

December 24, 1859.

From Herr ENGEL, Professor of the Harmonium at the Royal Academy of Music, London.

I have great pleasure in stating that, to my opinion, ALEX. ANDRE'S Harmoniums are superior to all others, whether made in England or on the Continent.

From Dr. RIMBAULT, Author of many celebrated Works on the Harmonium.

For excellence of tone, delicacy of touch, and powers of expression, the ALEXANDRE Harmoniums are unrivalled. EDWARD F. RIMBAULT, LL.D.

Christmas, 1860.

A happy Christmas-tide to ebery one!
Though from the festal board some guests are gone.
And yet not gone, for to each vacant place
There cometh one who hath an angel's face!
And there is left a store of life and lobe,
Links which unite us here to those above.

A happy Christmas-tide! And let the poor
Turn with a thankful heart from ebry door.
If in our hearts there's strife with kin or friend,
For Jesu's sake, let the contention end.
So, ere the year is hidden 'neath its pall,
Thank we the Lord, to be at peace with all.

TO CHRISTINA.

A CONFESSION.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SHADOW IN THE HOUSE."

Christmas Eve, Midnight.—NE person alone, besides my mother, knows what I am now going to tell you. If I could speak to you on such a theme I would not commit to paper the records of my shame. Burn these sheets when you have read them. I have been sufficiently punished; in pity to me, as we risk the danger of my future being again compromised by their existence.

Yesterday, the twenty-third day of December, I, Paul Hayden, was sitting at my desk in the counting-house of Klop, Klop, Son, and Klop, foreign merchants. There was a good deal to do during the evening, as we were accustomed on the day of Christmas Eve to break up early. Every footstep that crossed the counting-house or moved in the outer office seemed light and elastic, and had a kind of enjoyable frosty creak in its sound. There was a something in the pure air of the bright clear day, and the anticipations of the coming festival, which completely changed the aspect of even the dull and scarcely dull atmosphere of the counting-house, making glum old 'senior' clerks light and frolic, and 'junior' clerks staid and painstaking, as they saw that a little hard work now alone interposed between them and the coming holiday.

As for me, I sat there with my pen in my hand, and the ledger open before me, bowed down with a weight of shame and misery such as I had never dreamed of falling to my lot. There were my fellow-workmen moving about light-hearted and hopeful; there was I with ruin—almost certain ruin—staring me in the face. It was no use to try in a dream; but no: there lay the letter before me, and I took it up and read it once again :—

"Dear old Fellow,—Cudd won't renew the bill on any terms. What's to be done? If something is not thought of, and quickly too, you'll see him at Klop's to-morrow morning, sure as fate. I'm decently sorry for you, but I can't help you: no more can anybody else, for all that. Turn it over in your mind. I'll be on the bridge as you go home.

"Yours ever, "ARTHUR GLYNDE."

Turn it over! And what good would that do? How was a poor fellow like me to scrape together a hundred pounds? Yes, my dear friend, Arthur Glynde, who had so kindly introduced me to all the delights of London, initiated me in all its tempting mysteries, paid for me, quarrelled with me if I remonstrated with him, and finally—and laughed at me if I tried to withdraw from such a life of flowery degradation, this all-beautiful friend had suddenly come down upon me one month before with a request that (as my position made it quite irresistible) that I would accept for him a bill of a hundred pounds, and leave him to provide for it when due. I am sure he had meant to fulfil his promise. But then Arthur was a fool, and had grown in such deep respect as to trouble herself in the least about giving him the means of fulfilling his obligation; and so I was left in the, lurch.

What was I to do? The first sight of that bill would in Mr. Klop's eyes have been about the same thing as the last sight of me. And if I left him in disgrace there was an end to my connection, for Should I confide the whole to my mother,—which meant, should I let her know what a reckless-profligate life I had been leading since our arrival in London, and my meeting with Glynde? Should I spoil her the vista of my recent experience during the merest hours of night? Should I dash to the ground the hopes she was fondly nursing of my advancement?

Despairing of any solution, I determined to meet Glynde and tell him so.

I shut up the ledger, put it away in its place, and proceeded to exchange my office-coat for my walking one.

"Going, Mr. Hayden?" inquired our cashier, Mr. Sampson Boyce, who did not, I fancied, at all participate in the slight signs of satisfaction that Mr. Klop had occasionally shifted on to me.

"Yes, Sir; good night," I answered as I went out.

I hurried along the noisy streets, with their glaring Christmas-lighted shops, glitting like a spectre through the crowds, never slackening my pace till I reached the foot of the bridge, when a thought struck me, as with a blow of paralysis: I had left Glynde's letter in my office-coat! With moist and trembling hands I turned back at first, to keep steady, I searched my pockets over and over, then began to run back, but again stopped, incredulously, to make sure. It was too true; I had left it behind; might even have dropped it on the floor while changing coats. I hurried back to the office. The door to the counting-house was down a little court or archway. I tried it. It was locked. I rushed round to the front—the outer door was also nothing less than sheer impossibility should prevent my getting back my letter. I knew the way into the counting-house from Mr. Klop's house, and that if I could only escape notice from the servants, I could get then from the cashier, and Denning, the watchman, there would be no one else likely to see me. At the worst, I could ask permission to go through to the office. I was determined on something, and was open. I slipped through the passage, and was safely in the business premises. Through the glass door of Denning's little room I saw Mr. Boyce reading a newspaper; and then, he had done with the business of the office, and was probably just going. I heard Denning's footstep moving heavily to and fro in the storeroom above. I walked cautiously along the passage till I came to the counting-house. The door was open. I went in, glancing hurriedly about on the floor, but seeing nothing of my letter. The first touch of the pockets of my office-coat told me it was not there. I turned the pockets inside out. No, there was no letter in them. Had Boyce found it accidentally, or Mr. Klop, or had some one suspected me, and searched my coat when I went away? The suspense was intolerable. Suddenly I remembered that on one occasion I had slipped the letter between the pages of the ledger when Mr. Boyce had appeared at the door; but I felt almost certain that I had not left it there. I took down the ledger, however, and with a bounding heart saw the missing sheet drop to the ground. For a moment I felt rather as though my troubles were gone, than that their mere exposure was delayed, as I tore up the letter, and threw it and the pieces by the candle and lamp that was left burning low till the watchman came for his last survey. As I turned to find my way back I heard Denning coming down stairs. "Well," I thought, "if he comes in I will tell him I passed through the house, without meeting any one, to fetch something I had left behind; but if he passes on I will not unnecessarily make him aware of my presence." He did pass on, and I presently I heard him descending the stairs to the underground storeroom.

As I stood there listening, where I had lain no right to be, no wonder I felt like a criminal, and that strange and piteous helplessness should begin to pass through my mind. Dark, vague suggestions, the true nature of which I shrank from grappling with, began to stir me; and I felt as if my hair were lifted in horror. I gazed cautiously round. I believe I had at that moment no defined idea beyond the simple one of seeking security from the apprehension that some one might have seen me enter and hear the letter—say, some night-prowling thief, for example. Anxiously I gazed around. Behind, through the glass door of the counting-house, I could see all over and through the large office, with its shadowy-looking rows of desks and stools, under their dusky veiling of low, smouldering kind of light. Before me was Mr. Klop's private room. The door was left ajar. Was he there? No, all was silent! But I must search. I pushed the door open, and was struck hard by the flood of moonlight in which I was suddenly plunged. I advanced, half-believing that I was simply fascinated by the splendid natural and artificial scene beyond which was visible through broad windows. There was a piece of the great black city spread out, low and far, in the vivid, frosty moonlight; the glittering river carving amid blackened buildings; the arches of the bridges always looking from semicircles into circles by the junction of bridge and reflection below; and a sky of glassy blue, thickly crowded with stars, each apparently emulous to outshine its neighbour in the most brilliant manner, and lend increased splendour to earthly eye. That end of the room was light enough to see to read. I could discern the spots of ink upon the floor. I could see the brass-work of the fire-irons. I could see everything. Yes, all was there, nothing not to evade, my guilt. I could see, Christina, a something that made my heart throb with violence, even while I knew well enough there had been in it a feeling of vessel experience. Though I had been led there by friend or foe, for some purpose which I should not long mistake. My hand, as I looked, dropped on the neighbouring desk for support to my frame. Yes I did not turn away, as I ought to have done, either into the moonlight or the room I was in, but I felt, in the thought aimed for a moment, but had fled in horror from the temptation, to repent, and to be warned ever after of the danger of one moment of mental weakness. I was not to turn, I was to go in a kind of hideous fascination. It seemed to me not a simple key in that lock, but the curving finger of some demon that I was to obey. "Do you hear?" it said, "your instruments now," I thought I heard it saying to me. "Fool! you cannot escape, or, if you can, this is the only way. Show some courage, some presence of mind, and you have a chance. If it will be any comfort to you, we'll say this shall be the only time. Ay, swear it if you like! Am I not here to register your oath? We understand. Only be quick!"

Still I moved not—only helplessly gazed. My ears now became filled with other sounds and voices. I heard Mr. Klop dismissing me, amid the contemptuous laughter of certain surmises of his clerks. I felt that touch of scorn on my shoulder, and the low murmur in the ear implying that my very body was become the property of another. I heard the heartbroken cry of my mother as the double news of my imprisonment and dishonour reached her. And still the mysterious (diabolical's partial gleam) drew me towards it, and I heard its voice saying, "Come! It is the only way. Hasten! Save yourself!" "No! Fy! It is a sin!" cried another answering voice. And then it too murmured, like an echo, "Save yourself!"

But that last voice was so small, and so far off, and the previous one so loud and close to then that it was impossible to obey the way to touch, and promised so much of instant advantage from its mystery, that even as I gazed, incapable to determine what I would do, I had done all—determined, I should to that from which life will never again allow me to be disreserved.

Spare me, Christina, for an instant. I will go on again calmly soon, if you can bear to listen in me just longer.

Well, I resume :—The cold steel, as I touched it, sent a shiver through my frame, but I turned the key with a desperate hand, opened the door, and looked in. I could dimly see a drawer full of gold; my fist touch was of a batch of fleecy, rustling banker-all bank-notes. I took out two, and held one of them up to the light of the moon. I could just make out the word "Hundred," and was about to put it back, when I saw a figure in the doorway. Some one whispered me, "Fool! you will never prosper in this mode of life if you begin so badly. What good will that do you? Where can you manage it? Where is the risk of which you complain? Take them, and plunged my hand into the drawer where the gold was, trying to guess as well as I could how far such a handful would go towards a hundred cheques, and how many I could have let me without fear of casuistry with which I amused myself. Even then I could not, I thought, take one sovereign more than my indispensable need required. O, not for the sake of wealth! For my employer had taught me to recognise as it deserved such sublime self-abnegation! So I counted the gold, tremulously, yet determinedly, to the end of the hundred, carefully counted over every second note, to see that no unknown my danger, but also conscious that I was laying up one bit of comfortable hypocrisy for the future that might be found very necessary for my peace.

The gold was mine. My bill should be duly honoured. "Honoured!" O God, how my own word pierced me like an ill-carried weapon! False! These were stolen notes. I gripped my way out of the room and along the passage; saw Joyce, still over his accounts, in Denning's room; staggered out by the way I had entered; opened silently the door of the office, which had been closed since I had passed through; and then, unchallenged by any observer, slunk away by dark courts and by-passages to keep my appointment.

I reached the bridge. I leant against the wall. I tried to realise a single moment of joy at my success—the success for which I had bid so high a price. "I am saved!" I cried inwardly; "saved!" Just then I heard a sound that shook my very soul. It was but a church clock across the river, striking; but to me it was like a voice crying through the midnight, "Lost!" And immediately one clock after another took up the sound, until it seemed to me that angel voices—some thrillingly sweet, some mournful and beseeching, some solemn and denouncing—were crying to me from all parts of the universe, "Lost! lost! lost!" The river, the black city, faded from my view beneath that glorious sky. I saw an old village, every spot of which was familiar to me. I seemed to stand no longer on that bridge, but was kneeling in a well-known room, with my face raised to that sky in prayer. I thought and thanks, my lips moved. I had a delicious feeling of rest. Once more I was a little child going to lie down in my bed without a care. I heard a footstep; gradually as it approached nearer it recalled me to myself—myself! Good God! was that poor, miserable, shrinking being Paul Hayden? That—

Spare me yet, Christina, one weakness. Do not ask me to brand myself once more with the word; it has burnt in too deeply, and needs neither anodyne nor rest. Spare me my name and for ever the word. I know I cannot escape the thing.

What should I do? Again came that perilous question. How had I answered it before? The weight in my pockets, heavy enough to drag down a thousand souls, was my answer. I thought once I would leap into the river, and let that weight bear me down to a grave so deep that I might hope there to be insensible even to my shame. Then my clenched hands would rise convulsively and desperately in mortal agony against my breast, asking again, "What shall I do?"

Knowing myself, seeing myself upon the go back, yet shrinking more and more every moment from the thought of going forward, I suddenly—obeying some impulse I hardly understood, perhaps one of desire for physical exertion—began to run. Speedily I decided I caught a glimpse of Glynne approaching to meet me. I turned and ran in an opposite direction to that of his coming footsteps; it seemed to me as though I were flying not so much from him as from myself—from the new and hideous form I had taken—knowing not yet which would prove to be the true Paul Hayden.

What I stopped running I was in the court outside the office. How I came there I know not, unless drawn by the same power that I have heard often moves murderers to haunt the spot where they shed the blood of their victim, and where they are at length to find the ministers of retribution.

"Is it too late?" I asked, under my breath, sinking down on some steps in a dark corner opposite the office door. "Is it too late now to right myself? Yes! it is impossible—hopeless!" Thus I despairingly cried; but the hope grew and grew until it became a strong, yearning, passionate desire to try. Could I not, and could we only back again how light, every other trouble would be—how lightly I could go home and sleep! I rose from the steps filled with a wild, feverish resolution. "I will do it, so God help me!" I cried, and went round to the front door. It was locked. For a moment I stood there, without my hands in silent despair and went back to the court. I glanced eagerly at the three lower windows on that side. The one nearest the steps was open—wide open—left so, probably, for a few moments, by some servant, in order to sweeten the office after putting out the gas. But, if so, he was not far off. He would probably see me if I ventured. Well, I must risk that. My heart throbbed as I mounted I could reach it. It was soon done, my arm stretched across, the window-sill grasped, and I had pulled myself up and dropped lightly inside. I looked through the counting-house door. All was still. I could see, everything illumined as when I had left it; no one was there. I went in, opened the safe, and with trembling hand put back the hand gold, trying to let it mingle with the rest without care. For a few moments, by the weight my pockets to be sure that not one solitary pie ce was left behind by accident! It gave me a fresh alarm the mere thought. With a more grateful sense I went before the key turned in the lock, and I groped my way from the room and gained the window without hearing the slightest noise to disturb me. Once out in the cold night again, my only feeling was to get away as fast as I could. Then came blessed relief—my heart was brimful of intense thankfulness.

As I was walking rapidly across the bridge, some one slapped me on the shoulder. It was Glynde. I knew him by his stick by his voice just now, I suppose you had better go home, and I'll come and see you before breakfast. Only it's driving it desperately close."

"Look here, Glynde," I answered, and my voice trembled as it went you have paid for me since I have been in London?"

"Pooh! you don't know what you're talking about."

"I beg your pardon for it, but I suppose you answer me?"

"Well, I should rather fancy not. How on earth should I know?"

"Would that bill be about it?

"Humbug! What's the good of asking me? Yes, more."

"Very well, then. That I take into my own hands. From this day I owe you nothing. Good night!" I held out my hand. As he took it, I said :—

"Don't let's meet again, Glynne, not at present; I don't care if we never do."

He drew himself up, stared at me; took his cigar from his lips, laughed a low forced laugh, turned lightly on his heel, and walked away.

I went home; sorry to have so parted, but glad of the parting itself, and how I contrived to dress and get straightened I know not.

I sat down by the fireside with the miserable task before me of telling my mother about the bill, but I felt it was the only thing to save her as much pain as possible. She was more cheerful than I had seen her for some time, but her first words were most unwelcome to me in my present condition.

"Christina is coming to-day!" she said. She will perhaps be here to-morrow.'

This was indeed an unpleasant surprise to me—she who had known me as I once was—she coming to witness my disgrace. That decided me. I must tell my mother at once. In a few words I prepared for the worst, and then told her all—all, Christina.

When I had said what I had to say from beginning to end, my head dropped on her shoulder in a kind relief, inexplicable even to me. For some time we were both silent. At length she spoke :—

"Paul, you know what my property is—five hundred pounds I will pay your bill. But, O my boy, do not deceive me! Tell me the worst. Will Mr. Klop, when he has had this hundred pounds, forward you to—" She did not need to finish the sentence. I understood her but too well. After the revelation I had made she had no longer faith in me or in my word. I was only pursuing my course—how true I thought myself most safe. I rudely pushed her away, and hurried to my bed, at once stung by her doubts and terrified by the new alarm, she had suggested. I weighed it well, and almost superstitious dread possessed me that her words beckoned some further consequence yet undreamed of by me. "What if it should not be there!" I cried out in my anguish; "who would then believe me, if she does not?" I spent a terrible night. When I lay awake the darkness seemed full of beckoning, shining, fingers, in the shape of keys; when I slept I dreamed I was dropping from some enormous height, or flying across some interminable bridge. In the pale, wintry, dawn of morning I rose. I started to meet my own face in the glass. It spoke truly; I had grown years older during that night.

I would not trust myself to meet my mother at breakfast, and left the house without seeing her. By the time I had arrived at the office

I felt unable to look any one in the face. As I turned my back to hang up my coat, I said, as usual, "Good morning, gentlemen."

I uttered breathlessly. My hand paused with the uplifted coat. No, there was no answer; there was not a sound in the room but the scratching of pens. I looked round. This was folly. Every one was quietly engaged in work. My own voice must have died away before it left me. I had nothing but myself and my own fears to be afraid of.

I tried hard to work, but my ears involuntarily strove to catch every sound, every whisper. The sight of that safe, which I could see from where I sat, when the door was open, turned me sick. I could not help watching Boyce eagerly as he went to open it. What if I had displaced anything and he should notice it? He opened it. There was no immediate intimation, by his manner, that he saw anything wrong till he began counting, and then I fancied he must be puzzled, he was so long and silent. I wondered if he would say to me—what could it be—whether his accounts were right or wrong? There was clearly no trace of my visit left behind. Yet I could not rest. I started at the least sound, and when I saw Mr. Klop shining bald head and silver hair approaching my heart jumped violently.

"Now, Mr. Boyce," he said, sitting down at the great fire, "I'll just run through the cash balance with you, if you're ready."

"Certainly, sir, certainly," said Mr. Boyce; "I have just a little matter to finish with first; then I'll come to you." So saying, he left the office.

Mr. Klop sat rubbing his hands at the fire waiting for him. Some minutes passed without his return. Mr. Klop looked impatiently once towards the door. Still he came not. At length Mr. Klop rose, went to the outer office, and called,

"Mr. Boyce?"

"He has gone out, Sir," said one of the clerks.

"Gone out, sir?" cried Mr. Klop. "Why, what can have induced him to go out just as I told him I wanted him?"

He went back impatiently into his room.

Every circumstance, however slight, now oppressed me. What did Boyce's absence mean? Had he gone to fetch a constable before even letting Mr. Klop know he had cause for suspicion?

Now—by there was a something in the cashier's manner that I could not read in that way. There seemed almost a kind of new and sympathetic tie between us, which made me shudder, in that aspect and manner of him.

And then, trying to relapse into the thoughts of my safety, and of Christina, and of my mother—and of that dinner I was to eat by Mr. Klop's hearth in the evening—I felt found among my ore yet a kind of impasture. I was not what I seemed, and might for that reason be again tempted by those secret influences that seem to lie in wait for such prey. I had been all the morning weighing over a certain idea, alarming to dwell on, requiring more courage than I had, and I found dream of possessing, dismissed many times, yet always coming back—"Paul, Paul, do not eat that dinner; go not there while you remain thus. Take heart; you know what you ought to do. Go, exhale it certain there is time."

My knees knocked together, my lips seemed glued, my fingers like those of a dead man, as I slipped from my stool, strode to the mantelpiece, and drank off a whole glass of water before going up to Mr. Klop's door. I tapped, and, without waiting for an answer, walked straight into the room. I suppose I had to speak at first, and that he did not hear me, for he said impatiently—

"Speak louder, Paul. What is it?"

"I should like to speak to you, Sir, in private."

"Eh! Oh, certainly." He got up, came past me, and closed the door; then resumed himself. I began to speak, desirous naturally to make the best of so bad a job, but the more I endeavoured to speak I could only get out words enough to show the bare dry truth, without the slightest circumlocution or colouring.

"Sir, I had a letter last night telling me I should be arrested to-day for a debt of a hundred pounds. I left that letter here accidentally, and, fearing you or some one might find it, I returned. I saw your room open, your key in the safe: I robbed it of a hundred pounds."

I stopped, for my voice grew more and more hoarse and unsteady, and my heart was beating with frenzied violence.

"Well?" said Mr. Klop, eyeing me askance.

"I could not keep it, Sir. I climbed in at the lower passage-window opening into the court, and put it back. You will find it there. My life is a burden to me with this untold."

"Is this true, young man?—And the whole truth?"

"All! on my soul, Sir."

Mr. Klop rose, passed by me to the door, opened it, and called out, "Has Mr. Boyce returned?"

"Yes, Sir," answered one of the clerks.

Mr. Boyce now presented himself, bathed in perspiration, and breathless, while he vainly strove to conceal under the guise of his ordinarily quiet, almost sullen, behaviour.

"A customer, Sir, drew me out while talking. And I forgot to say there is a gentleman outside asking to see you on particular and pressing business. He is watching for some one to pass. He said he must go if you did not see him instantly."

"Let him go then, and to the Devil if he likes! Now, Mr. Boyce, just look to the cash, and see if it's all right. I left my key in the safe last night, and should like to be satisfied that nothing wrong has happened in consequence."

"Yes, Sir;"—and Mr. Boyce looked strangely irresolute as he came in, glancing uneasily behind him, yet warned by Mr. Klop's searching eye, which was becoming decidedly unpleasant.

Mr. Boyce went to the safe, opened it, and drew the iron door towards him—perhaps accidentally—but it would have had the effect of concealing the upper part of his body from us where we stood, only that Mr. Klop moved a little—and that, too, apparently quite accidentally —and then the door was almost ostentatiously thrown back.

A pause of a minute or two now ensued. Presently Mr. Boyce said, with a quivering voice, quite unlike his usual hard, unfeeling tone, "Why, why, Sir! Mr. Klop, some one has been here! There is I believe—nay, I am sure—a hundred pounds missing! Stay; I will count again." And he did so, not turning his face to look on us.

Our eyes met—Mr. Klop's and mine. It was an awful meeting. He doubted me—that was the expression I saw there. I answered him with a quiet but steady look, earnestly yet mutely appealing. He understood, I thought, and waited.

As for me, however calmly I was able to bear myself, I saw there was a frightful gulf yawning beneath my feet.

Very rapidly I ran over all the possibilities of this new calamity—retraced every foot of ground, and every minute of time, belonging to the sickening experience of the past night. I saw but one solution—too fantastic to be credible, yet the only one my agitated mind could guess at and rest upon. Was Boyce a rogue? Had he seen me either steal into Mr. Klop's room last night, or out of it when he was reading the paper in Deaning's room? Had he secretly gone after me to the safe, discovered the theft, and, instead of denouncing it, determined to profit by it, sure that the thief would be made answerable for all, and disbelieved even if discovered, and if he should deny that he had taken more than the one hundred pounds? If so, one thing was clear—he would sacrifice me to clear himself.

"Yes, Sir," he said, now turning round upon me a face whiter—so it seemed to me—than the whitest of sepulchral walls, "there is a hundred pounds missing!"

"And can you, Boyce, guess how?"

"Well, Sir, that is a serious question to answer. I fear I can. Last night, when every one was gone, I thought I saw a shadow pass the little window of Deaning's place. To my great horror I could get out. I looked into your room here, but saw nothing in particular to alarm me."

"Not the key in the safe?"

"No, Sir, I did not notice it."

"Indeed!" said the merchant, "and did you notice anything?"

"I did, Sir. I picked up this on the floor,"

He produced a crumpled playbill. As he opened it, I saw in large letters "Don Giovanni." I knew it. It indicated the latest of the many visits he had made. I had made together to the Opera.

"Do you know who could have dropped it?"

"I will answer that question, Sir," said I. "I have no doubt I did, if it was really found there."

"If it was? Would you dare, Sir, to suspect Mr. Sampson Boyce, the cashier of Klop, Son, and Klop, of an untruth? uttered, too, for the ruin of another? Young man, beware! This is no play," said Mr. Klop, with a strange gleam in his eye.

I trembled, yet looked up with a certain confidence. God help me, I felt almost innocent just then. Mr. Klop's eye passed from Boyce to me, from me to Boyce, before he again spoke.

"Well, Mr. Boyce, I and Paul have already had some talk: he knows all his under suspicion. By-the-by, who was the customer, Mr. Boyce, that took you out just the right a little while ago—kept you so long, and sent you back in such hot haste?"

There was the slightest possible pause.

"I don't know his name, Sir. I have seen him in the warehouse over and over again, but cannot remember to have ever heard it."

"Well, when you came back, who was the gentleman who wanted me so pressingly to come out?" said Mr. Klop, with that inexplicable gleam once more in his quiet, dangerous-looking eye.

Mr. Boyce attempted a smile: a very ghastly one it was.

"He neither gave me his name or card, Sir."

"And he said nothing particular to you, except that he wanted me out there?"

"Nothing, Sir."

"Not even that you must get me out of this room at any cost, or you would never be able to replace this hundred pounds out of your pocket, and which you had been home to fetch? Eh?"

Dead silence. I seemed (but it might be fancy) to hear the shaking of the clothes on that collapsing frame.

"Come, Mr. Boyce, speak out this time! If I wrong you I will beg your pardon, as a gentleman should, and show you why I came to this abrupt conclusion. Now, Sir, have you not that money in your pocket?"

What a position was mine! To stand there and see this man's guilt strangely and wonderfully brought to light through my guilt, and to know he was about to restore, getting credit for having escaped, and I feeling more and more free, in spite of my inward prayer to God to prepare me for the worst.

Suddenly he threw himself on his knees before Mr. Klop, and murmured, just above his breath, "Forgive me! It is true. I was tempted. I saw the key in your safe—discovered, as I thought, you had been robbed. I am sure, Sir, there were a hundred pounds taken away."

"I could have told you that."

"Indeed, Sir! I see you, then? I am rightly punished! I thought you had been rob bed—saw in the playbill a trace of the criminal—and felt assured that if I incrsa sed the amount no suspicion would ever attach to me. Mercy!"

"It would be wasted. I can understand a moment of weakness yeading to crime in a young, tempted, and inexperienced man; and that the act itself would bring its own warning and cure. But you, Sir, must be corrupt at heart—must have through life found yourself round with lies, and have been only unexpectedly surprised into a true self-revelation. Sir! I have no more to say."

A few minutes more and I saw two constables enter, and the gold taken from Boyce's pockets, which he had evidently determined to restore the moment he had, or fancied that he had, discovered me theft had been committed, but had been detected prematurely. Without a word more he left the room in the custody of the men.

I sank down in a chair, heedless of Mr. Klop's presence, my very soul faint.

"Young man," he said to me soon, and in a voice so strangely sweet that the tears bounded forth to greet it, "you have sinned, repented, and made proper restitution. You can do no more now. I wish it had been otherwise. But I forgive you. In time I may be able to trust you if you deserve it."

He would not turn me off then. O God! that I might have shown him what I felt! But I restrained myself, and I have no doubt he liked me the better for so doing.

"Paul, no one knows but myself. No one shall know."

I could only look and bow, in silent gratitude.

"You will dine with me, as you had intended?"

"No, no, Sir."

"Why? It will divert suspicion."

"Oh, Sir, my heart is too full. God forgive me; it would seem a kind of triumph!"

"You are right. Go at once. I will look to the affair of the bill, and see how to help you, without altogether sheltering you from your just responsibilities. Good-by; give me your hand; pleasant Christmas to you!"

Christina, I have told all to my mother. I cannot eat to-morrow's dinner till I have also told you. Now, if you wish it, I release you from your engagement.

PAUL.

Let the fate of these pages bear witness that I will never comply with the request to burn them; never will I burn them, never will I part with them, never shall eye see them while we two live. When we are dead, the revelation under other names will not matter to us, and may help those who are in danger.

CHRISTINA.

THE BOARS ON FIRE ON CHRISTMAS EVE

THE CHILDREN OF THE REVELS.

AKE the CHILDREN happy at Christmas! It is their innocent saturnalia, their prescriptive festival, their grand annual holiday, which no birthday celebration, no commemoration of successful cricket matches or grand boating races, can ever hope to equal. They look forward to it from the 7th of January to the 24th of December. They count over and over again its peculiar and remarkable attractions. Mincepies, plumpuddings, gigantic sirloins, columns of candles, a blaze of lamps, the pantomime, the comic song, the acted charade, and, above all, the fairy dreams all heavenly bright! Clown in September! of a Pantaloon at Michaelmas! of a Harlequin and harvest moons! It is impossible to reconcile such absurd contradictions. We should as fave associate a certain Imperial potentate with disinterested "ideas."

Male reverence is sex nauseous. Let us make the children happy at Christmas. Let us bear with them gently; reverence the purity that is in them; admire the exuberance, the geniality, the naturalness of their mirth. We know what Berlioz thought of the charity children at St. Paul's; but what is that famous musical critic's opinion of a gathering of children at a Christmas pantomime?—of three and thirty (or thereabouts) of smiling young masters and misses round a Christmas-tree? There is no sight on earth so quiet it. But to be happy with children we must make them happy, and exercise a stern control over our impatience, our unreasonableness, our hot, quick passions. We must sedulously commit the little wasps and bends in their youthful natures. We must;—but let Coleridge preach our homily in noble verse:—

> O'er wayward children wouldst thou hold firm rule,
> And sun thee in the light of happy face;
> Love, hope, and patience, these must be thy graces,
> And in thine own heart let them first keep school.

The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has contributed at divers times, and in divers ways, to childish happiness, and, I trust, to manhood's gentleness. Have we not forgotten "the children." The page placed in our own disposal is intended for them; absolutely and entirely for our "juvenile readers." Well, we propose to initiate them, as we have done in previous Christmas Numbers, into a certain NEW FASHION GAMES, which shall exercise their mental faculties and test their imitative capabilities, which shall be somewhat more fanciful and even poetical than those famous old gymnastic exercises "Hunt the Slipper," or "Blindman's Buff;" which shall develop to some slight extent the musical knowledge and elocutionary skill of the performers. Every household has its Keats, its Robert or Charles Mathews, its Louise Keeley; and an aggregate of friendly households can always make up a decent "Dramatic Company." Amongst the serious members may generally be found an efficient prompter, a dexterous stage-manager, an orchestra, a scene-painter, and a dresser. Thus, then, the company formed and the stage prepared, we propose to furnish our Children of the Revels with appropriate dramas (under the dramatic games—which, amusing to the performers, will not, is hoped, be objectionable to the audience.

And here we digress to explain our title. From an early period great celebrity attached to the boy actors of the old School of St. Paul's, nor did it desert the alumni of the present excellent foundation established by Dean Colet. As first they possessed the public with elaborate "Mysteries and Moralities," drawn from the stores of Old Testament History; but, afterwards, as they, or their directors, grew bolder, with the comedies of Terence and Plautus, or the tragedies of Seneca. They set the fashion which has since been followed in many of our public schools. A troupe of boys, selected from the choristers of Westminster Abbey and Queen Elizabeth's chapel, were formally incorporated under the title of "The Children of the Revels." Amongst them were Field, Underwood, and others, who in later life were fellow-actors with Shakspeare, and upon one of whom Ben Jonson wrote a famous epitaph:—

> Twas a child that so did thrive
> In grace and feature,
> As heaven and nature seemed to strive
> Which own'd the creature.
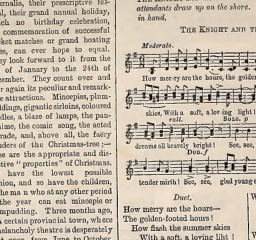
> Years he numbered, scarce thirteen,
> When fates turned cruel;
> Yet three filled zodiacs had he been
> The stage's jewel.

For our "Children of the Revels" we do not ask a public stage nor a poet's panegyrics. Give us a parlour, or a drawing-room, and a piano; and hey, presto! we ring the bell, and up goes the curtain.



AN ANIMATED BOUQUET.

Two of the players are chosen to personate a knight and his ladylove; and we are instructed to suppose that he is desirous of presenting her with a bouquet. He looks around, and finds that the lonely where they are unfortunately placed is utterly bare of leaf or blossom. His despair is great. But he is in fairy land, and, of course, a fairy immediately makes her appearance. She undertakes to relieve him from his difficulty, and summons his companions, who enter, attired in long cloaks, and take up appropriate positions. With a tap of her wand she converts each into a flower; and as each change takes place the cloak is thrown aside and some emblem of the flower displayed. (This part of the arrangement must, of course, be left to the taste and fancy of the theatrical "dresser.") The knight then selects the flower he prefers to make his bouquet. Each in turn joins him and his ladylove, and if any error is made, or if any delay takes place, a forfeit is exacted. The lady love then accepts the bouquet. The flowers form in a circle, and all dance round.

SCENE.—A desert island. The sea appears in the distance. Enter THE KNIGHT and his LADY LOVE from a small barque, which the attendants draw up on the shore. They then walk forward hand in hand.

THE KNIGHT AND THE LADY LOVE.

J. C. BETTRIS, R.A. M.

Duet.

How merry are the hours—
The golden-footed hours!
How flash the summer skies
With a soft, a loving life!
Ah, how sweet fancies rise,
And dreams all heavenly bright.
See, see! the glad young earth
Overflows with tender mirth!

THE KNIGHT.

Since, lady, in thyself I see
The fairest of all flow'rs;
Since brighter blossom may not be
In Flora's gayest bowers;
Tis fitting I should gather now
The wildlings of the lea,
That they may crown those tresses brown,
And, as they sparkle there,
May rise to think they are so weak,
And thou so very fair.

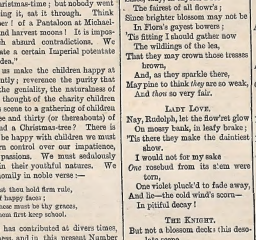
LADY LOVE.



Nay, Rudolph, let the flow'rs glow
On mossy bank, in leafy brake!
The there they make the daintiest show.
I would not for my sake
One rosebud from its stem were torn,
One violet pluck'd to fade away,
And lie—dull world wish'd scorn—
In pitiful decay!

THE KNIGHT.

But not a blossom deck this desolate scene,
Not even a pimpernel uplifts its head:
The trees are gaunt; the leaves are—well, not green—
And Nature seems bleak, barren, gloomy, dead!

(A car approaches the island, and out of it steps the FAIRY QUEEN. A red light is cast upon the scene.)

THE FAIRY QUEEN.

there, 'tis therefore shall find the Fair - y Queen!

Song.

Oh, I am the Fairy Queen,
And I rule in the balmy glade,
O'er the elfin streams and the greenwood groves,
In the depth of the woodland shade;
Wherever a gentle thought
Or a tender dream has birth—
Wherever the light of beauty rests
Upon the happy earth,—
'Tis there, 'tis there,
Thou shalt find the Fairy Queen.

Oh, I am the Fairy Queen,
And minstrels sing my power
On the rippling Avon's grassy margé,*
In Mulla's alders bower.†
And childhood's fancies long
Have been charmed by the elfin strain—
Oh, while the heart of the world beats true
We've wander'd, sure, into some desert isle,
Where summer winds ne'er bring their burden rare;
Where Ocean never breaks into a smile,
And sadden'd streams a mournful music bear!

THE LADY LOVE.

'Tis true, the place is awful: but our love
May brighten it as with a light divine;
And so the lustre stooping from above
In all the dim, drear darkness softly shines!
And then the memories of other days!
Oh, o'er the past a tender radiance plays.

THE KNIGHT.

Let us hasten, my love, to a shorter land,—
From these black barren peaks and these deserts of woe,
To some bower deep in beauty, to some riverside glow,
And roses their fragrance outpour on the breeze.

THE LADY LOVE.

But, hark! a sweet music comes over the sea—
And, lo! a rich splendour has fall'n on the isle,
And the heav'n seems touch'd with a kindlier smile.
What mystery this!

THE KNIGHT.

See! see! a radiant form appears!

(A car approaches the island, and out of it steps the FAIRY QUEEN. A red light is cast upon the scene.)

THE FAIRY QUEEN.

On the rippling Avon's grassy margé,*

And childhood's fancies long
Have been charmed by the elfin strain—
Oh, while the heart of the world beats true
And still, and still,
Thou shalt find the Fairy Queen!
(She approaches the KNIGHT and the LADY LOVE, who receive her, bowing.)

FAIRY QUEEN.

And so thou wanderest in a desert isle,
Where never leaf, nor bird, nor blossom smile;
It is not right that Beauty thus should grieve
From all that makes the lovely lovelier,
Yet ever there should bloom within her heart
The flowers of purest thoughts and they should stir
Her soul to sweet emotion.—But I am here
To meet your wishes.

THE KNIGHT AND LADY LOVE.

Queen, and lady dear,
We bend before thee.

FAIRY QUEEN.

Soon this isle shall glow
With bravest blossoms, and the dainty show
Shall yield thee fitting gift for mistress fair.
Hither, ye gentles.

(The ATTENDANTS on the KNIGHT and LADY LOVE approach, and form in a line.)

Now choose what flower ye each would be,
The violet sweet on mossy lea,
Or primrose on the grassy bank,
Or snowdrop 'mid the herbage dank,
The rose, the lily—what ye will,
And I your choice will straight fulfil.

FIRST ATTENDANT.

Oh! I would be the rose,
The lady rose,
Which with so warm a beauty glows,
And e'er has been
Of flowers the queen,
The rose, the regal rose!

THE FAIRY QUEEN.

Be then the rose.

(She waves her wand, and the change takes place.)

SECOND ATTENDANT.

Deep 'mid the grasses shines the silver star
Of the all-beauteous lily of the vale;
Even so a modest maiden stands confess'd
Fair in her purity of soul, and best
Her shrinking loveliness
Heaven's angels eyes approve. Ah, never fail
Those tender graces of pure womanhood.
The smile benignant and the glance subdued.

THE FAIRY QUEEN.

Arise, the lily!

THIRD ATTENDANT.

A lotus, I. Laden with flower and fruit
The enchanted stem I fain would rear,
Till men, with love and wonder mute,
And maidens pale with gentle fear,
Should hymn my praises thus:—
"The lotus blooms below the barren peak,
The lotus blows by every winding creek:
All day the wind breathes low, with mellower tone,
Through every hollow cave and alley lone Round and round the spicy downs the yellow lotus-dust is blown."*

THE FAIRY QUEEN.

The lotus, thou!

FOURTH ATTENDANT.

And I will be the daisy, the poet's darling flower,
And a blush shall tip my cheek, for I'm of "low degree,"
And I dare not lift my head in the rose-queen's regal bower,
But I sparkle in the valley, and I laugh upon the lea.
And the "wee" and modest daisy shall be remember'd long
In the peasant's honest heart, and the poet peasant's song.

* Tennyson.

THE FAIRY QUEEN.

Be thou the daisy!

FIFTH ATTENDANT.

Let me be the violet,
The rare, sweet violet.
My cheek with Heaven's kisses wet,
Mine eyes all bright with Heaven's blue,
And 'neath "a mossy stone" I'll hide,
For ne'er my brow is hot with pride,
Tho' "sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes
Or Cytherea's breath."*

THE FAIRY QUEEN.

Be thou the violet!

SIXTH ATTENDANT.

And I would be the marigold,
With my crown of glory bold,
Following the sun all day with tender looks,
Or gazing steadfast in the glassy brooks.

THE FAIRY QUEEN.

The sunlit marigold!

SEVENTH ATTENDANT.

Let me be the daffodil,
The golden-gleaming daffodil,
"That comes before the swallow dares, and takes The winds of March with beauty."

THE FAIRY QUEEN.

Be thou the daffodil!

EIGHTH ATTENDANT.

The pansy, I.
That love may hold and use in remembrance sweet,
Ah, since the happy smiling hours are fleet
In passing from us—lightning-winged they fly—
Even let them live again in memory;
Even bid them in our pleasant fancies be
The joyous hours again!

THE FAIRY QUEEN.

And thou, the pansy!
See now, fair sir, the blossoms bloom before ye,
And so to Fairy Land do I restore ye,
And yield ye these "sweet murmurings of the skies,"†
To glad with blithesome looks your loving eyes.

THE KNIGHT.

Which shall I choose for thee, my Lady Love?

(Rapidly.)

Come hither, flaunting Marigold,
And thou, my blue-eyed Violet;
Approach, thou Daffodil so bold,
The rare Queen Rose I'll ne'er forget.
Hither, my Pansy, thoughtful flower,
And Daisy, thou, the spring's sweet dower;
Lotus, and Lily, hither all,
And sit your lady's feet obedient fall.

(As each FLOWER is named, she approaches the KNIGHT and LADY LOVE, and, if any mistake is made, incurs a forfeit. When all the FLOWERS have been summoned, they kneel before the LADY LOVE, who kisses each. They then arise, form in a circle, and dance round the KNIGHT and the LADY LOVE. The FAIRY QUEEN raises her wand, and the curtain drops.)

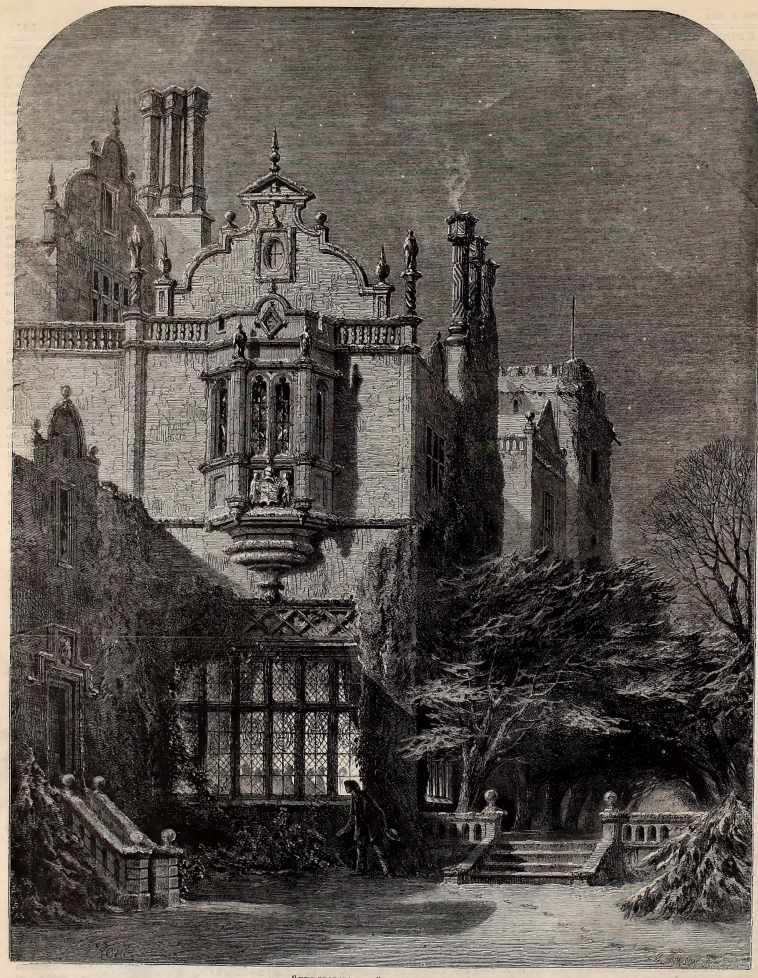
* Shakspeare.
† Keble.

FINAL CHORUS.



Such is a modest outline of our new drawing-room game, "carefully adapted to the juvenile comprehension."

THE HOUSE ON FIRE ON CHRISTMAS EVE.

GENERALLY take up my hunting quarters at the White Hart at Bastock. Do not be alarmed at an out going to bore you with a story of a run, or the praise of my horses (good as they are), for I know what it is to listen to men who fancy their favourite sport is the only one worth following. I seldom dine with either of my brothers, for one has Izaak Walton by rote, and the other can quote every line of Surtees. Perhaps I flatter myself I know better.

The White Hart stands at the lower end of Bastock, at the foot of a gentle rise, leading to the turnpike. In the front of the inn is a row of low posts and chains upon which I usually sit when the weather is fine, and smoke my matutinal cigar. The main street forms itself into a letter Y, one branch leading to the quiet old church, and the other to the market-place. Once on a time I don't know how many coaches paused though Bastock, and there are stable legends that take one breath away to listen to as the White Hart of the incredibly small number of seconds required to change the "Royal Independent" when it run opposition to the "True Blue." Those were the coaching days! I have a great respect for the railway interest, but I must say there has been on pleasure—emphatically pleasure—in travelling since the abolition of stage-coaches. Will you kindly step, Civilisation—ends of the earth brought together—time is money—annihilation of space. Very true, and quite right into the bargain; but who takes his place in a "first class" train the same as he propitiates the inevitable

"THE PRODIGAL SON."—DRAWN BY S. READ.

"Warily, almost stealthily, with bated breath and cautious step, the youthful figure crossed the terrace walk, and passed into the bright room."

as he clapped his hands and cried, "Ah, that cannot burn!—that cannot burn!" The neighbours thought him mad, and the more so when he strove to prevent their attempts to extinguish the fire.

"None enter here!" he cried. "Let it burn to the ground! I am master here, and will have my way. Let it burn!—let it burn!"

There was something terrible in the sight of the spare form of the old man attired in his long duffel gown, his arms cast into the air and his long white locks tinted by the lurid glare of the flames. The roof had fallen in some time; but from the centre of the dwelling there rose up at intervals long tongues of fire and columns of dark smoke that puzzled the bystanders.

It was daylight before the fire had exhausted itself, and Peter's home lay before him a mass of smoking rubbish. Yet the old man kept up his unceasing march backwards and forwards, and so continued throughout Christmas Day, rejecting the food his neighbours offered him, and only quenching his thirst with deep draughts of water. Every now and then, as the night advanced, he tried the heat of the embers, and at length, when the moon had risen, and all had left him to keep his strange watch as he pleased, he took a mattock from a shed which had escaped the fire, and began to rake aside the ashes which covered the spot whence the tongues of flame and the black smoke had issued so continuously. He continued this labour long after the villagers were asleep; and then many were awakened by shrieks and moans, made terrible by the stillness of the night. Some rose from their beds, and looked forth to learn the meaning of those cries; whilst others, more courageous or more compassionate, suspecting the truth, went forth and sought the wreck of Peter's home. There they found the wretched creature on his knees—now beating the ashes with his hands, now clutching his scanty locks, and shrieking or moaning by turns. On the spot he had cleared some molten mets glittered in the moonlight. It was not the gold Peter had purchased with the scrapings and plunderings of his life, but lead—worthless lead, which his treacherous nephew and his confederates had moulded and plated to resemble the precious lump found at Queenover. The biter had been bitten. The wicked sower had gathered his harvest of hemlock, and the poison would destroy him. Yes; a year—only a year—he mourned his departed gold, and then he died.

No wonder mine host of the White Hart declined the custom of Johnny Twister.

HOME FOR THE CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS.—DRAWN BY A. HUNT.

THE PRODIGAL SON.

SHOULD imagine, of all dreary and unenviable plights, none can surpass that of a friendless man in the lonely coffee-room of an unfrequented country inn on Christmas Eve. For all that Shrewsbury or Sarum may have said or written to the contrary, my experience is that the best hostelries in the world have their "off" days—except for passing bed and board—be avoided by cheerful-minded folks who would remain so; but most assuredly, at such a season, by all, whether of gay or lugubrious temper, they have any home memories of the past likely to seize so capital an opportunity of hazarding them. For they can be anything but pleasant company sometimes those home memories; and faces in the fire will not always smile upon the lonely watcher.

Some such gloomy unpleasantness of experience as this was perhaps disturbing the solitary figure who sat before the fire in the coffee-room of the strangers' room of an out-of-the-way country inn upon the eve of a recent Christmas. It was a gloomy room enough at best, and it was at its worst, assuredly, upon this night. All the resources of a gas company seemed to have been quite unable to light the oil lamps which have failed to lights the dark walls and gloomy recesses effectually; and as for the flickering fire which two wax candles in which the dusty -bedevilled, all they could do was to make a sort of feeble halo in which the bending figure, a heap of luggage in the corner near him, some open letters, an empty decanter, and a little pile of bank of liberty upon a table by his side, were dimly perceptible. He had sat there almost all that evening. His cigar was better than no friend at all, and he had clung to its companionship so closely that there was quite a little heap of whitening ashes on the hearth before him as, with a deep breath that needed very little more intensity to become a heavy sigh, he rose, stretched himself, and, throwing back the heavy window-curtains, looked out abroad.

There was so little to look at, however, out of doors, and that little was so obscured, that he soon came back to the fireside and sank before it with folded arms, in a listless, weary fashion. Now that he had turned his face to the dim light, it might be seen that he was a young well-dressed man, of tall and graceful bearing, and features that would have been very handsome, but for the care that had left them pale, worn, brow, and a certain bitter, stern resolve, that hardened the muscles of his mouth and chin into an expression of almost fierce defiance.

With an impatient gesture he broke from his reverie once again, and eased wearily up and down the gloomy room. How slowly the evening wore away! how heavily the lagging minutes sped! With every nerve and sense on the alert for action, how trying was the interval of expectation was! Although he was in no mood for human companionship just then—he had fled hither for escape from it, indeed—this utter solitude of time and place oppressed him terribly. He offered no capital an opportunity, too, for foolish, unmanly fancies and impulses to plague and trouble him, and they were making such a busy use of it, that they nearly drove him mad. He could not rest this Christmas Eve; and with an angry exclamation at his folly, he threw on a rough peacoat and travelling cap and left the room.

The prospect out of doors was clearly not any alleviation of his dulness there so improbable, that he halted upon the threshold double fully. But while he hesitated he caught sight, through a chancepened door, of a merry party in the landlord's private room, and the sound of women's voices and the laughter of children broke upon his ear. That decided him. Anything was better than carrying those voices and that ringing laughter back to his lonely old up stairs.

It was an out-of-the-way seaport town, of all places in the world for a lonely man to be waiting a Christmas Eve in. There might be some little bustle and animation in the main street, where the townsfolk were busy making their Christmas purchases, but none of it could be heard or perceived walk that looked seaward. For it was a rough and threatening night, on which few, if any, would be abroad from choice. The very boats were hauled up high and dry upon the shingle, and the only sail did what it would with the lonely pier, tumbling up among its gaunt timbers, and sweeping them clear of what little snow now and then collected upon them. And the light gusty breeze that occasionally shook the cheerless night more bitter to the lonely man. Through the chinks of closed shutters he could catch glimpses of the warmth within, and now and then from an open door a flood of light, and the sound of song and laughter would tumble out upon him as he passed. Even in the look-out station, where the pilot people kept watch—keen as they were for business generally, it would be an unreasonable man who should disturb their revels that night—there was a merry party met. As he passed in the snow before, looking seaward, a rich, powerful voice trolled out the verse of an old sea-song, especially, whose last words were taken up and re-echoed by the eager chorus.

It was something to be within hearing of light hearts, and so, almost instinctively, he stood closer, under the overhanging roof of eaves, where he was to some extent sheltered from the snowdrift. He had not long there when a new-comer, with his foot upon the stair, caught sight of him and paused, wondering much likely to be there. He thought it better to make some remark, and so he said, "it was a bitter night." The sailor, hesitated; he had some doubt about it evidently; but at last he entered into the conversation enough to admit, "Well, it might be down there;" and then, with another shrug of his broad shoulders, he passed into the warmth and light above.

Left alone, the man stood there yet several fancy which had made him so restless in the inn's solitude disturbed him again. Although he laughed it to scorn, and would never yield to it for all its urgency, he caught himself speculating upon the practicability of doing so over and again. He gave way to it so far, indeed, once as to step out into the fury of light that came from the room above and look at his watch. Eight o'clock. There was time, then, to catch the night train, which would carry him within six miles of them. It would be strange if those six miles, across a country that he knew so well, could not be walked before midnight; and then—then—— Pshaw! he dismissed the foolish fancy almost angrily.

But it recurred to his mind, and with more pressing force. Who would ever know his weakness? Besides, it would give him something to do, and the thought of returning to his weary vigil was unbearable. It was weak, foolish, unmanly; but he had committed many greater follies, and this would be but adding one more to the long list, and bringing it to a fitting close. For with to-morrow would begin a new life, in which the commission of such a weakness would be impossible.

Angry with the impulse—swayed by it against his conviction, and almost despite his will—undecided to the very last, even when his ticket had been taken, and his hand was on the carriage-door—he yet allowed it to guide him. Alone in the carriage, and committed to one stage at least of its purpose, he folded his arms and leant back to think——

Of what? Of his life up to this time, perhaps. Of that long train of follies which was to have its last item appended to it to-night, and thenceforth end. When did it begin? With the high-spirited boy who would bend to no will that thwarted his own—would submit to nothing the headstrong youth, whose undisciplined temper brooked no advice that appeared to assume the semblance of command—with the selfwilled man who threw off all control, and would be slave to nothing but his own passions. He could not decide. It was a bitter retrospect, but he had not been altogether to blame, perhaps. Although he felt more open to self-reproach than might then be awarded to another case for pross, he could not help thinking that if his friends had treated him more judiciously—if his father's censure had been less violent and indiscriminate, and his mother's influence allowed more scope—things might never have come to this pass. No, upon the whole, he had suffered himself to have been, they had not given him fair play at home.

And had the world? At the thought his face hardened into a bitter expression, and his hands clenched with more determination. Like a fool—he saw it now—he had staked his all—health, fortune, happiness, in fair and honest play against a loaded dice, and lost of course. Well, he was so content to call at his ill-fortune again very recently for his simple folly! Broken, ruined, flung in love and play by his closest friends, with his life withered in its spring, and hope almost dead within him, he had been fain at last to turn his face homeward. It was a vile, worthless world, whose empty prizes he had failed to seize. There was stuff in him for something better, and he would show it under a new and changed spirit, with the knowledge of his wasted fortune and reclaim his dishonoured name. If he fell—and he knew quite well the suffering he had earned and must expect—they would never know it; it was not probable that they, perhaps, he might return to the home of his boyhood with a claim upon their respect as well as love. He might have the latter now, perhaps, if his life would utter a claim of what his heart held it, but this his pride forbade. Let his strange journey have its way. It had forgotten him, no doubt; but he would return this Christmas Eve to the home he loved so well, and see the old place, it might be for the last time. To-morrow he sailed for a new life in a new world, where he would be safe from weak deeds if he could not escape regretful thoughts.

When he alighted at the railway station, and stood face to face with the open country, the snow had fallen heavily, and more snow had fallen inland than by the sea, and that it lay around some inches deep.

It was not snowing just then, but threatening clouds were drifting past the moon, and there was every sign that it would be upon him once moment weighing their way across the leaden sky inland, were lost in the mist the next, and the rising night wind swept by him with a strong, continual wail. It was cold, bitterly cold, and the darkness, and, perhaps, the pleasure of strong physical action, so raised his spirits that, as he trudged forward through the snow, he found himself whistling merrily or humming some half-forgotten melody. Then, with a ringing fence, from choice rather than necessity, and rolled headlong into a deep ditch of snow, he gathered himself up with such a hearty burst of laughter that he was fain to stop and take breath until the fit should be one conclusion—that his was a light heart hastening to a happy Christmas home. Very probably the few wayfarers whom he met and interchanged cheery goodnights with; the bony carrier whom he overtook, urging his poor weary horse and the overladen waggon before, who swept by him over the snow, noiselessly, as though they were spectral huntsmen, bound to some great ghostly meet, thought so too.

Strangely enough none met him who knew him. If for a moment he ceased to dwell upon his fancied wrongs—his father's harsh censure and bitter words, his mother's averted face of shame—for that moment he dwelt upon the hope that he was not dead. Then himself speculating how they would receive him, and picturing the curiosity of some, the joy of others, the surprise of all. Upon such a night it was not improbable that their hearts might be with him. His mother and elder brother, who had never sympathized with his lighter temperament: might not be sorry, perhaps, to clasp his hand; he could picture the glad cry with which his little sister Lily would run down the stairs to hug to his embrace; it was likely enough that the proud grey face that had looked down so coldly and pitilessly upon his prodigal life would melt into tears at the sight of him; and he was not doubt that a welcome that another's heart would give which he might break, but never could estrange. As he thought of them all, a sudden mist rose to his eyes and blinded him. He halted for the fifteenth time to clear his sight. But this was unmanly folly. If he had so little mastery over himself it were better to turn back before worse ensued. But he meant this threat seriously, and he did not even pause to give its serious consideration, but held on his way steadily.

In time he had reached the summit of the steep hill that overlooked his old village home. It lay white snow lay deep upon the low roofs; the tall trees, rocked by the keen wind, moaned above them. It was encircled with warm lines of light. Quite a flood of it was streaming from the low windows of the old millhouse. He almost persuaded himself that he could perceive the curtains of the chamber in which lay one of the coquettish miller's daughter, who had flirted with him as with the rest, and once for a season had entire possession of his boyish heart. He could see Lily running to the window to look out for the return of her in his daisy days, and how shamefully he had jilted her. But the smile room darkened into an ugly frown. The pretty miller's daughter had been easily consoled for the absence of the boy.

As he passed down the quiet street he stopped before some of the lighted windows, endeavouring to recognise the voices of those within, with a feeling forgotten for years. Once he stood upon the opposite side to the old rat round the chimney corner. One or two might be sleeping peacefully in the churchyard under their coverlet of snow; but the purple-nosed clerk still filled his prescriptive seat, and the red-faced blacksmith had just finished his one song, which he had sung there any time these thirty years, and, with a clamour of pipes and glasses, they were knocking down the hateful saddler, who had never sung in his life and never would, but who would be tassed to do so by the boisterous comrades to the last day of his "public" life.

As he listened there the chimes of the church clock struck the hour—eleven. He must hasten on if he would be in time. Turning down a by-path, he mounted the hill and gained the margin of a handsome park. There was little fear of his being seen and recognised at such an hour, but he would run no risk. Clambering over the rustic palings and keeping well out of sight of the house until he was within a few score yards of it, he came at last full in view of his old home.

In lower rooms, from one wing to the other, were ablaze with light—many figures flitted past the windows—even at that distance the sound of music and happy voices reached his ear. It was no more than he had expected and prepared himself to see, but it irritated him painfully. If his resolve had needed strengthening, that sight below him would have confirmed it. With a bitter smile he was turning away, when his step faltered. It was hard, after all, to have come so far upon this Christmas Eve and seen so little of them. Years hence, in that new life which he should hasten to so gladly now, the thought of this lost opportunity might haunt and reproach him. He would steal round to a window of the east wing, where the clock-tower. through which he might see them without any risk of detection. It might have been a dangerous experiment a few hours back, but he felt himself strong enough now to look upon them for the last time, with no fear that any other weak impulse should unman him.

Crossing the courtyard stealthily, a dog leaped at him from his lair with a hoarse outcry. But the next moment, before his arm, uplifted to strike, could fall, the old hound had recognised him, and cowered before him, fawning upon him, and licking his clenched hand. He would not have believed that so simple an incident could have affected him so powerfully. But it did unman him thoroughly, and it was with an emotion he would have been ashamed for human eyes to see that he threw his arm over the dog's shaggy neck, and quieted him with an almost childish embrace.

A few more steps and he was in front of the old house again. Just then the sky was clear, and the moon shone bright and full upon the quaint roof and gables crusted deep with snow. It lay in heavy masses upon the avenue of solemn yews; it clothed grotesquely the quaint armadile figures on the garden-wall; it covered a few feet of level building gave them vantage ground; each blade of the ivy that clung to the ripe crumbling walls glistened with it; it marked the outline of the grand, old windows, and delicately fringed each diamond pane.

Warily—almost stealthily—he hated breath and cautious step—the youthful figure crossed the terrace walk, the track of his footsteps sinking deep into the snow, and peered into the bright room. With a bitter smile at first, but soon with deep interest, his eye swept among the gay figures. He recognised many. How tall John's children had grown since he saw them last! How grey his old Aunt Lotty began to look! And what a pretty young woman was that of the eldest sister Lily, whom he had left a child! And how happy they all looked this Christmas Eve! He could not help noticing this again, but sadly, rather than bitterly, now. He had seen enough, and would go now, but it would not be in anger.

But he found it hard to leave the old place yet. And as he looked back he saw that the drifting snow was obliterating over the steps, and that the snow was falling and filling up the tracks of his footsteps so fast that it almost seemed to him—another foolish fancy—that the very elements were bent on shutting him out. And even then he turned him forward and barring his retreat. Although he smiled at the wildness of the thought, he humoured it so far as to take up his position by the window again and watch the gay, unconscious figures with greater interest than ever.

It was paining him very keenly to see such joy and lighthearteduess in the old house from which he was self-exiled. However powerful the impulse had been that had led him to this threshold once, then, its influence had ceased. And yet, for all the pain he felt he was almost glad that it had ended so. For he could not help feeling now that if they had been admitted to a sight of him after a trial like that probation might after all have failed him. Now that it could not happen he did did no mind confessing to himself how hardly tried he should have been had he seen any evidence of his absence from among them as felt—any proof that his presence there would add to their seasonable joy. But he saw none. Upon not a face of that merry throng could he detect one symptom of sorrow for his or care. It was clear that no thought of him was in any of their hearts that, as he bent forward to look again, the words almost rose to his lips, "If I could see even the slightest proof that I were remembered here I would not unhesitated I might find it hard to break away from them, but there is none—none."

And yet the snow, as thought it knew better, with eager haste was filling up his footmarks, and the wind hurrying clouds to aid it, drifted down two little clouds of it from the roof so heedlessly, that a couple of the most important griffins on the premises found themselves buried in an instant, and ramped above their shields more fiercely than ever.

Just then, as the panting figure bent forward for the last time, a burst of laughter rang through the crowded hall. As though some one had struck his white face a violent blow, he started back, and, with a bitter exclamation, turned to fly. But at that moment the old clock, high up in the tower, shook down a little shower of snow and struck the hour of midnight with twelve.

There was a fashion in that family—it occurred to him at once—that its members, old and young, should give each other greeting and good wishes upon the stroke of twelve on the night that had just commenced. The recollection of this custom checked him, and, bending forward, he peered into the hall again.

The gay groups had parted now, so he could look, as down an avenue of figures, to where two stood whom hitherto he had not seen. By the hearth, on which the smouldering logs gave out a rich, golden light, stood his father and mother, the former, yet with the same upright presence and severe, proud face; and by his side a delicate, fragile figure, with features was with secret hidden suffering. As the old man bent in almost formal obeisance, and his wife, with a courtesy of the old, the wanderer peered wistfully into his mother's face, with the words in his heart again, if not upon his lips, "If I could see even now upon the face of one of them the slightest proof that I was not altogether forgotten and unlamented upon this Christmas Eve."

Ha! She had returned the pressure of her husband's hand and lips, but with little warmth. And then they looked upon the happy faces round—here reflecting nothing of their mirth and gaiety—wistfully she gazed from them, away into the dark night, as for an absent face she missed and mourned, and, as her wistfulness deepened, he saw how they veiled for him; how her wan lips trembled for his embrace, and her poor head drooped for the warmth and support of his strong heart. He took moment to forget all but her desolation and his love, and with a lond and passionate cry had started forward.

He did not notice the sudden awe that for the moment froze the gay figures to their places, nor the agitation and excitement that the next instant broke them up. The Prodigal had only eyes for the one poor face that turned to his, flushed with the glad joy of recognition, and the white arms that were stretched towards him in wild and longing welcome.

There were no footsteps across the snow from the old house that Christmas night.

WILLIAM J. STORIE.

THE FIRST CHRISTMAS DAY IN ENGLAND.

IN the year of our Lord 597 Pope Gregory the Great dispatched the monk Augustine, with a chosen band of missionaries, to convert to Christianity the land of the Angles. Arrived in England, Augustine and his followers had an interview with Ethelbert, the powerful King of Kent. They came bearing a silver cross and offering up prayers. Ethelbert declined at that time to forsake the worship he had so long followed with his people, but allowed the missionaries publicly to preach their religion, and gave them a dwelling-place in his metropolis of Canterbury. In the east, Ethelbert, who had married Bertha, the Christian daughter of Charibert, King of the Franks, adopted the faith of his wife. The idea of promulgating the Christian doctrine among the English was first suggested to the good Pope Gregory, then a monk, by his seeing some beautiful Anglo-Saxon slaves exposed for sale in the marketplace of Rome. He inquired the name of their country, and on being told they were Angles—Angli, "They have an angel mien," he said, "and it becomes such to be coheirs with the angels in heaven."]

THY pilgrim bands, old Rome! are on their way;
Thy silver cross shall span the barrier sea;
From out the ruin of thy fast decay
The light of nations shall be struck by thee.

The pagan fires die out; through all our clime
The sacrificial knives grow red with rust;
And with a touch, gentle and strong as time,
Our blood-stained altars crumble into dust!

The slavery of the soul long dragged its chain;
And faint the promise shone, and dim the day
Till love's blest smile had kindled it; in vain
Man's fiery zeal, till woman led the way.

Slowly, as children that first cross life's floor,
And with a faltering foot, the way was trod,
Ere yet Christ's newly-born knew wide the door,
And with untrammelled freedom walked with God.

Then burst His glory on the dazzled gaze
Of wondering heathens—and the "lost" was "found;"
Then rose the first heart-music of his praise,
The first soul-festival on English ground.

Forget not, O my country! her who led
A faltering nation to the one great goal;
Who stood, a living spirit midst the dead,—
The wise Frank Princess of the Christian soul.

A deathless name is hers; it stands enrolled
In noble memories; and, though unseen,
Her spirit walks this empire's of old:—
Thank God, my England! for a Christian Queen.

Go, tell her she may cast her sceptre down,
Clasping the cross; may fling aside her state,
Rich in that one best jewel of her crown
The faith that makes, and keeps, a nation great.

Not as in Rome—the city of old graves—
Stood the soul-orphans of our Saxon land,
Around her hearth, no heathens and no slaves,
The "angel-faces" of her children stand.

A Christian mother and a Christian wife,
She reads the lesson writ in Bertha's dust:
"No crown so noble as a noble life;
No throne like that which thrones a people's trust."

On all her shores a quickened pulse is bounding,
Like waves that beat upon a golden strand;
The same old pulse that, 'mid Hosannas sounding,
Hailed the first Christmas in a new-born land.

The same old music!—but O, deepened more
By martyr-voices;—spirit-strains that roll,
Thrilling our shadowy aisles from roof to floor,
Leaping from chord to chord—from soul to soul.

The same old blessing!—Bless THEE for the land
Of our deliverance; for each banquet spread,
Still, in His name, who, with unsullied hand,
Stooped in the cup of life our Saxon bread!

For altars and for homes where lingers yet
The ivy of promise to the sages given,
Where love divine o'er every roof hath set
The star that guides us to the fields of heaven!

O, give us still, dear God! the light that keeps
One foot-track clear while treading earth's dark way;
Him who, benighted, mid the ice-blast sleeps,
Wake—till the snow-path brightens into day!

Take the poor heathen's captive spirit, Lord!
And ere thy hand shall break the "golden bowl,"
And ere thy touch shall loose the "silver cord,"
O give it back to him—a ransomed soul.

Our English air no slave may breathe; once pressed,
Our soil rends off the badge of his despair;
How shall he toil then in thy fields of rest;
How breathe, a slave, in thy diviner air!

Strike off his fetters: bow his stubborn knee,
Cramped with the shackles riveted too fast,
And lift, O lift, his darkened eyes to Thee
That they may drink thy living light at last!

Beautiful faith! whose martyrs smile in sleep,
Like children that in dreams the angels see,
Knowing how love immortally shall keep
Slain innocents around the Father's knee.

Beautiful faith! that casteth not a stone
Even at the guilty; breathes the lost one's breath;
And, where the sorrow to the heart hath flown,
Sucks out the poison from the wound of death.

Beautiful faith! that, hovering o'er a world
Deluged in sorrow, droppeth like a dove,
And, stirring the dead waves with wings unfurled,
Drowns its blood-altars in a sea of love!

ELEANORA L. HERVEY.

"CAUGHT."

Stolen kisses! stolen kisses!
O what precious spoil they are!
Whether cheek of sleeping miss is
Walnut-brown or lily-fair.
But, though dear the sweet possession,
They are but a tasteless sham
(Dare I make the bold confession?)
To a pot of stolen jam.

Stolen meetings! stolen meetings!
When our joy's half made of fear,
Worth an age of formal greetings—
Thou, the loved one, only near.
Yet time was, my Eleanore,
When we met by stealth, and made
Happiness from plumcake, or a Pot of orange marmalade.

Stolen kisses when rejected
Ofttimes lead to wordy strife!
Stolen meetings when detected
Ofttimes chill a maiden's life!
So, when housekeeping duenna
"Caught" us foraging for "cram,"
Eleanore, calls me Brute when the door,
Were our substitutes for jam!

THE NIGHT MARCH OF THE VOLUNTEERS.

THE MUSIC BY W. M. RALPH.

STEP together! All together! Close together!
Remember this is holy earth
On which our measured footsteps tread—
The living land which gave us birth!
The dust of our immortal dead!

CHORUS.

Step together! All together!
Each man's true beside us;
Close together! Full together!
Death can but divide us!

Step together! All together! Close together!
The happy spirits of our sires
Look down from pon bright stars above,
And from those orbs of quenchless fires
Light in our hearts a patriot love.

[Chorus.

Step together! All together! Close together!
The winds shall bear across the sea
The burden of our earnest song,—
Who bearing doubts we will be free?
Who knowing this dare do us wrong?

[Chorus.

Step together! All together! Close together!
They taunt us with our love of gold,
Our hate of blood, our love of peace;
We would not sell what they have sold
For even LIFE itself's increase.

[Chorus

Step together! All together! Close together!
Free mothers have not sung us lays,
Or read our history's page in vain;
The noble deeds of olden days,
When needed, we will do again.

CHORUS.

Step together! All together!
Each man's true beside us,
Close together! Full together!
Death can but divide us.

MARK LEMON.

A CHRISTMAS CRACKER.

"O tell me, dear Louisa, why
Though Christmas you refuse my offer?
My brand bands unincumbered lie,
Well filled is my paternal coffer.

Already thrice on bended knee
I've popped, with words of true devotion,
And yet I find no love is free,
And no reciprocal emotion.

Thou smilest sadly when I speak,
With half-averted, tearful, glances;
O why deny the boon I seek?
Why close thy heart to my advances?"

Thus spake I, full of love and grief;
Louisa answered, simply sighing—
"I love thee, Fred, beyond belief;
With love, in fact, I'm almost dying.

I know thy hands are broad and fair,
And full is thy paternal coffer;
And yet, I fear me, I can no'er
Accept thy advantageous offer.

It is not that thy hair is red;
Ah, no! I still could hold thee dear;
Nor that thou squintest so—but Fred,
Dear Fred! thou'rt not a Volunteer!"

THE AWKWARD SQUAD.

Now our Christmas Eve drill's over, and to supper home we plod,
Comrades, listen while I sing the sorrows of the Awkward Squad,

Very sharp is Sergeant Gimlett, but his manner's rather blunt;
When he can't fit, he won't "a cast," he impolitely cried "Eyes front!"

Though there's nothing queer about me, and my uniform's the best,
Gimlett said I was no "old file"—told me that I wasn't "dressed."

But I shouldn't mind his bluntness—Sergeants will behave as such—
If he'd only mind his grammar: Gimlett's English might be Dutch.

"Rear" he lectures into rere—p-u-t he thinks spells putt,
And "foot," in some mysterious way, is metamorphosed into fut.

Ruthlessly he drops his h's—Oh, I do so wish he wouldn't!—
Then he picks them up again, and "puts" them everywhere he shouldn't.

Very sad it is to hear him as each harmless H he drops;
And, to add to my misfortune, Gimlett will not mind his stops.

Still I tried to understand him—tried at drill to do my best—
When he puts us through our "facings," wasn't duller than the rest.

But my eagerness to please him got me into and disgrace;
When he gave the word to "Face!" I found that I was not to face.

"Has you were," said Sergeant Gimlett, quickly cooling down my zeal
"Bring the oiler of the right fut smart agin the hother eel."

"Then don't halter that position till you gets the horder low."
(Two he meant, but he pronounced it as a perfect rhyme to cow.)

"Then just rise the toes together, and turn smoothly on the oels."
Round we went, like weathercocks, as if we all had worked on wheels.

"Has you were!" roared Sergeant Gimlett, in a vicious manner now;
"Will you keep them bodies stiddy till I gives the horder tow."

Round, and round, and round he faced us, till our brains resembled starch
Then we tried the strange manœuvre soldiers learn before they march,

Called the balance-step or goose-step, neither appellation's wrong,
For only geese or acrobats could keep in such a posture long.

Each man stood upon his right leg, with the other in the air,
Swinging slowly to and fro, as Gimlett shouted "Front!" and "Rare!"

"Well," I muttered, "goose at table may be an attractive bird,
But to imitate his motion is, to say the least, absurd.

Who that ever saw a gander waddling on his yellow shanks"—
"Silence!" bellowed our commander. "Oo's that talking in the ranks?"

Sergeant Gimlett's next injunction—though I'm not at all a glutton—
Coming after such a goose, invited fleeting thoughts of mutton.

"When you march," said our instructor, "don't cast sheep's eyes down on your breast;
"Old your end hup; look before you; are your shoulders nicely dressed.

"Keep the neck and loins from moving; don't, I beg, stick out the paunch;
Let the action of the leg proceed directly from the haunch."

"March!" said Gimlett. Off we started in a long, uneven row;
And, I own, I thought the slow march most indubitably "slow."

Gimlett seemed to think so too. It does look stupid, I suppose,
When men at drill won't keep in step, and will forget to "pint" their toes.

Every now and then we "alted!" and, to rest our aching knees,
Gimlett kindly gave us leave to stand (as he explained) "at hease."

But his theory was a strange one. When at ease a person stands
He doesn't stamp his feet before him and insanely clap his hands.

Rather does he put them in the pockets of his pantaloons,
And whistle, or, if he's a dunce, invited during thoughts of tunes.

My pet vertical position—which most Englishmen admire—
Is when, upon my rug at home, I stand at ease before the fire.

Then, in truly British fashion—never doing things by halves—
With my coat-tails snugly tucked up, I fervently toast my calves.

Gimlett, I suppose, was right, though in a martial point of view;
And in Turkey, people say, we ought to do as turkeys do.

So I'll persevere at drill, although at first it's rather odd;
I daresay I shall like it better when I leave the Awkward Squad.

J. H. LEWES.

ACROSTIC ENIGMA.

I GREW depraved from one divided deed,
Slain by base Romans whom my arm had freed.
Naked, I put to flight marauding foes,
Save once a year, my jealous poet I close.
To a cheap web my Indian name is given,
The deathless seer who reappeared from heaven,
I trust ripe Cicero to the Poetic flood,
Gauls made my pavement bluuh with Roman blood.
Though not a fish, I swim the Polar main;
For feeding David was my father slain.
With half a lisp I finish broccoli,
Nor sit erect until you give me tea,
For Diocletian planted herbs in me.

THE WORDS.

His country's hope across the wave is borne
To lands that from his ancestor were torn.

CHARADE.—No. 21.

Without those eyes of heavenly blue
My First, dear girl, you could not do.
Without those hundred teeth so keen,
My Second ne'er could have been.
My Whole hath given great delight
To many a rustic maid and wight.

NIGHT MARCH AT CHRISTMAS-TIDE OF THE RIFLE VOLUNTEERS.—DRAWN BY HARRISON WEIR, 1ST SURREY RIFLES

"CAUGHT!"

"A MERRY CHRISTMAS!"

THE FONT AND THE FLOWERS.

In a recent lecture on the causes of the French Revolution the lecturer, whilst examining the position of Necker when he was called to the helm for the last time, mentioned, amongst the other difficulties with which he had to contend, the fact that he was not backed by the clergy, as his own family. A clever wife and a brilliant daughter (afterwards Mdme. de Staël) were doing all at the altar on the domestic hearth, upon which the flattered father was placed, and made the idol of their daily devotion. Everything which he did must be right.

Generalising from this particular instance, the lecturer advised the air hearers, who for med the larger portion of his audience, to take care never to fall into a similar error, assuring them that this species of worship had a most injurious effect upon the character of the male sex.

It is possible that some of our readers may imagine that there is a good deal to be said on the other side of the question; in fact, that the consecration of some ladies would rather have the effect of spoiling the male relatives with a painful sense of inferiority, a state of mind which might also militate against success.

But it will be generally admitted that there is one class of men who are placed on dangerous pedestals by the united action of the female population.

A curate in a metropolitan parish who has neither wife nor daughter to worship him is exposed to the greatest danger of undue exaltation from the extraneous admiration of all the single ladies in the place.

If a young lady thinks that a gentleman is married, and that he has a particularly sweet voice, it is not usual for her to mention the circumstance; but it is quite evident that some special law renders any reticence on the part of a young curate's wife or individual in question highly conducive to be a clergyman.

When Fred Stanhope was first appointed to St. Ethelred's he might very frequently be found at No. 8, Summouth-terrace, the residence of Mrs. Bexley and her daughter Emily.

Mrs. Bexley was the widow of a former incumbent, and was a great authority on all parish matters. When Fred was called suddenly to take the place of his uncle, who had been seized with illness a few months for the benefit of his health, he was very glad to find some one whom he could consult.

He had only been about a year in the Church, and had just taken priest's orders, when he exchanged the quiet of a Yorkshire curacy for the bustle of a London parish. Mrs. Bexley was a distant cousin of his father, and the only person he knew when he came up. But he soon found the assistance of Miss Emily even more useful than the advice of her mother. She prevented him from becoming too easily the prey of those doubtful female visitors whose services always acquired a nourishing diet and port wine. She warned him against delegating any authority for collecting subscriptions to Mrs. Screwthain, who was strongly suspected of being connected with the trade, and helped to pay every balance to the proper quarter. She sketched for him the characters of the school-teachers, pointing out those who required to be looked after pretty sharply and those who could be left without much interference. During the last three years of her father's lifetime, and during the two years Mr. Stanhope had been the incumbent of St. Ethelred's she had been constantly engaged in parish work.

Frederick Stanhope was a handsome and agreeable young man, and soon became very popular in the parish. There would be some difficulty in defining accurately the exact degree to which he belonged. Possibly he may have approached the type of the parson of former days, before the terms "High Church and Low Church, Broad Church and Dark Church" were known in Christian England. He was fond of good music, and took some interests in church architecture; therefore common report pronounced him "high." His earnest desire was to do his duty to the best of his ability—"to visit the widow and the fatherless in their affliction, and keep himself unspotted from the world." He was never at a loss for cheering words beside the bed of sickness or the bier of sorrow, but when to administer a timely reproof. He had nothing of the ascetic in his nature, and seldom exchanged a greeting without a smile upon his face. There were some who said that when he crossed the threshold he brought the sunshine with him.

Constant intercourse with such a man could scarcely be without its danger to a young lady of two-and-twenty, whose heart as yet had remained scathless. When Emily found that her advice was now seldom sought, and that Stanhope's visits to Summouth-terrace were becoming "few and far between," she could not refrain from remonstrances of a pang. Those hours spent in doing good together had been so happy; it had been such a delight to be consulted by one who was so anxious to do what was right and so ready to follow when right be sought; and she had recognised the power of the mind she had been allowed to sway—the nobility which is never ashamed to learn or to acknowledge its obligations to its instructors. And now she only saw him perhaps once a week, and then for a few minutes.

Amongst other houses at which Frederick visited was that of Mr. Symonds, a plain banker. Mr. Symonds was a widower, and rejoiced in the possession of five blooming girls, who were Christian Annesley, Angelina, Clementina, Georgina, and Rosetta Symonds. Owing to their papa's views on those points these young ladies were not able to get nearly so much dancing as they would have liked, and they were never allowed to go to the Opera. Now, young ladies, like young gentlemen, usually remain aware a certain number of hours. If they go to bed at it is probable that they will remain aware for the same number by two in the afternoon; but if they seek their couch at ten at night they may be found stirring as early as eight the next day. While they are up they must be employed. Berlin wool, knitting, and crochet, from the little square books of algebraic instructions on these matters, will only account for a certain number of hours. The time must be filled up. Debarred from evening amusements under paternal pressure, the Demoiselles Symonds betook themselves to district-visiting. And they got through it very well; as gay, graceful, good-tempered, kind-hearted, sensible English girls do with most things which they undertake, even without any special qualifications for success. It is possible that the advent of a handsome and agreeable curate gave an impetus to their efforts in this direction.

It is certain that in his ministry Stanhope found himself brought into contact with one or other of the blooming sisters at every turn. If he had once been inclined to seek Emily Bexley's advice a little oftener than was absolutely necessary, the Misses Symonds nobly avenged her cause. Like the disturbers of the clerks in the Circumvention Office, they were always "wanting to know." Georgina and Rosetta had not yet been confirmed, and the anxiety of their elder sisters that they should be fully prepared was really beautiful.

There is a dangerous fascination about that process of elevation to a pedestal—dangerous for the general in the acclamations of his men; dangerous for the hero in the cheers of the crowd; dangerous for the cricketer in the applause of the ground;—yet there are only the flatteries that rough men can offer. What shall we say of the peril when the soft, sweet voice of woman doubly gilds the nectar of the net?

It was early in the autumn when Frederick came to St. Ethelred's, and now Christmas was drawing nigh. For years past a great deal of trouble had been taken in the decoration of St. Ethelred's for Christmas by Mrs Alvanley, a widow lady, who occupied a leading position in the parish The beautiful old church had been made an object of general interest in the neighbourhood on those occasions. Mrs. Alvanley had died during the last summer, and Frederick was very anxious that there should be no falling off in the decorations during his ministry.

The Misses Symonds had offered their services one afternoon when Stanhope called on a visit about the matter, and had then discussing the subject in family conclave.

"Do you know, Emily," said Adelina, "we think it will be such an improvement this year? Mr. Stanhope is going to get some flowers to mix with the laurel and the holly."

"Mr. Raynham has promised some of his dear camellias. Won't it be jolly?" Georgina exclaimed Rosetta.

"For shame, Rose! What words you use. I cannot imagine where you learn them," reproved Clementina.

"You don't, do you?" replied Rose. "I heard you say it yourself, and tell Angy that Captain Annesley was a brick, which is much worse."

Miss Clementina deigned no answer to this sally, but only threw up her hands in horror at the young rebellion.

"You know those dueling-striped camellias?" said Georgina.

"I think it is a pity you are going to use any flowers," said Emily. "The church looks very beautiful when decorated with only the simple evergreens, you know, and so many people have such an objection to flowers."

"What difference can there be between flowers and leaves?" said Adelina. "They both belong to the vegetable kingdom."

At this juncture Frederick Stanhope was announced. When he had paid his respects to the young ladies he said, "Well, I think I have got a capital assistant for you to begin the decorations to-morrow. The laurels, and the holly, and the ivy, and the box and yew, are all come, Mr. Raynham won't have the flowers cut till to-morrow morning, that he may be fresher. So, young ladies, I shall lay you to superintend the decorations of the altar, and perhaps Miss Rosetta will help you. Miss Angelina, under your charge I must place the pillars and arches of the nave and aisles. Miss Clementina will be my aide; and to you, Miss Georgina, I intrust the organ, of which you are so fond." And here he paused.

The three young ladies all began to talk at once, and to request Frederick's opinion on their respective plans for performing the duties assigned to them.

Emily Bexley could not help thinking that Frederick might have asked her assistance—that a month before he never did anything without consulting her. She did an injustice, however. At that moment she would not have done so herself.

"For you, Miss Emily," Frederick resumed, "I have reserved an especial duty, if you will be so kind as to undertake it. When I was down here in the autumn I noticed a number of old books and, amongst all the decorations, I was especially struck by the font. On the cover was built a little mount of flowers, crowned by a cross composed entirely of white camellias."

"If you will undertake to ornament our font on similar principles I think we can spare you flowers enough."

Emily blushed. For a moment she was unable to reply.

Miss Rosetta burst out immediately, "Oh, it is no use for you to ask Emily: she has just been saying that it was wicked to put flowers in a church at all."

"I did not say that, Rosetta: I said that there were some people in the parish whom it might offend."

"Only the stupids," suggested Georgina.

"Then I am afraid I must not count upon your assistance, Miss Bexley?"

Emily bowed.

The Misses Symonds went out immediately, "Oh, it is no use for you to ask Emily: she has just been saying that it was wicked to put flowers in a church at all."

Emily bowed.

Of course I know there is no harm in the flowers themselves," she replied, "but I am sure there are a great many people in the parish who will think it wrong."

"But don't you think George was right in suggesting that they would be stupid for their pains; and, if the thing is right in itself, do you think it is worth while to pay any attention to silly scruples?"

"I think," replied Emily, "that a clergyman should always avoid doing anything which is unimportant in itself that would be likely to weaken his influence in his parish. He must of course be the sole arbiter in opportunities of doing good. He offends the prejudices of the weaker brethren. You must remember," she continued after a short pause, "that you look at these questions as a highly-educated man, with the breadth and liberality which are the result of extensive travel and even study. But there are very few of your parishioners who can appreciate your eclecticism. You were explaining to me the other day how impossible it was for you to combine the Gothic and Renaissance without compromise. Do you not think you ought to bear this in mind in such questions as the one we are now discussing? You know I could have no objection to yield a point where your duty was really involved, but surely it cannot be in such a matter as this."

Though reckoned a good debater at "The Union" in his undergraduate days, on this occasion Frederick Stanhope was found utterly unable to reply. He was scarcely sorry that another fifty yards brought them to Summouth-terrace.

"Well," he said, as they shook hands in parting, "I hope that you will not refuse to come and look at us, even though we must not count upon your assistance."

"If I can help you with the evergreens in hanging the church after the old fashion, I shall be very happy," she replied.

Fred could not help thinking that the laurels certainly belonged to the laity, but his pride did not permit him to say so. And so they parted.

The next morning the Demoiselles Symonds were stirring at an early hour. It was seldom that more than one of them appeared to superintend their father's breakfast. But, on this occasion, to his intense surprise, they were all down before him. He thought he must have made a mistake in the hour, and looked at his repeater in affright. But he was soon reassured when he heard the cause of the early appearance they had put in.

Immediately after breakfast they adjourned to St. Ethelred's, where Frederick joined them, and they set to work at once. Stanhope's office was no sinecure that morning. He had appointed himself aide-de-camp and orderly to the five sisters, and they found plenty for him to do. Whenever he was nasting one the other four called out, "Mr. Stanhope!" with almost unanimity. To get out of the fair five appeared to have the power of enchaining his attention thoroughly. His eyes were constantly turning to the vestry-door, the only means of access to the church except by the west door. At last they were gratified. About twelve o'clock Miss Bexley arrived. She made a progress round the church, and admired the work of each young lady in turn. At last she said to Frederick, who was standing a little apart,

"And where are the flowers?"

"Well, do you know," he replied, "after we parted yesterday I thought over all you had been saying to me? I believe I was thinking about it nearly all night, and I came to the conclusion that you were quite right. So I went off, the first thing this morning, to Mr. Raynham, and told him we should not want the flowers, and explained to him the reason, not as well as you would have done, though. He seemed disappointed at first, for he is very proud of his camellias, but he quite agreed with us after we had talked it over a little. He is a kind-hearted old fellow. He said he should consider the flower the property of the church all the same, and send them to Covent Garden to be sold, and give us the money to buy blankets for the old women."

To this Miss Emily made no reply. The fact was that a choking emotion in her throat rendered articulate speech impossible. She was eloquence with which she had lectured Fred on the previous evening.

Accordingly she occupied herself in assisting the young ladies in their decorations, and Frederick rendered her services more pleasant by they did not call out for her as loudly as they had shouted for Mr. Stanhope before her arrival.

As had the moment arrived when everybody seemed inclined to admit that lunch would form an appropriate interlude.

The Misses Symonds were very anxious that the whole party should lunch at their house. But Emily had proposed to return home and to take an early dinner with her mother, who was not very well; and Mr. Stanhope found it was absolutely necessary that he should return to his lodgings to finish some more cool and nails, of which they were beginning to run short.

Rose began to mutter audibly "that it was all bosh, for they could have sent 'Buttons,' but that he only wanted to walk home with Emily Bexley, who was going that big-eyed sap to go by herself," when she was with great difficulty hustled into propriety by the crinoline of her elder sister.

There is a reason to fear that Rose's criticism, although severe, was nevertheless just, for the reverend gentleman did walk home with Miss Bexley, and when he returned, more than two hours afterwards, he had forgotten all about the nails and the nails.

When they had gone a little way together, Emily had mustered up sufficient courage to express the approval she had been unable to utter in the church.

"I am so glad," she said, "about the flowers."

"And I am doubly glad," he replied, "because it is right, and because it has given you pleasure."

It has been mentioned that there was a second reason which had caused Fred's visits to Summouth-terrace to become less frequent; besides the fact that he was afraid of his acquaintance being overused. He felt that he was beginning to like Emily Bexley too well. He was forced to admit to himself that it was possible his feelings might be reciprocated. It is a common thing for young gentlemen to form magnanimous resolutions upon these points when it is just a little too late.

Adolphus, lounging in his easy-chair, and staring fixedly at the lighted end of his cigar, conscientiously soliloquises thus:—

"Now, this won't do, young man; you know you have not got even the three hundred a year which the economical Times correspondent has selected as the minimum for a single man. You can't ask Lucy to come and share this doghole." And he flings the end of his cigar at the hole in the ceiling. "You must cut Dashdash-square, or young Fiend, for the sake of us both. That's what you must do."

And, perhaps, he ceases to haunt that locality.

All very well, my Adolphus; admirably reasoned-out result! nobly-fulfilled resolution! But what is to be done if, at the close of these weeks before? before that half hour in the conservatory at Lady Longcrot's ball, when Lucy forgot all about the partners to whom she was engaged for the following dances, when your hand found her fair curls might have been plaited into one tress, so close they drooped together? before that picnic when you took such care of her during the return home—you were afraid she would catch cold? For shame

So it was too late when Mr Frederick Stanhope decided that he had better discontinue his visits at Mrs. Bexley's, No. 8, Summouth-terrace.

There are one or two little things which put resolutions of this kind to a very severe test. Amongst these we may mention a little trembling of the hand, a sudden flush of the faintest colour in the eye, during an accidental meeting. If, in addition to this, circumstances have rendered it necessary for her to take the arm of the gentleman, and the little frame should tremble as well as the voice the conclusion of the will will be pretty nearly complete.

The last sentence which Frederick spoke had the immediate effect of placing him beneath the guns of the battery which has just been described. Adolphus finally all his ideas seemed to totter; as, like the dissolving view which brightens imperceptibly from winter into summer. The capabilities of two hundred and fifty pounds a year expanded without a limit. It is a well-known fact that there are many women who would prefer sharing every hardship with the man they loved to living haunted by the remembrance of a rosy dream without a chance of its realisation. A sudden impulse urged him to try whether Emily was not one of these.

"After all, do you know," he said, "it is curious that you should object to flowers under such circumstances, they seem to belong to you so much. I have been thinking that, of all those I have ever seen, you would be best able to strew the path of life with flowers—so thinking, that is there would be neither sun nor rain for me. Dare I ask you to do this for me—to brighten my path by walking ever by my side?"

Five years of hard work in a London parish had given Emily Bexley some insight into the mysteries of human life. She had seen poverty and all the hardships it entails. Perhaps she may have seen, also, that happiness is not the exclusive possession of the rich. What answer did she make to the curate?

Lest the good reputation of our heroine should be compromised, we leave our fair readers to answer the question according to their own ideas of propriety.

HERBERT VAUGHAN.

CHARADES FOR CHRISTMAS.

No. 1.

THE taper was burning a lurid blue,
The logs on the hearth had ceased to flame;
And Fancy quick on the dream-wings flew
To the old, old scene, and her tales of shame!
The ghastly figures loom'd grandly there,
The lattice creak'd in the winter blast;
Oh, how I sigh'd for the morning fair!
Oh, how I pray'd that the night was past!
I long'd, yet I fear'd, to know the worst,
And with trembling awe we looked round — my First.

I had heard the tale by the Christmas fire
In the brave sweet days when I was young;
I knew how the fiend had tempted the squire;
I knew the pool where the corse was flung!
So young and so pure! Ah, the raven curls!
Ah, the snowy brow! Ah, the deep dark eyes!
Oh me, how my brain with the fancy swirls;
How my heart beats quick with a dread surprise!
And I shrink as if a ghost-hand beckon'd,
She comes, she comes! Can it be my Second?

Hark! A tap at the door on the silence falls;
And the casement rattles; the cold winds shriek.
Whose voice is it now on Sir Walter calls?
Does the murder'd one her mercy seek?
"To the mouted grange," I cry, "Begone!
Nor make me still your pitiless mock!"
But the voice is pitched in a louder tone—
"Hot water, Sir; and it's seven o'clock!"
So I woke, I know, with a cheerful soul;
And a fitting backdesk rewarded my Whole.

No. 2.

What every hungry patriot needs
When loudest, longest in his cry—
"This heart for my poor country bleeds!
In me behold her saviour! Try!"
What bears aloft the magic wires,
To speed through air his weighty behest;
Whose gallant soldier ne'er retires,
Though gleaming blades are at his breast;
That is my First; when yours is gain'd,
Never neglect the good attain'd.

What every one pretends to be;
What mannikins and pigmies hate;
For what the poet anxiously
Through years of wistful hope must wait;
No "thing of shreds and patches," ne'er
By dext'rous tailor deftly made.
But quick all good to bravely dare,
Of all that's evil e'er afraid;—
Still its bright course the world runs round,
But seldom is my Second found.

My Whole in toiling, busy streets—
In every cottage-dotted lane—
Love-errands day by day repeats,
Or bitter warnings bears again.
How dreaded oft! With joyous eye
Long-parted friends his coming wait,
While others heave the choking sigh,
And feel he is their certain fate.
But, fear'd or shunn'd, he hastens still
To do the work of—Rowland Hill!

No. 3.

Oh, merrily the music throbs from every golden string,
And whirling swift, the dancers move and trip it to and fro;
And surely ne'er before had Time so very swift a wing
As now, when Love's young eyes are bright, and Beauty's roses glow!
And she is there. Ah, lovely fair! my First, why still remain,
When thousands sigh, and vow they'd die "one smile from thee" to gain?

The wigwams cluster in the shade of many a forest tree,
And blithely there the red men dart their all-unerring spears:
They hunt the bison o'er the plain, the hart upon the lea,
And still above the rest his plume my Second proudly rears.
So ruled his sire, a heart of fire, deep in that forest lone—
The spear his Regal rod, a knoll of blossom'd turf his throne.

But lo! my Second o'er the sea speeds to fair England's strand,
And there my First is wood and woo—a bright but daring bride;
They seek the leafy forest depths, the red man's ancient land,
And wander through the woodlands dim and o'er the prairies wide.
But, sooth to tell, it is not well such bridals e'er should be—
When pale-faced First my Second weds my Whole you soon will see.

No. 4.

In the merry greenwood, the greenwood free,
Oh, the golden sun glows brightest there!
And the leaflet dances upon the tree,
And the brooklet laughs in its wooded lair.
In the merry greenwood, the greenwood free,
The joyous enough when night-clouds rise;
When the quick drops patter so cheerilie,
And my First descends from the bounteous skies.
Oh, the greenwood free!

In the merry greenwood, the greenwood free,
As long as pines have leave to sing,
Shall Marian raise her song of glee,
Shall bold Robin Hood be the forest king.
In the merry greenwood, the greenwood free,
Shall my Second of stalwart yew be made,
And stout arms bend it lustilie
At the archer's pride of the blossomy glade,
O, the greenwood free!

In the merry greenwood, the greenwood free,
The sweet summer light will pass away,
And the glory lapse from each groaning tree,
And the night-clouds fold o'er the dying day.
In the merry greenwood, the greenwood free,
The skies shall threaten, the rain shall fall;
But again shall hope rise cheerilie,
And my Whole in its promise shall smile on all.
O, the greenwood free!

No. 5.

"Daughter of mine, I'm bound for a ride—
Bound for a ride to Nottingham town;
There's a vagrant out to be tried, to be tried—
Oh, I would not fail to be there for a crown!
Nay, not for a mark would I fail to be there,
For law must rule and justice be done;
So I leave thee at home, my daughter fair,
That the cows may be milk'd and the wool be spun.
But look thou well that thou dost not know
Thyself nt the glaring casement-pane,
Or saucy Sir Hugh will be up, I trow,
To some of his malapert tricks again!"
Then the creaking stairs he stumbled down,
And he mounted my First, a roadster brown,
And off he rode to Nottingham town.

Bold Sir Hugh saw the old man ride
Away on my First to Nottingham town;
And his heart best quick, with a throb of pride,
And he laughed a laugh and he frown'd a frown:
"Eleanor loves me well," said he,
"And why should the miser cross our love?
Eleanor's smile is sweet to see;
Eleanor's eyes are the eyes of a dove!"
Oh, love, I trow, is swift to ride!
She's there, at the glaring casement-pane,
And bold Sir Hugh is by her side,
At some of his malapert tricks again;
For he begs my Second, of sunny brown,
From the rich, rare curls, her bonny's crown,
While the miser is off to Nottingham town.

There is no one near at the casement-pane,
And Sir Hugh is away on his mettled rear;
He spurs him fast o'er valley and plain,
For bold Sir Hugh does not ride alone;
"Wilt thou ever be true?" sweet Eleanor sighs;
"Can I ever be false?" says the brave Sir Hugh,
And so deep is the love in his earnest eyes,
She feels that, indeed, he will ever be true.
Now, the miser returned to his home; and—he swore!
Oh Mary, his wrath was fearful to see!
"Had the Whole been fast on the chamber door,
This evil had never befallen me!
But there's no help to be had," he said, with a frown,
As the creaking stairs he tumbled down,
And he rode again to Nottingham town!

No. 6.

The soldier woke from his long deep sleep
At the sound of the bugle's call;
His mates were alive by the little low pump;
At the gate was the sentry tall:
The sun-flash danced through the barrack-yard,
As the scouring of barrel and blade;
And rank and file were at it hard
Preparing for parade.

If our friend had awoke ere the bugle blew
It might have been better for him,
As soon, from the sulky looks, he knew
Of the corporal, gaunt and grim.
A martinet's look is sour at best,
And here it was far from the worst;
He was marched to the guardhouse under arrest
For too sparing a use of my First.

Ah! reckless wight! by his trimmings white
Thus out of trim, betrayed,
Yet his evil fate can be no excuse
For foe of himself that he made,
To save my First, in whose use he failed,
It costs a compound word,
And the form in which his wrath prevailed
Is something quite absurd.

He wished that the corporal's mess that day
Were a dinner of that First,
With the tankard dry, and the canteen closed
Against such a banquet's thirst.
He cursed my First in its double term,
And he cursed the ground that bore it,
And, whate'er to my First belonged, he poured
A malediction o'er it.

But when, his ire in part subdued,
In the guardhouse he reclined,
Can you guess the course our friend pursued
For the easing of his mind?
He took the double term he'd damned,
And he turned it upside down,
And the thing that then is named was a spell
To bear his curses down.

He paid himself with the name reversed
For what the name had cost,
And so, through my Second, his soul regained
The peace through my First it lost.
And my Second he blessed in its double term,
And he blessed the ground that bore it,
And, whate'er to my Second belonged, he poured
A soldier's blessing o'er it.

No. 7.

More logs on the hearth, more wine in the bowl,—
Let Christmas be here in each heart—in each soul!
Here's a puzzle to twit ye; come, riddle me ree,
When best should "a scholard" discern letter G?
Says Lily, her eyes with sweet mirth brimming bright,
"Why truly, good sir, when the G is in sight!"
Oh, mischievous beauty, your First does you credit;
What a smile on those rose-budding lips as you said it!

So the jest and the song flow around as unbidden,
While Florence sits there, in the night shadows hidden.
My Second is still on her lap, but unheeded,—
Slowly knitting and knitting are not always needed!
Her dreams roam afar, and a passionate feeling
Of bitter despair to her soul is revealing
The depth of her madness for Alec, the deceiver,
Who won her young heart, and could cruelly leave her!

She knows not, she heeds not, that Walter sits near,
His heart all a tumble with tenderest fear;
Her dreams roam afar, and for Alec—not a thought!
Ah, me! in what blindness our passions are wrought!
Love may think it can read the Beloved One's soul!
Poor love, poor vain boaster, it is but my Whole;
As now when young Walter (ah! pity his madness!)
Believes that for him is sweet Alice's sadness.

No. 8.

All things that be have a being good,
And yet, as a thing accursed,
The heart of man, in its human mood,
Still shrinks from my creature First;
For he finds my First in the rose's breast,
When it pines on its stem away,
And it makes of the lips he loves the best
A horror and a prey.

He may light on my First at the elm-tree's roots,
As he sits in my Second's shade,
With a heart all tuned to the winged flutes
That are piping overhead;
But it hath to my First an elm in a sadder sense,
Mid a silence far away,
Where the shadows are not, like my Second's, green,
And my first is at fouler play.

Yet times there are, for the burning heart,
When my Second has no shade—
When man little reeks of the loathliest part
My First has ever played;
For the heavy sleep in the hewn-down tree
In the thirst of the weary soul,
That has known how the drink of the heart may be More bitter than my Whole.

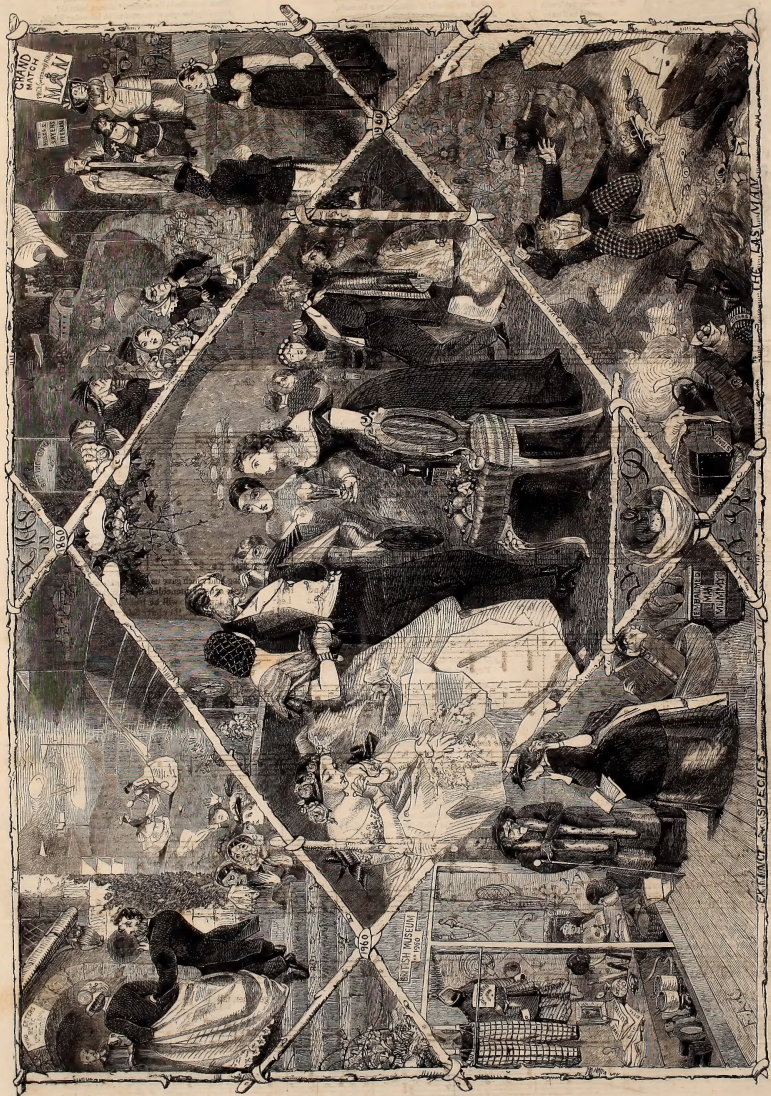
No. 9.

A maiden sat, in the shadow of trees,
In the shadow of hour, ancestral trees;
In the shadow of hour, ancestral trees;
There rippled beneath, with a tuneless quaint,
And a song, like young love's whisperings faint,
An elfin stream, 'mid the purple bowers,
All rich with its freight of floating flowers!
While the maiden sang, alone, alone,
As a bud from its stalk was rudely blown,
"Oh, love is the joy of life's bright dream;
Bring the blossom to me, thou happy stream!"
She sang—my First!

On rippled the stream in the shadow of trees,
In the shadow of hour, ancestral trees;
And it bore away on remorseless wave
To some distant isle, some haunted cave,
The struggling blossom for which she sighed;
Ah! why should the blossom from beauty glide?
Then she wreathed my Second with ivy green,
And she sang with a mournful voice, I ween,
"Oh, love is the cloud in life's sad dream;
Bear the blossom away, thou changeful stream!"
As she decked—my Second!



On rippled the stream in the shadow of trees,
In the shadow of grey, ancestral trees;
When sudden the sunlight kept from the sky,
Like the happy glow of a lovelit eye;
And it shone on the leaf and it dimpled the wave,
And flash'd its warm glance to the innermost cave!
Then carroll'd the maiden, in joyousest tone,
As full on her bosom the splendour shone,
"Thou love be a falsehood, life a dream,
Yet the sunshine will fall on the heart of my First!"
So sang—my Whole!

No. 10.

I call on the early dead!
And my own heart's heavy sigh,
Wherever that prayer of the heart is said,
Is the sad and sole reply.
Yet, out of the sigh a hope is hurst,
And that hope has a symbol—which is my First.

I pace the ship on a tossing wave,
With a foaming, angry sea;
Beneath its keel lies a yawning grave,
And breakers are on the lee.
Yet there, toward the rock, my heart is beckoned,
And that rock has a name—which is my Second.

I tore on the waves of the inner world,
Where we strike on sunken woe,
And the gear of the heart is reefed and furled
In every storm that blows.
I hear the song which the sirens sing
When the beam is at play with the breeze,
And I sit in the dusk, my woe to wring,
When the heart ships heavy seas.
Then, I take THE WORD, like a shipwrecked soul,
And the weary spirit hath found my Whole.

Already nearly £1000 has been raised for this object in Liverpool.

The new Hillsea lines for the defence of Portsmouth, its harbour, dockyard, and arsenals, from the attack of an enemy landward, have made considerable progress during the past summer, and the completion of the inner line of works is now the chief object of attention. Upwards of 1800 men are employed at this time employed in their construction, 600 in laying material, and 1200 in preparing it.

EARLY HOME OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, ELIZABETH TOWN, KENTUCKY.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY S. ALSCHULER, CHICAGO.

The father of Abraham Lincoln was thrown upon his own resources while yet a child. Travelling from place to place, working wherever he could find employment, he grew up literally without education. He finally settled in Hardin County, Kentucky, where, in 1806, he was married to Nancy Hanks. The fruits of this union were a daughter and two sons. One of the latter died in infancy; the daughter died later in life. Abraham Lincoln was born February 12, 1809. It would be difficult to conceive of more unpromising circumstances than those under which he was ushered into life. His parents were poor and uneducated. They were under the social ban which slavery always entails upon poverty; and their habitation was in harmony with their surroundings. We are indebted to Mr. Alschuler for the early home of the President Elect of the United States.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

GUANO.—The eminent agricultural chemist, Berzelius, has just laid before the French Academy of Sciences a portion of a memoir on the position and qualities of guano in the isles and coasts of the Pacific Ocean. In conclusion he states that the present great commercial advantages derived from the diffusion of fossil fertilising matters is due to the researches of the English geologist Buckland, and to the analyses of the French chemist Berthier. Guano is now procured from the isles of the Pacific Ocean, the Carribean Sea, and the Gulf of Mexico, and from the coasts of Africa and Australia.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY.—A new part of the Philosophical Transactions has been issued lately. It includes papers of mathematical powers by Messrs. Donkin, of Oxford, and by Messrs. A. Cayley and W. Spottiswoode; three papers on metallic alloys, considered in respect to their electric conducting power and specific gravity, by Dr. J. Matthiessen; a paper on the theory of sound, by Prof. S. Earnshaw; and a paper on the rain of the Dry evaporation, by Drs. Warren Delarue and H. Müller. Of some of the above papers we shall give a separate notice.

THE IRONSTONE DISTRICTS OF CLEVELAND form the subject of a remarkable geological memoir just published by Mr. James Bowkir. Its accompaniments are four distinct sections of sections and a large map. The vast importance of the Cleveland ironfield, which has since fulfilled to an extent a very great portion of the iron trade of the kingdom, has impelled Mr. Bewick to the valuable report, which will doubtless be fully appreciated by those interested in the subject. Some observations on fossiliferous sandstone are appended to the treatise.

OZONE.—Dr. T. Andrews, and Mr. P. Tait, of Belfast, have published in the new part of the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society, an account of their continued researches on ozone (the substance discovered by Schönbein, formed at the poles of the electric spark on oxygen gas), especially as to its volumetric estimation, by which is provided an account of the effect of the action of the electric discharge on oxygen, nitrogen, cyanogen, and other gaseous substances.

THE GEOLOGY OF BOLIVIA, &C.—A paper on this subject by Mr. D. Forbes was read lately at a meeting of the Geological Society. The great Bolivian plateau, which is bounded on the east and west by the Andes themself first above the level of the sea, consists of great gravel plains composed of mud, sand, and boulders, with volcanic rocks and fossil remains, including an accumulation of clays, gravel, shingle, and boulders immense at some places, many hundred feet thick. Above 16,000 feet these gravel beds are found at a height of 14,000 feet. Stanton rocks (perhaps 15,000 feet thick) are well developed in the Andes, from 20,000 to 30,000 feet. A chain of mountain country including the highest mountains of South America, and having a height of 20,000 feet, extends from the Peruvian coast towards Lima. Specimens of the rocks and fossils collected by Messrs. Hawkshaw and Bowman were made by Professor Huxley and Mr. J. Salt on some Bolivian beetle brought over by Mr. Bowman.

THEORY OF COLOURS.—In the new part of the Philosophical Transactions is a paper by Professor J. Clerk Maxwell, of King's College, on the theory of compound colours, and on the perception of colours by the eye-sense. The professor gives, first, a history of the theory, with especial reference to the researches of Young and Helmholtz, and then proceeds to his own theory, which is expressed by some simple rules, by reduction of observations. He gives as the results the following among other general conclusions:—The three primary colours by the spectrum are, red, green, and blue; a mixture of these, colours chromatically identical with the other colours of the spectrum may be obtained—the orange and yellow will contain a mixture of red and green, which seems to put an end to the portension of yellow to be considered a primary colour. The extreme ends of the spectrum (very feeble) are probably equal to mixtures of red and blue.

GEOGRAPHY OF GREECE.—M. Peytier has sent to the French Academy a memoir on the geography of the ancient and modern which have been taken, at the instance of the French Government, for the preparation of a new edition of the Atlas. The measurements were made by the officials of the French Army during its occupation of the country.

PHOTOGRAPHY AND PHOTOGRAPHERS.—At the last monthly meeting of the members of the Royal Institution Professor Faraday exhibited photographic pictures of remarkable beauty, which he procured from Mr. J. J. Sedgfield. He reminded the members present of experiments they had seen in that theatre showing that certain bodies, as, for instance, iodide of silver, were much more light when they are exposed to the most refrangible rays of the spectrum, and were also sharpened more than the white or colourless by look at under ordinary circumstances; but it had occurred to Dr. Gladstone that on account of their property of absorbing the rays they would be rendered less rapid perhaps not produce so great a photographic effect as other white substances. He had, therefore, many various substances in question, excellent fresh horse-chestnut bark, concentrate of potash, and other fluorescent substances on white paper, and had then exposed them to the photographic agent. The device all came out dark, as was seen in the specimen exhibited; and, more than that, on exposing the coloured sheet with coloured paper and letters cut out of white paper and stored in the fluorescent solutions above mentioned. When this sheet was withdrawn and placed on blue paper was found a much greater chemical effect than the white letters, which, therefore, appeared in the positive photograph dark on a light ground.

PRIZE-TAKERS AT THE SMITHFIELD SHOW.

The Hereford men who were so deservedly jubilant last year over the gold-medal ox of Mr. Shirley Hereford, and the gold breed steer, in the ox and steer classes, gained a victory in a quarter where they least expected it, when Mr. Cumberbatch's Hereford heifer was led in Bridé by beating Colonel Pennant's Birmingham prize-medal cow, in the gold-medal contest for cows and heifers. Mr. Bridé's victoria on this occasion is called Lady Ash, and is by Sibdon from Lady Ash 2nd. She was bred by her owner at Golding Hall, Shrewsbury, and has had two calves—Sibdon 3rd, by Sir Watkin, and Sibdon 4th, by Mr. Cox. Simpson's food, turnips, and hay have been the principal elements of her success. Mr. Cumberbatch's Lady Ash 2nd, by Sibdon, and dam Lady Ash 1st, was bred by her owner at Golding Hall, Shrewsbury, and has had two calves—Sibdon 3rd, by Sir Watkin, and Sibdon 4th, by Mr. Cox.

Simpson's food, turnips, and hay have been the principal elements of her success. Mr. Cumberbatch's Lady Ash 2nd, by Sibdon, and dam Lady Ash 1st, was bred by her owner at Golding Hall, Shrewsbury, and has had two calves—Sibdon 3rd, by Sir Watkin, and Sibdon 4th, by Mr. Cox.

The field she had to meet for the gold medal, excluding Mr. Morgridge's Devon heifer, was also remarkably weak. Mr. Baker's (of Cot corner) gold-medal heifer, Lady Ash, by Sibdon from Lady Ash, by Sibdon-the-Hill, and the grazing farms round Oakham have long been celebrated for the production of Shorthorns, and the present heifer is likely to uphold their former outdoings' by fairly distancing the Birmingham shorthorn by twenty-three points. The second prize, £5 5s., was awarded to the Earl of Gainsborough and his agent, both were by Snowdon, with three years and eight months old bull, and had been fed on "cake, bean and barley meal, hay, turnips, and carrots" when the Scotch polled breeds, Mr. M'Combie's (of Tilly Tour, Aberdeen) ox wall kept up his character for Scotch fattening, and was a rather remarkable that no other Scotch breeder exhibited in this class, but left this honour to the Englishmen. Mr. Kerr's ox is a fine one with their capital champion. The lengthened cow of Mr. J. H. Burkey had no competitors, and was left to walk over for the prize. Lovers of the Midland counties, Longhorns is as rare as a rhinoceros. The present prizetaker came from Mr. Chase, near Kenilworth, which, out of honour to the cow of Guy Earl of Warwick sometime resided the breed in its highest perfection.

The Queen's cow, which our Artist has selected is the property of Mr. Joseph Craddock, of Eastington, near Northleach. This longwooded sort was exhibited successfully as the "improved Cotswold," and five competitors included one longwool from Hereford, a "true Cotswold," from the farm of Mr. Harris, of Lower Lasborough, near Tetbury, whose writers won the gold medal at this place last year, and an "improved Leicester" from Burley-on-the-Hill, which Mr. Robert Smith first made famous by his success at the Royal. Mr. Kerr's ox has doubtdown webbed did the fullest justice to the blood which his Grace reared with no small care, prodigue no prize to Mr. Jonas Webb for the hire of his tups. His Grace looked forward to this competition with his friend Mr. Rigden as the great turning-point of his sheep year. His last essay was his most unfortunate one, as he was not only beaten in the first wether class by Mr. Rigden, but he could not even try for the second, in consequence of his sheep being above the stipulated 200lb. This year no sheep came from Goodwood; but Mr. Kent, his Grace's old trainer, who has been settled in a farm on the estate, lately confronted Mr. Rigden and beat him in this class. Both first and second pens were very good, but the former more attracted to have been set to the shoulders—a point on which these sheep have always been rather deficient in Sussex.

Extra Stock, No. 209.—Mr. Craddock's Improved Cotswold.
Class 19, No. 105.—Mr. Burbury's Longhorned Cow.
Class 10, No. 74.—Mr. Baker's Shorthorned Ox.
Class 38, No. 231.—Mr. Kent's Southdown.

LITERATURE.

ILLUSTRATED BOOKS.

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. A new Edition, with Memoir and Notes, by GEORGE OFFOR. Illustrated by J. D. WATSON. Routledge.

It happens that beside this gorgeous edition of the famous allegory of John Bunyan there lies on our table a copy of the work published in 1778, which was "printed for R. Ortel, stationer, in Paternoster-street; and J. W. Piercy, printer and bookseller, in Coventry." This, too, contains a series of illustrations, of which it can only be said that if the subject-matter of the book was intended to be "realised" no better assistance towards the attainment of that end could have been devised than the engravings which it contains. Contrasting this quaint old volume with the last issue of "The Pilgrim's Progress," and a century having intervened between the two editions—one cannot but see a remarkable testimony to the intrinsic value of the book. At this day there is not found an enthusiastic artist to engrave for the splendid prose poem of Bunyan, and an artist who, catching the very spirit of the time in which it was produced, has given us pictures of the men and women created by the author, who have really made us have appeared to the mind's eye at the age in which he lived. The personages of the book, as they appear in Mr. Watson's pictures, are clothed in the garb of the period at which Bunyan wrote, and in the characteristics of each have been portrayed with singular point and effect. Witness, for instance, the portraits—that is the best word we can find for them—of Mr. Worldly Wiseman, Lady Feigning's daughter, Atheist, and Formalist; while Greatheart, as he appears in Mr. Watson's ideal, is the very type of a Puritan soldier; nor are the less romantic portions of the illustrations less to be commended; they are full of purpose, and bear with them the exact image of the text. Several of them we have transferred to our pages for our readers' benefit. The first is the representation of Christian as he appears, knocking at the gate, in that earlier part of his pilgrimage whence the Interpreter takes him to see strange, if not terrible, sights. Another where Christian, having long assumed his suit of armour, in company with Hopeful, passes by the side which leads to the Valley of the Shadow, and is taken them out of the way, for a space, of the road which leads to the Celestial City. The third is that in which the despondency of the hopeful, offering, by the children inhabitants of the realms of the Celestial King, "who would go into the King's gardens, and gather sweetness for the Lord there, and bring them to him with their own collection."

Of course, the pictorial character of the edition of "The Pilgrim's Progress" is looked upon as the chief claim to attention. But less has been executed by one who has a thorough understanding of the literature of the time, and is equally imbued with the spirit which then began to prevail. For the rest, the skill of the printer, paper-maker, binder, and decorator has been lavishly brought into play to render the accessories of the volume as beautiful as its text is valuable and interesting.

POETS' WIT AND HUMOUR. Selected by W. H. WILLS. Illustrated with 100 Engravings from Drawings by Charles Bennett and George H. Thomas. Bell and Daldy.

Rich in purple, gold, and morocco leather, we have here a volume with regard to which we can only regret we were not its compiler. It cannot address itself to the widest circle of purchasers. It contains some eighty or ninety poems, all of the humorous vein, beginning with "Adam Bell, Clym of the Clough, and William of Cloudesley," and ranging through Thomas Wyatt, Davenant, Suckling, Milton, Cowley, Butler, Marvell, D'Urfey, Gay, Prior, Rowe, Swift, Parnell, Fielding, Goldsmith, Mason, Lloyd, Finder, Canning, Southey, Lamb, Hood, Sidney Smith, Barham, Macaulay, and including, amongst many others, such men of our time as Thackeray, Lover, and Lennon. A great number of the poems are old familiar friends, others are not so easy of remembrance; and it will be a pity for us to some of us to find Dr. Johnson and Lord Macaulay, as well as grave, solid John Milton, appearing here in the comic vein. There is nothing incongruously associated with the text in the great lexicographer's verse in the lines, entitled "Thirty-five," Lord Macaulay's contribution is "The Lowestoft Boat," and Tyler, a don connected with the election for Cambridge University at the time of the agitation for Catholic Emancipation, is the author of one or two translations. There is one from Fontaine, another from Francesco Redi, and others from Frederick Reynolds, Dr. Wolcot, and Charles Lamb. But the great feature of the publication is a version of "Villikins and his Dinah," rendered into French by L. W. Deanges, a stanza or so of which we are tempted to extract, as follows:—

Sir Wilkins se promenait du matin au soir,
Sans voir à sa fenêtre la Dinah assez noir;
Près d'elle git une coupe de poison tout frais
Et un lettre qui dit qu'elle est morte avec Villikin, je crois, Chantant tout ici noir, ah.

Chtour de demoiselles meurtes pour l'amour—chour encore chtour—
Tuna lul lorna, &c.

De mille baisers il couvre la endroit chers.
Attend, sir-ah,* Dinah, ses yeux sont morts!
Il boit le poison, son âme part au galop,
Et Villikin et Dinah n'occupent plus le tombeau.
Tous les deux chantant en chœur un chœur en chantant,
Tuna lul lorna, &c.

Altogether, the range of this selection is very extended, and the taste and humour which have guided it are everywhere apparent. The illustrations are by perfect keepers of the intention of the book. They are all admirably conceived and as admirably executed. We have reproduced on our pages a sketch illustrating the passage in John Philip's poem of "The Splendid Shilling," which runs thus:—

Blest, whom gripping penury surrounds,
And hunger, sure attendant on the Muse,
With sweaty offals and small acid tiff
(Wretched repast!) my scanty pittance wants.
Then solitary walk, or doze at home
In garret vile, and with a warm cloak muffled
Regale chilled fingers, or from tree or stack
Or cricket-chimney pick the well-dried logs
Exhale mandrages, life-preserving stench!

THE BOY'S BOOK OF BALLADS. Illustrated with Sixteen Engravings from Drawings by JOHN GILBERT. Routledge.

It is to be hoped that certain satirical essays on the peculiarly unpoetic nature of the boyhood of the present day which have appeared recently in a well-known periodical are exaggerations. If they be taken in this case, we do not see any chance of the success of this little volume. To that class of our youth, which delights in the stories of Robin Hood, Valentine and Orson, and the like, the book is addressed, and we trust it will meet with the acceptation it deserves. There we welcome, among others, the famous ballad-story of "Adam Bell," "Clym of the Clough," and "William of Cloudesley," which we are here glad to meet with once more, was deemed by us one of the most thrilling romances of its school. Its resurrection now proves that this feeling is not unshared by those to whose care the present selection was committed. The first poem in the series attracts at once, for it is that famous one of "Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne." Then we welcome, among others, "Chevy Chace," "Robin Hood and the Curtal Friar," "The King and the Miller of Mansfield," and so on. Nothing remains to us, however, to the right doleful story of the "Brave Lord Willoughby," who fought that famous battle in Flanders on (uncertain) 15th of July, and whose cry of—

Stand to it, noble pikemen,
And look you well your ground;
And when you right, you horsemen,
And we will harp them out:
You musket and caliver* men
Do pepper gross them all.
I'll be the foremost man in fight,
Says brave Lord Willoughby.

* A kind of gun, has been quoted more than once by Scott. We confess to not having been previously acquainted with the tale of "Sir Andrew Barton;" but we can say of it that it is capital—in accordance with the rest of the collection, which is specially good in every respect. Of the romantic characteristics of the Gilbert-Illustrations it of course unnecessary to say a word, except that we think we see particular marks of care and finish in the details of each picture. The engraver's work is worthy of the illustrations, one which pertains to the ballad of "Robin Hood and the Curtal Friar," and the gist of which is to be found in the following lines:—

The friar took Robin Hood on his back,
Deep water he did ascend,
And spake unto himself also
Till he came to the other side.

Lightly leapt Robin Hood out of the friar's back;
The friar said to him again,
"Carry me over, I say, or else follow,
Or it shall breed thee pain."

JUVENILE BOOKS.

From year to year there is to be observed a marked attention on the part of publishers to a department of literature the importance of which was recognised almost from the period in which it was emphatically stated that the "schoolmaster was abroad;" and when the man who uttered those words had placed himself at the head of a movement for the education of the people, there was no fear of over-enlarging its sphere to an extent which perhaps the most sanguine of its originators did not venture to contemplate. In that section of their business which is specially devoted to the young no pains or book-writing which addresses itself to the young no pains have been spared to render the works issued attractive in every sense of the term. A class of authors devoting themselves to this duty has arisen, and their province is often subdivided with a nice discrimination of the requirements of the various grades of the pupils for whom they peculiarly cater. Nor is this duty to address themselves to children of larger growth. Everything which artistic skill and decorative taste can contribute to the accessories of juvenile books has been lavishly bestowed upon them, and the result is rare, coloured cuts, and the flimsy paper covers of the olden time have given way to illustrations by artists of reputation, while the delicate craft of the wood-engraver, and the printer's page, has been the work of surpassing liberality. Of course, at this particular season the tree of knowledge is in full bearing; the crop is a plentiful and a goodly one; and it is not pleasing task to the critic to sit down to the pile of books which possibly can. We have already put before our readers a notice of many of the books for the young which are being issued just at this moment; and therefore a continuation of such a work would be wanting in one of its acknowledged features if it did not contain its proper quantum of juvenile literature.

The first book which we take from a somewhat large array before us is "Oberon's Horn; A Tale of the Civil Wars." By Mary Gillies. (Kent and Co.) The period of which it treats is the year 1651, the twelfth of the reign of Charles the Second. The main interest which is laid out far from the shirts of Winnaker Forest, where stood Oberon's Horn, a tree which is a branch of the ancient Forest of Carewee. The author, in describing the lives and adventures of the characters in the book, has taken the best models for her subject, given an admirable picture of the customs and manners of the time, and has endeavoured to be strictly accurate in every respect. Every minor detail is carefully worked out, and the result is a book for the juvenile, given an admirable picture of the customs and manners of the time, and has endeavoured to be strictly accurate in every respect. Every minor detail is carefully worked out, and the result is a book for the juvenile, given an admirable picture of the customs and manners of the time, and has endeavoured to be strictly accurate in every respect. Every minor detail is carefully worked out, and the result is a book for the juvenile mode of describing character in the book in which description of habits and manners is interwoven with the narrative, we might instance the opening chapter of "Waverley" in proof. For the rest, the book is a romance, without any of the objectionable features which some of the elders of families might object to reading aloud to the young, as in the productions of which is in keeping with its main characteristics. When it is added that it contains twenty-four illustrations by Birket Foster, the case in its favour may be said to be complete.—We next come upon "The Illustrated Boy's Own Treasury" (Ward and Lock). This is a volume "for summer days and winter nights, especially adapted for the encouragement, amusement, and recreation of youth, at school or at home." The contents are of the choicest and are varied as to fit this book for a family of children, beginning with, say, the wife grown boy who is beginning to find an interest in English history and descending by a dainsweeds scale to the little ones, who would be content with "Puss in Boots" and "Jack the Giant Killer." The first article is devoted to the "Boyhood of Bertrand du Guesclin," that famous Breton knight who was known as the ugliest man in France, and who, by all nations, Christian and Saracen; but who was, as a boy, a little, chick-necked, short-headed, brown-faced, matt-nosed, long-eared, round-shouldered, bandy-legged, and altogether ugly urchin. Of course his parents could neither cleanse nor endure—the very plague and terror of their lives—such a child, and accordingly they sent him off, after two hours—surely and disobedient at home, and the forester of all kinds of discord and mischief-making—to find out his own fortune as a good knight and true. Perhaps many persons besides children will be glad to read the story of "A Great Man who was not a Soldier," which is the learn characters of the childhood of Winckelman of Stendale, in Germany. There are in the work ten stories; and it is crowded with wood engravings, which are of the highest order of excellence.

Last year Mr. J. H. Pepper, formerly Professor of Chemistry at the Polytechnic Institution, published a volume entitled "The Boy's Own Book of Science," which was so well received that it has naturally encouraged him to produce a companion volume, which contains "only of the great and unpondenable powers of nature called gravitation, cohesion, chemical affinity, heat, light, electricity, and magnetism, but likewise of the various forms in which the vital energy is manifested in the subject of "Mines and Metals." This he has done in a volume entitled "The Boy's Own Book of Metals." The book also includes personal narratives of visits to coal, lead, copper, and tin mines, with a full description of the various processes employed in the alchemy and the chemistry of the fifty metallic elements, a catalogue of the metals and their alloys, and a chronological table. The book is devoted to the aforesaid fifty metals, which include such unwonted names as Aluminium, Caesium, Columbium, Didymium, Erbium, Glucinum, Iridium, Lanthanium, Lithium, &c. The subjects are all treated in that easy familiar manner which the author's experience as a lecturer has rendered natural to him, so that the least informed and youngest reader can understand what is put before him. And the subject-matter is illustrated with three hundred engravings. Here is material for a present which will be welcomed by every young inquirer. It is an excellent manual, and as amusing as any storybook.—In this nautical country of ours boy literature would be terribly incomplete without a due admixture of seagoing books. To this branch of authorship Mr. W. H. Kingston is a regular contributor, and he now addresses his juvenile patrons in "The Boy's own Book of Boats" (Sampson Low, and Son). The object of the work has been to give the young readers an account of the vessels and boats of every rig and size to be found floating on the waters in every part of the world. It is a work of reference, but it contains a great deal of information about vessels, and a sketch of the existing state of naval architecture. With this view there are instructions given for cutting out a boat in the first instance, and the subject-matter gradually rises to minute directions as to the construction of every part of vessels of every class, including their sails. A threedecker is dissected and put together, as well as the fleetest frigate, and the last mentioned are pictured specimens of her class in the British Navy, which has stood the test of several heavy gales in the Channel in a manner which fully proves her efficiency as a man-of-war, also being the only ship afloat which could steam at full speed against a gale with any chance of success, and which is said to be actually capable of contending with a whole fleet of the old line-of-battle ships which Howe, Jervis, and Nelson led to victory. We have also a great deal about Scotch fishing boats, Dutch galiots, Arab dhows, outrigger canoes, Chinese junks, Esquimaux canoes, American river steamers, Peruvian balsas, the flying proas of the Indian Archipelago, and the mammoth Great Eastern herself. All is done—accompanied be it said by illustrations very well executed and copious diagrams, and with the assistance of drawings by one of the readers of the book to turn sailors, but with the object of affording to them that knowledge of the various vessels which every well-educated Englishman ought more or less to possess. If the subjects here treated are answered, the object in view will have been as nearly as possible attained.

It will not probably be thought inconsistent with the purpose of this notice of juvenile books to call attention to an addition to a class, rich in decoration and abounding in illustrations, bears the title of "Shakspeare's Heroines, and the Neighbourhood." The work has been produced by Mr. John R. Wise, illustrated by W. J. Linton, and published by Smith and Elder. The green path besides being full of time, in many respects may be said to be for all ages, in the sense of years. We have had the experiment tried by a father of a family, read, with a certain degree of excision and omission, one or two of the plays of Shakspeare to some very young children, and the result was remarkable enough. In fact, all the stories were caught at once, and much of the poetry appreciated. It was, perhaps, the first time that the same work conveyed unpremeditate pleasure to the ideal part of their minds. Judging from this, whether children can be properly prepared dealing with the works of Shakspeare, there can be no doubt that many who enter into the category of youthful readers could be trusted first instance to the pages of Mr. Wise's book. It is not particularly addressed to them. The writer of the book does not pretend that its aim is very high; but, in the words of its author, it is merely to take away the reproach of meagreness from the handbooks to Stratford-on-Avon, and, instead of giving the life of Shakspeare, to bring the reader a better idea of the land where the poet lived, he will be very well contented. The endeavour has been to make the book as happy in its vein, and leads up well to the actual matter which succeeds. This embraces descriptions of Stratford, of the house where Shakspeare was born, the Grammar School, Shakspeare's birthplace, the Guild, the Charlcombe's books and private manuscripts at Stanford, Southcote Lodge, Shottery, Charlecote, Whitefield, Bidford, the Avon, Luddington and Welford, "Piping Pebworth" and "Dancing Marston." The work is illustrated with cuts in the style known as (of the poet), Warwickshire Orchards and Harvest Homes, the Provincial inns of Shakspeare, and a glossary of words still used in Warwickshire which were in the days of the poet. We suspect a very pleasant, although a very unpretending, book.——Recurring to that part of our notice which may be called miscellaneous, we light upon "Holidays with Hobgoblins, or Talk of Strange Things," by Dudley Costello (J. C. Hotten). This is a book of entertainment, full of information of a light description, of the nature and character of which an idea may be gathered from the titles among the headings and the way in which "Sharing a Ghost," "The Ghost of Pit Pond," "The Haunted House near Hampstead." There is, however, an infusion of somewhat more solid stuff in the chapters on "Witchcraft," "Dancing" and "Traditions," "Monsters," "Alchemy and Gunpowder," &c. There is a narrative account of the "Cock Lane Ghost," which will excite some something of the history of such fanciful creatures as dragons, griffins, and salamanders, and a very full and veritable account of Jack-in-the-Green and lobsters. There is more besides all this—the variety which is the essence of the book—and the illustrations. The illustrations are numerous, and, be it well marked and noted, are by George Cruikshank, and are in his best style. The frontispiece was designed and executed by him, and is one of his best works, the others drawn by the artist some years ago, but are admirably adapted to the subject in hand, and will please our old friends.

The course of these notices turns now into fairy land or rather into fairyless. We have before us a handsome volume, which is a book of fairy tales entitled "Oberon's Horn." The stories are twelve in number, ten of which are quite new, while two, severally headed "Adventures of Tom Thumb" and "The King of the Earth," appeared ten years ago in Household Words. In this collection the spirit of the old fairy tales is preserved, and the style is of the simplest kind in it. Mr. C. H. Bennett contributes a series of appropriate illustrations. "Little Goldenhair and the Dwarfs" (Longman and Co.) is, although it is essentially a child's book, which Mr. Henry Warren has done his best to beautify. The author, who is the author, who writes under the initials "M. W." has endeavoured to affix a simple moral suited to the understandings of very young readers: the book is excellent of its kind. The author, who writes under the name of "Holme Lee," renders her offering to the season in the shape of "Legends of Life and Death" (Smith and Elder). For years past it has once a guarantee for the quality of her little book, which narrates the history of Christmas Eve in a Farm House. Full, the story proceeds and condign punishment of Aunt Spite, the adventures of the great Tollegay, and the story of the blacksmith in the giant's hall in a very delightful manner. The illustrations by Mr. Frank Sanderson very humorous indeed—lend their aid to the completeness of the volume. When it is stated that the author of "Stray Leaves" and "Maggy Laud," or, Recreation for the Rising Generation" (Henry Lea), informs us that she has completed a new book, which she has called "Mary Seel, and Daughter, enough has probably been said as its recommendation. Those who know the author of the former publications are the production of Thomas Hood, junior. But a brief extract from the introduction, written by Mrs. Frosling Hewley, will perhaps be more satisfactory. It is stated that this little volume of prose and verse was compiled several years ago, and was then "a favourite companion of the author and her sister," and, in fact, the collection of 'Childish Articles,' written for the 'rising generation,' by Mrs. Frosling Hewley, in 1814." Of the "Stray Leaves" or, "Memorials of Thomas Hood, junior," little published. Nearly every one of the chapters has some recollection associated with it. Some of the tales were written to while away the time when the little weary limbs were too weak to sit up, and the little eyes too dim and pitiful to see to read for ourselves. Can a better recommendation be given for the little story? was never refused by either of the tender parents who yearned to amuse and interest their little ones. Many a tale was accordingly called from memory, as they were told to us in those happy evenings that we sat by the bedside, or nestled on the rug before the fire, and the little ears eagerly to take, build, or history, according to the mood of the moment. Other tales were written at the request of our mother—desirous of our childhood to whom we owe our first knowledge of all that is good and true. The tales were written at a very tender age, when the love was always the loving heart and hand, ready to add to the enjoyment and instruction of her children." In every sense this little volume was intended itself to the feelings of the young. A book with "one hundred illustrations, designed by Alfred Crowquill," coupled with it a "Fairy Footsteps"; or, Lessons from Legends" to possess the advantages of the tales mingled with instruction, is a book to be welcomed. There are tales and short stories, German stories, Irish stories, and Eastern stories; all of them studded thick with sketches, humorous and grave, by the artist, who has never more successfully indulged his fancy, or taken more pains with the carrying out of his ideas. Again we find the same young hand illustrating, in colours, a volume of small-childish tales, and which bears the designation of "What Uncle Paul Did" (Henry Lea). Our last closes with "The Christmas Tree," a book of instruction and amusement for all young people, profusely illustrated. It is from the pencil of Mr. Absolon, and is published under the name of Nelson, and probably well known in the libraries of the young, and therefore it is not necessary to say that its contents are judiciously varied and its tone good.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1067.—VOL. XXXVII.] SATURDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1860. [WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

THE PAST YEAR.

It is but the enunciation of a truism to say that the retrospect of a year that has gone must necessarily have its sad, if not its dark, side. It is impossible to enter on a review of even such a period in the life of the world without a sense of something approaching to sorrow, even if the chronicle in its broadest features and in the main be satisfactory. As regards our own country, poising the estimate in the scale of human affairs, it may be said that, as a whole, we have had little to complain of in 1860. At home prosperity has been the rule rather than the exception; abroad our policy has been generally in the ascendant, so far as the influence of England and the progress of the principles which she represents are concerned; while in the single instance in which our arms have been employed in actual war they have been in every respect successful. Except for a murmur like that in a seashell of the probability of a war with France, the new year began quietly enough, charity, hospitality, and rifle practice occupying the attention of the public, which, having the prospect of the meeting of Parliament within three weeks, patiently awaited the commencement of the business of the realm. Everywhere tranquillity prevailed; and, with the exception of a small agitation in Ireland on behalf of the Pope, whose temporal power was threatened, there was nothing to cause excitement, far less alarm. The affairs of Italy were naturally much discussed, and everything pointed to the assembling of a European Congress for the settlement of the Italian question. The only circumstance in France coincident with the new year—an epoch to which Europe has been taught to look forward as that at which the keynote of Continental policy is to be struck—was the retirement of Count Walewski from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and the appointment of M. Thouvenel to that post. A happier omen than that of the preceding year, however, came from France, in the shape of the Commercial Treaty between that country and England, a harbinger and messenger of peace and goodwill. Previous to the re-assembling of Parliament a great meeting took place at Birmingham in favour of Reform in Parliament. At a period much earlier than usual the Parliament of the United Kingdom was opened by the Queen in person, and the programme of the Session embraced the amendment of the representation of the people, the French Treaty, the resumption of the war with China, the amendment of the law of bankruptcy, and the transfer of land; while her Majesty congratulated the Legislature on the entire cessation of the mutiny in India, and spoke encouragingly of the gallant and patriotic movement which had raised up an army of volunteers for the defence of the country. The earliest days of a Session which was in many respects abnormal and remarkable were occupied by tentative discussions with reference to rumours of the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France, a matter that became a fait accompli before the spring was over, and which would probably have caused some uneasiness in the relations between this country and our nearest neighbour but for the happy intervention, in the meantime, of Parliamentary action, which was fast weaving both nations into a commercial brotherhood. The unusual course of presenting the financial statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the House of Commons within a fortnight of the opening of the Session was not without its influence in this respect. The extraordinary liberality of the Budget, its remission of the wine duties, and its as is well known, signally failed; and in all their main features, they have become a part of our fiscal system.

After several postponements, at length, on the 1st of March, Lord John Russell introduced the Reform Bill of the Government. Of the fate of that measure the record is by no means a satisfactory one. A compromise, in the fullest sense of that term, it was so contrived as to please no one. Weakly supported by its originators, and assailed from all quarters, with less of emotion than he had shown on former and similar occasions, Lord John early in June announced its relegation to that Parliamentary waste-basket which, like the famous tent of the Eastern Monarch, is equally ready to cover a single measure or to expand for the hiding of a thousand.

In the record of events of the spring of 1860 it would be unpardonable if the public recognition of the volunteer force by the Sovereign of England were to be omitted. The reception by her Majesty of the officers of that force on the 7th of March must ever be remembered as the turning-point of the movement, while the magnificent spectacle of the review of a large body of citizen-soldiers in Hyde Park in June, and at Edinburgh in August, to say nothing of a remarkable exhibition of the same kind at Knowsley, when Lancashire showed so proudly, may be taken to have been its culmination.

Passing for a moment to cast a glance abroad, we find that the Italian cause has assumed rapid strides. The annexation of Tuscany and the Romagna to Piedmont was soon followed by the descent of Garibaldi upon Sicily, the occupation of Naples, the acceptance of Victor Emmanuel by the votes of the people as King, and the formation of a kingdom of Italy, one and indivisible, with the exception of that small fortress of Gaeta where the last of the Neapolitan Bourbons endeavoured to maintain a footing in the country which had cast him out, and the Venetian territory, which all things show must pass ere long from the hands of Austria—let us hope by peaceful means and not by the operation of a war—towards which the eyes of Europe are prophetically cast at this moment, and which, if it come to pass, must go far to give the last blow to the tottering empire of the house of Hapsburg. Spain having concluded her melodramatic war with Morocco, on the strength of which perhaps she sought to be raised in European diplomacy to the rank of a first-rate, had to encounter a mad attempt against the Crown on the part of the Conde de Montemolin and his brother, the easy crushing of which has probably tended to the better establishment of the present occupant of the throne of that realm. In this briefest of retrospects of Continental affairs it ought to be mentioned that the meeting and the locomotion of Sovereigns has been somewhat marked. The Emperor of the French visited the Grand Duke of Baden, with a hope, it was supposed, that he might attract other Potentates to the most charming of German watering-places; the entire adoption of the Commercial Treaty, necessarily acted as a compensation to any feeling which was created by distrust of the Ruler of France in reference to a question of Continental policy. The including of the abolition of the duty on paper in Mr. Gladstone's scheme was, except by a narrow and interested clique, to which monopoly was dear, generally accepted; and the subsequent rejection of that measure by the House of Lords, although the prudence of our chief statesmen prevented any direct collision between two of the branches of the Legislature on a question of privilege, has probably done much to establish on a firmer foundation than ever the very principle against which that step on the part of the Upper House appeared to militate. All general and direct attempts—and there were several—to oppose the policy of the Budget and the French Treaty, while the Monarchs of Russia and Austria met the Prince Regent of Prussia in solemn conclave at Warsaw, the Empress of the French, casting aside all the attributes of her rank, has visited Great Britain under circumstances and in a manner peculiarly calculated to win the admiration and respect of our people; and the reception she met with, marked as it was by good taste and good feeling, was probably not without an influence on the mind of her Imperial husband. It may have been only a coincidence; but it is to be remarked that the abolition of passports in France, as well as regards all British subjects, followed hard on the emphatically friendly and social visit of the Empress to our shores. The Empress of Austria has found it necessary to her health to seek the curative climate of Madeira, whither she was conveyed in the private yacht of the Queen of England. Our own Sovereign and the Prince Consort, in the autumn, enjoyed the privilege and the pleasure of a Continental tour, the chief object of which was a visit to that daughter of England who has gone from her country to adorn the Court of Prussia. Most notable, however, in immediate interest, and most important in impression and result, has been that Transatlantic progress of the Prince of Wales which proved in every way so eminent a success. The list of the Queen's visits is not nearly complete at present when due mention is made of the sailor voyaging of Prince Alfred, who was the object of nearly as enthusiastic, if not quite so extended an ovation, in South Africa as greeted his elder brother in North America. It will, perhaps not be out of place in the part of our review that has assumed a Royal hue to note down the fact of the betrothal of the Princess Alice to Prince Louis of Hesse Darmstadt.

Our narrative of events, which has to a certain extent preserved a chronological order, has now brought us to a point beyond the middle of the year, and we find that about this time, some hideous massacres of Christians by the Druses in Syria having taken place, an intervention was agreed upon by the great Powers, and a force of French troops was despatched to the country. England confining herself to a naval demonstration, her moral influence, and a subscription for the suffering survivors. All this time our Parliament was busying itself in talking of every possible subject, sitting day and night, during the greater part of day after day discussing the items of the measures which had held the chief places in the Ministerial programme; but, nevertheless, passing a multitude of minor and very useful bills. Among other things it should not be forgotten that the production of the Estimates showed the true and wonderful resources of our Navy had gone on with great regularity and rapidity, and that in most respects the condition of the country, so far as defence was concerned, was highly satisfactory. But the most salient point of these discussions was that when the Government, somewhat late in the Session, came down and asked for a vote for certain fortifications which in their estimation were indispensable to the completion of the system of defence against invasion which was the object of organisation. Although subjected to much hostile criticism, the feeling of Parliament was so decidedly in favour of this plan that the necessary legislation was effected without any serious opposition. This was almost the last measure of importance which was submitted to Parliament, although about the same time Mr. Gladstone succeeded in bringing into perfect fruition his bills for the establishment of wine and refreshment houses, and, unchecked and almost unnoticed by the Lords, in conformity with a clause in the French treaty, reduced the customs duty on foreign paper to the amount levied in this country by the Excise. After a Session of a duration almost unprecedented, protracted almost beyond the strength and endurance of any measure except perhaps the Reform, Parliament was prorogued on the 29th of August. Henceforward the current of affairs is in a chronicle still more discursive. Among our difficulties we have had, and still have, to encounter a little war in New Zealand, the conduct of which for the present time has reflected small credit on the officials, whether civil or military, in that dependency. In China a campaign has been carried on by our military and naval commanders with the most remarkable success: and the capture of Pekin, the practical fact of the occupation of Pekin by a European force has, by the skill and diplomatic ability of our negotiators, been made to result in a peace and a treaty which, if all that report speaks be true, will go as far as anything can to settle the vexed question of our relations with the Celestial Empire. Purposely avoiding to place any statement which concerns the United States of America among our summary of foreign affairs, we here advert to the important political circumstance of the election of Mr. Lincoln to the Presidency of that great Republic, a result which, if they mean anything, are decidedly Anti-Slavery. In this place, perhaps, it would be as well to mention that an Arctic expedition has left Boston, in the United States, for a still further exploration of Polar Seas. Before quitting the subject of what we emphatically called public affairs, the order of time brings us to the remarkable fact of the promulgation by the Emperor of the French of important alterations in his governmental system, in the shape of greater freedom of debate to his Legislature, and the relaxing of that iron hand of officialism which has hitherto borne so heavily on the press in France—an act of great significance, and one which seems to be in keeping with a new tendency in the Imperial mind.

If we pass on to what may be called things in general, as distinguished from precise public events, it may be noticed that a considerable impulse has been given during the past year to what is called the Early-closing Movement, which is a step to that which we have often advocated in this Journal—the extension of the means and the time for relaxation among the people of this hardworking generation. The return of Lord Clyde to England, after the pacification of India, has been marked by more than one public recognition in the city of London, and especially by the presentation of a sword to him by the Corporation; a like compliment, with a certain appropriateness, being paid to Sir James Outram at the same time. Our social failings have some what unhappily distinguished the past year. Among gigantic frauds, that of Fullinger, who rifled the Union Bank, stands out prominent; while the commercial crimes which have been brought to light in connection with the dealings of the leather trade will, we trust, prove a step in the purgation of our trading system. The voyage of the Great Eastern to America and back ought not to go unrecorded, although, by that futility which seems to have hastened on whole systems of naval architecture, she has since passed into the obscurity of a vessel which is laid up in ordinary. It would have been more agreeable if we could have stated that the annals of the last twelve months were comparatively unstained by blood. Alas, truth to say, murder has stalked abroad in an unusual extent. Not to enter into a dreary catalogue of crime so hideous, it only needs to speak of Mullins, and the still undiscovered and inexplicable Road murder; and the case of the schoolmaster Hopley, who, though he had a sickly boy to death, was only amenable to the law for manslaughter.

With equal reluctance we turn to that sad record which, in modern phrase, is designated "necrology." The stern Sergeant Death has been plentiful in his reaping. On the 14th of January Lord Macaulay was committed to the tomb of honour in Westminster Abbey. Among the other names more or less noted that have been blotted out of the book of human life are to be found those of the Archbishop of York; the Bishops of Rochester and Worcester; Lord Londesborough, a millionaire Peer, but a man of fine artistic archæological tastes; the Marquis of Dalhousie, the Earl of Aberdeen, foremost men amongst statesmen; Sir Henry Ward, an able administrator; James Wilson, an economist and financier. Henry Drummond, a marked man in Parliament, and noticeable everywhere for cultivated intellect and personal eccentricity; Matthew Talbot Baines, lawyer and legislator; Baron Watson, Jurist and Judge, who, like Pollock, died on the Bench; Sir Edward Cust, soldier and historian; his cousin Sir Charles, a sailor every inch of him; Lord Dundonald, whose genius and spirit invested the naval profession which he adorned with the glitter of romance; Sir Charles Fellowes, the explorer and the new literature of Parliament; Sir William Ross, R.A., the graceful miniature-painter. Amongst the professors of the pen—G. P. R. James, novelist: Mrs. Jamieson, an admirable art-critic; and Albert Smith. Then, too, we have to add to the list of departed men, about whose name more or less time so much interest clustered; while, going beyond the confines of our own country, we include in our mortuary record Jerome Bonaparte, the last of the brothers of the great Napoleon: the amiable Empress Dowager of Russia, Queen Pomare, Queen Maria Amalia, Duchess of the French Empire; Baron Bunsen, the learned and excellent, who so successfully interwove literature and diplomacy; the Abbé Huc, the Chinese traveller; and, alas! many more might be added to the list.

A sketch of the year 1860 would not be complete without reference to one subject which in the last twelve months has persistently forced itself on the attention of every one of us, and that is the weather. Perhaps a more unfavourable year in all respects, it is many respects, its most out-of-the-way feature has certainly been climatic. Rain, uncessing, pitiless; gales, floods, alike in spring, summer, autumn, winter. Snow in June, shivering temperature in July, a thunderbolt waterspout in August, and so all along till now, when frost assumes its state, and we are enabled at last to pronounce the weather seasonable. Happily, the serious fears which were entertained for the safety of the harvest were not realised in the fullness and extent, so that the quantity of English soil to bear moisture without detriment has been most abundantly vindicated. Happily, also, the unsatisfactory condition of the earth and sky, so far as regards the comfort and the pleasure of human life, has not produced any deadly influence on the health of the country, sickness as a whole having been below the average; while meteorologists tell us that, after all, the profuse rainfall of 1860 is only a due compensation for the droughts of 1858 and 1859.

MR. BOWLBY.

THE recent intelligence from China has set at rest all doubts as to the fate of Mr. Bowlby, the special correspondent of the Times newspaper. The body of that gentleman was rendered up by the Chinese authorities, and buried with all due honour, in the Russian Cemetery at Pekin, on the 13th of October. Mr. Bowlby was a gentleman, not originally a journalist, but a member of the legal profession. However that may be, there can be no doubt that the quality of his memory a foremost place in the list of those able, active, and zealous men whose combination of rare qualities, mental and physical, which go to make up that literary phenomenon, a first-class special correspondent. In a letter to the Times he had been giving directions occur in reference to their correspondent, the spirit and feeling of which will, we think, meet with general concurrence:—"Every one has for every day's labour a reward in the pay, but Mr. Bowlby has more personal interest, and will receive the information of his death as a personal loss. Upon his pen we all depended for our knowledge of what has been passing in the far East. We all expected him to open for us the gates of that hitherto sealed region of China, and expose the mysteries of our foreign days. We all remember that admirable letter in which the captive described his treatment, and with the minutest details, yet in details so skilfully grouped that their minuteness did not tire; and we had all impatiently hoped to see that same pen again employed upon a subject of the highest interest, and of which the peculiar felicity of the writer would find still better scope. This expectation will now never be fulfilled." We give a Portrait of Mr. Bowlby on the preceding page.

THE BORN PROSECUTIONS.—The trial of the English residents at Nice charged with the offence of insulting the Stadt-Procurator Möller in a matter relating to his office, by publishing in the Cologne Gazette and Bavaria Gazette a joint protest against the language applied by that functionary to the English nation when he was prosecuting Captain Macdonald for an alleged assault, has come to a close, judgment being pronounced as follows:—The defendants Baddeley, Rap p, Washington, Rochfort, Taunton, and Oldfield were acquitted; Perry, Anderson, Cumberland, and Drummond were found guilty, with extenuating circumstances, of having committed an offence against the State-Procurator Möller while in the performance of his official duties. The extenuating circumstances were declared to apply in a less degree in the case of Perry, who was found guilty of the same misdemeanour by default. The other three were fined 25 thalers each or nine days' imprisonment in default.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Moniteur publishes a decree regulating the right of precedence of the Ministers of State.

The remission of the warnings to the French press has been followed, as a matter of course, by an amnesty to all offences and contraventions committed by the press, the claims of civil parties alone being expressly reserved. Political writings which are in progress are nullified by the same decree.

M. Grandguillot, chief editor of the Constitutionnel, has followed up his first article respecting the necessity of a cession of Venetia to Piedmont by the publication of a second, in which he says emphatically, "France will never suffer a return to an offensive policy by Austria in Lombardy."

SPAIN.

The Senate has again devoted two sittings to the discussion of the bill for regulating promotions in the army, and has once more adjourned the debate.

The Queen received at a solemn audience Baron de Brockdorff, the new Minister of Prussia, to whom she presented in the evening. The King was to leave Naples on Thursday after having assisted at the bull at the National Theatre. Orders were issued to publish the penal law for Naples. The state of the provinces is very satisfactory. The individuals implicated in the classes of 1857, 1858, 1859, and 1860 have been called to military service. Those who have been drawn and are to be in readiness to resume military service when required.

The siege of Gaeta continues. The bombardment is quantity of shells and shot were thrown into Gaeta on the 17th inst, by the Sardinians. Some of these fell in the vicinity of the palace where the King and Queen were dining with the Spanish Ambassador. The King has received a letter from Victor Napoleon. In this letter the Emperor expresses his sympathy for the King, but tells him that he has carried on the siege long enough for his honour. The King, in his reply, thanked the Emperor, but added that he considered it his duty to persist in the defence. The Spanish Ambassador has left his palace on account of the bombardment. Two officers of the fleet have been struck while standing near the King.

The Pope has addressed an allocution in the consistory held on the 17th inst. His Holiness spoke of the persecutions of the Christians in Syria and China. He censured the pamphlet of M. Laguerronière, "Le Pape et l'Empereur," and announced that the Grand Duke of Baden had violated the Pontifical concordat. The Roman patriots have posted up on the walls placards which bear the arms of Victor Emmanuel and the words "We desire annexation to Sardinia." The Gazzetta di Roma publishes a letter from Garibaldi, on the subject of representation of the different interests. In conclusion, M. von Schmerling exhorts his subordinates to a loyal observance of the laws, and to perfect candour in their reports respecting the condition of the country.

The appointment of Count Leiningen as Governorship Council for Hungary are as follows:—Count Ladislaus Karolyi is appointed Vice-President of the Council; Count Councille Szalay has been appointed Director of the Department. The Councillors are to enter upon their duties on the 2nd of January next, when the present offices of the Governorship will be closed. The circular of Baron von Schmerling has created a great sensation in Hungary.

It is stated that the Council of Ministers has decided on demanding from the Pope the complete abolition of the Concordat. Negotiations to that effect are to be opened with Rome.

The Vienna Press gives the following summary of the Hungarian electoral law:—"The electoral law, which the Conference of Gran has just recommended, is extremely liberal. It confers the elective franchise on all the male inhabitants of Hungary, native or naturalised, who are twenty-four years of age without distinction of religion, provided they are in full enjoyment of civil rights, have never been convicted of crime, and are competent to fulfil one of the following categories:—1. In royal free towns and communes having an organised municipality, those who possess a house or land to the value of 200 florins, or who exercise an artisan, industrial, trade, or employing one journeyman at least; 2. Those who possess an income of 400 florins, whether derived from property or capital; 4. Members of the learned professions, without regard to income; 5. Those who have been elected members of municipalities even if they do not possess any of the above qualifications. All electors who have attained the age of twenty-four years, whether they can or not speak the Magyar language, which will be used in all legislative proceedings. The elections are to be direct, and the voting public."

ITALY.

The Prussian Gazette publishes an ordinance of the Prince Regent appointing M. de Bernuth, President of the Court of Appeal of Posen, Minister of Justice, in the room of M. Simons.

It is stated in a letter from Berlin that the Prussian Cabinet has addressed a circular to the confederated States asking for the present situation of the difference with Denmark, and proposing measures for obtaining a solution. It is added that on this matter Austria is quite in accordance with Prussia.

A Berlin letter of the 17th says:—"The general security of the Prussian frontiers, as well as the coast and land frontiers, is now under consideration at the Ministry of War. The fortifications of Stettin are to be augmented; Konigsberg and Posen are to be raised to the rank of fortresses of the first class. The south-eastern frontier, towards Poland, Hungary, and Austria, and the western, towards the Moselle, are less strongly defended. The small fortress of Juliers has already been dismantled; Sarrelouis, which is not tenable, will undergo the same fate; but Tievea is to be made a first-class fortress. It is said that the plans for fortifying this last place are in course of preparation."

The Berlin journals of the 22nd state that a German merchant, writing from Yokahama, in Japan, confirms the fact that the negotiations for a treaty of commerce between Japan and Prussia, which

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams were received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday):—

THE EMPRESS OF AUSTRIA.—Vienna, December 27.—Lieut. Latour has arrived at Lisbon from Madeira. He met a telegram on the 26th inst. stating that the health of the Empress was quite satisfactory.

ITALY.—Turin, December 27.—The official Gazette of to-day publishes four Royal decrees, dated Naples, December 17, declaring the annexation of the Papal Marches, Umbria, the Neapolitan and an integral part of the State of Italy.

FRANCE.—Thursday Evening.—The Pays says:—"The tendency of public opinion presages that the Garibaldian party will obtain the majority at the elections to the Italian Parliament. Count Cavour has explained vehemently of the course pursued by the Sardinian Ministry."

AUSTRIA.—Berlin, Thursday, Dec. 27.—The Kreuzzeitung publishes a telegram from Vienna stating that the Emperor has already sanctioned the resolution of the Diet, December 15, and has received upon convoking the Hungarian Diet for February next.

CHINA.

THE NEW TREATY.—BURIAL OF THE ENGLISH PRISONERS. INDEMNITY FOR THEIR FAMILIES.

Foreign Office, Dec. 24.

The following telegram was received at the Foreign Office, via Trieste, on Monday evening, from her Majesty's Agent and Consul-General at Alexandria, dated Dec. 24:—

Mr. Lech has arrived with despatches from China, and leaves this day for Malta.

The ratification of the Treaty of Tien-Tsin was exchanged and the Convention signed at Pekin on October 24. The English and French Ambassadors took up their residence in the capital, and would remain there till November 3. The French army retired from Pekin on the 1st of November. The Treaty was signed on October 26 and ratified.

A large force is to remain at Tien-Tsin till treaty-conditions be fulfilled.

Principal clauses:—Apology from Emperor for affair of Peiho last year; indemnity of 8,000,000 taels. Pekin placed on the footing of Shanghai. Tien-Tsin to be opened to trade immediately; emigration allowed; Europeans to travel in the interior. Permission for the British Minister at Pekin to be put in immediate operation, and to be published throughout the empire.

Palaces of Yuen-Min-Yuen have been entirely burnt to the ground by British force.

Statue of the princess who died in the hands of the Chinese brought in and buried with honours, in the Russian Cemetery, on October 17.

The remaining prisoners will be released on or about September 21, after the battle of Pah-li-Chow. Bodies not recovered.

Indemnities expected from Chinese for families of deceased.

English mail delivered by Minister left Shanghai for Tien-Tsin, Trieste, December 24, 1860. (Signed) H. HAVES.

The following telegrams have been received at Mr. Reuter's office :—

Pekin, Oct. 31.

The Treaty of Tien-Tsin was ratified and the Convention signed Pekin on the 24th of October, by Lord Elgin and Prince Hung.

The same day the Ambassadors left Pekin for Tien-tsin Gros on the following day.

The indemnity to be paid by the Chinese has been fixed at 8,000,000 taels in all.

The following is a summary of the convention :—

In Article I the Emperor regrets the misunderstanding at the Taku Forts last year.

Art. 2 stipulates that a British Minister shall reside at Pekin.

Art. 3 arranges the payment of the indemnity by instalments.

Art. 4 opens the city of Tien-tsin to trade.

Art. 5 removes the interdict on emigration.

Art. 6 defines the boundary of Kowloon.

Art. 7 provides for the immediate operation of the Treaty of Tien-Tsin.

Art. 8 orders the promulgation of the treaty throughout China.

Art. 9 stipulates the evacuation of Chusan by the British force.

Art. 10 relates to the ratification of the Treaty of Tien-Tsin.

It is reported that the 1st Royals, the 67th, the Queen's, the Buffs, and the Carabineers are returning.

Lord Elgin resides in Pekin.

The Emperor is at Zhehol, in Tartary.

Bowlby, De Normann, and Anderson have been buried with great solemnity.

Bruntton was beheaded about the 21st of September.

The Abbé de Lou also met with the same fate.

Mr. Parkes has been appointed to the families of the British officers who have been murdered.

The summer palace of the Emperor was burnt by the British on the 18th of October.

Shanghai, Nov. 8.

The insurgents are still levying tribute in various places, and are menacing Ningpo.

The Monitour publishes a despatch from General Montauban, the Commander-in-Chief of the French Army in China, which completely contradicts the story that the Emperor's summer palace had been plundered by the soldiers and sailors of the allies. It says that immediately after the capture of the palace he appointed strong posts to preserve order, and subsequently delegated the performance of this duty to two officers of the staff, who executed it faithfully. From the whole tenor of the General's despatch it may be inferred that the stories of devastation which have been described did not actually take place.

The cold has been very severe in Paris. Some sledges were seen in the Champs Elysées on Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday.

The trial relative to the murderer of Prince Danilo of Montenegro, has been executed at Cattaro.

The first section (about thirty miles) of the Smyrna and Aidin Railway was opened recently.

The Melbourne Argus has an article expressing the loyal hope of the colonists that the Prince of Wales will visit her Majesty's possessions in that quarter of the globe.

Sir S. M. Peto is at present at Copenhagen, making arrangements with the Danish Government for the purchase of the island of St. Juthas.

Haytian advices report the failure of a conspiracy against the Government and the hanging of the culprits, including several women and one priest.

In Russia, in 1859, it appears that the number of steamers navigating the rivers and lakes of the empire was 1,138, and 138 belonged to different companies, 170 to private persons, and three to the Ministry of Ways.

The Opinione of Turin states that Count Ercole Mastai, a nephew of Pius IX., and Captain of the Guard of the Seal in the Pontifical Army, has offered his service to the King of Italy, who has accepted them, appointing him to the command of a battalion.

The Mechanic's Magazine states that the North Atlantic telegraph is about to be proceeded with under the auspices of its original promoters, whose hands have been strengthened for the work by the devotion of Sir Charles Bright's great abilities and experience to the undertaking.

A story relative to the captain of the Marquis of Downshire's yacht having proposed to his Lordship's daughter whilst in the Bay of Naples, and, being discovered on his knees by the indignant father, was taken up by the collar and dropped into the sea, is declared by the friends of both parties in England to be without foundation.

In the Cathedral of Agram, on the occasion of a commemorative service in honour of one M. Kacic, a Croatian poet, the congregation took it upon themselves to sing the Russian national hymn—a grand conception in itself, but giving rise to a train of political meaning from the mouths of the Slavonian subjects of Austria.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

A battery is about to be erected at Nodesdale Point, on the Scottish coast.

The court-martial appointed to inquire into the loss of her Majesty's ship Perseverance, near Mayo, Cape Verde, has awarded a severe reprimand to Commander Power, and the loss of one year's rank. Mr. M'Farlane, the Master, was also severely reprimanded, with the loss of three years' rank.

The Queen has appointed Lord Burghley, Lieutenant-Colonel-Commandant of the Northamptonshire and Rutlandshire Regiment of Militia, to be one of her Majesty's Aide-de-Camp for the service of her militia forces, with the rank of Colonel in the Army.

Orders have been issued for the whole of the mechanics and labourers employed at the dockyards at Chatham to be employed for an extra hour both morning and evening, in order that no delay may be occasioned in finishing the ships required for the Channel squadron. Besides this, the working line-of-battle and other screw steamers are now building in the dockyard, instead of which they would have been sent out, as will shortly be the case with—viz., the Bulwark, 91, about half completed; the Royal Oak, 91, only recently laid down, and which will be considerably advanced; the Repulse, 91, completed, and waiting to be launched on the 1st of January; the Bellerophon, 91, a sister ship to the Monarch, recently launched at Pembroke Dockyard; the Research, 26, about three-fourths finished; the Reindeer, 17, one of the best of the class, and which will be completed in a few days; and the Rosario, 17. In addition to these, the Lily, 17, and the Daphne, 17, which have been being lengthened and converted into a screw-steamer; and the sailing-frigate Arethusa, 51, are undergoing the same alteration.

THE ARMSTRONG GUN.—The manufacture of the 100-pounder Armstrong guns intended for naval service is now making rapid progress at the Royal gun-factories, Woolwich. The first of the number, which will be the week successfully tested at the Arsenal butts, and were passed for service. The new principle introduced by Mr. Scott in the construction of these guns is the ring solidified straight to the breech and chamber throughout—namely, of the whole length of the bore, instead of only a portion of it, as hitherto. The locking-bolt also presents an undoubted improvement in the mode in which it is fired. It will, in future be manufactured according to that principle. Several guns have been put likewise to be tested with a view to service—A letter, signed "A Practical Gunner," urges the introduction of Hadden Hall iron for making guns, as that material is the best for gun. With reference to Sir William Armstrong's gun the writer says:—"It is that Armstrong gun will very shortly be found out, and will cause great loss of decks, butts, and sides. The elaborate defending sight, too, increases the time and difficulty of loading, and consequently the number of shots which are likely to be moved with difficulty—a defect which increases with the size of the gun; and in consequence of the great weight of that contrivance, and the gun itself. Notwithstanding every care the grooving fouls and the balls strip—a serious defect, which will increase with the size of the gun, and render it inoperative in five or three rounds or bouts. To these disadvantages is added that, in case of damage to the gun, the whole of the 100-pounder is rendered useless for all duties to injury, the gun cannot be loaded from the muzzle, lead-coated shot being one for the 68-pounder, and consequently cannot be replaced by common wrought shot, shell, and powder, both at home and abroad, would be useless.

THE 21ST VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

The society of Inventors have completed the formation of volunteer regiments out of members of their own body. Lord De Grey and Ripon has written a letter to the Secretary, which contains many hints for the use on the part of secret societies in their character as such.

The Twenty-first Middlesex Volunteers (Artists' Rifle, with scout-bayonet, the gift of Sergt. Edward Jones, of the 2nd company), at the Rifle Butts, Wimbledon, on Saturday, the 18th inst., in the presence of the Duke of Cambridge, and won by Private C. Chester.

Foster Gough, Esq., LL.D., Captain of the 2nd Wolverhampton Rifle Company, has been elected Warden of the arms presented to the Corps by the Mayor Mostyn at Rhyl to the best shot standing up to 300 yards. There were twenty-seven of the Corps who competed for the prize, many of them being first-class shots, amongst whom was represented almost every country in England, and many of the competitors were crack shots—best Queen's Prize men—but that with one of ordinary Enfield rifles used in his own company.

The members of the 4th Company of the Berkhamsted Rifle Volunteers sprang together in the Exchange Rooms on the evening of Friday, the 21st inst., and presented a handsome testimonial to their respected competitors at their late shooting-matches—namely, Mr. M. Morrison, Corporal Gilmour, Mr. A. Bell, Mr. R. Pedrick, Mr. Wyatt, Mr. Rowland, Sergeant Millar, Mr. R. Allen, Mr. J. Rouad, Sergeant Rowand, Corporal Gilmour scored nine bulls-eyes consecutively at the distance of 200 yards, and Private Pride; that, to show the keenness of the competition, it may be stated that ten had to be shot off to decide the contest.

The following important document relating to volunteer officers has just been issued from the War Office. The decision of the Duke of Cambridge is precisely that order its consideration in reports of the various inspections of the volunteer corps throughout the United Kingdom; and, while acquiescing in the principle that officers should be required to show a certain amount of efficiency, satisfied by many of those corps and the considerable progress made by the majority of them in the short period which has elapsed since the Government attention which more officers have bestowed on the acquirement of a thorough knowledge of their duties, the Commander-in-Chief is of opinion that many of those officers who have not before served continued study and an increased knowledge of their duties, and that they will be able to qualify themselves for the important commands with which they have been intrusted. As regards some officers who, from the circumstances of their position, election of officers to the 5th clause of the Act 44, George III., cap 54, which specifies the amount of drills at which attendance is compulsory to render them effective. The Secretary of State feels it to be his duty to all the volunteer corps that the Act 44 Geo. III. cap. 54, sec. 5, under which so many already enjoy of efficient officers thoroughly versed in their drill and duties. The Secretary of State has determined that the rights of all the volunteers renders it especially necessary that all their officers should be well acquainted with their duties. It is impossible that this should be the case with a competent knowledge how to command and instruct his men can long maintain his influence and authority over them, and must seriously affect the general position and connections, while it is evident that in the event of the services of the corps being required for the defence of the country, the officers would be unable to be regarded in a position of command. The Adjutant of a battalion of volunteers is charged with its instruction, and he is bound to acquaint himself with the requirements of the regulations and parade of the officers, unless it is shown that they have neglected to avail themselves of the means afforded them of their duties. It is manifestly that the officers of volunteers will do their utmost in this respect to support the Adjutant in the discharge of his duties, and to fit themselves for their positions.

PRESENTATIONS.—Yesterday week Mr. R. G. Walker, late Quartermaster-Sergeant of the Ayrshire Rifle Volunteers, was entertained by a number of the members of the corps, and presented with a silver cup commemorative of his services. On Wednesday week a presentation was made assembled at the Tewkesbury, Woolwich, to witness the presentation, by Mrs. Brown, of a silver cup to the memory of her late husband, Sergt.-Major to the 4th Kent Rifle Corps.—The officers of the Cheltenham Rifle Corps, now forming the 5th Gloucestershire Volunteers, on the 21st inst. entertained at dinner by Sir Alex. Ramsay; the Earl of Ellenborough, Colonel Peyton, Colonel Bramston, and other officers of neighbouring corps have been also invited. The members of the 10th company (the Cotteridge) presented their Captain, Lieutenant Wm. Hodgetts, Esq., with a gold watch and chain on Thursday week at their Orchestra.—On Thursday week a set of musical instruments was presented to the 1st Cinque Ports Artillery Volunteers.

ROBBERY OF A MUSEUM.—The Nazione of Florence gives an account of a robbery committed in the museum of Florence in the night of the 17th. All those who have visited that capital must be aware of the immense importance of the Museum of Natural History founded by the Medici. In the night in question some thieves entered the Salle della Gemme, or saloon of gems of the Museum, and carried off a vast quantity of the most valuable and considerable intrinsic value, but infinitely more valuable as objects of art. Among these are cameos and intaglios of the most exquisite kind, a gem of Augustus which had belonged to Cosmo dei Medici. Other articles, which were too large to be carried off, were broken to pieces, and the fragments left on the floor. Several cases of gems, and the antique bronzes of the intaglio, and many of the articles last enumerated as upwards of 2,000,000f. The keeper of this saloon, was released the following day from the prison where he had been confined. The thieves effected their entrance by the skylight; the roof they could only have reached either from the Corridor or the Uffizi. The latter, however, was closed up to the door opening into the corridor of the Uffizi, but they could not make out if, indeed, they had entered through it. They left by the skylight by which their escape, and it was found in the morning by the keeper.

BRITISH BIRDS.—(To the Editor.)—Be so kind as to announce that arrangements are made for forming several thousands of the Acclimatisation Society, under the presidency of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, President of the Council; Lord Ashburton, Lord Lurgan, Lord Powerscourt, Lord Lovell, and the readers agency of Sir Henry Bulwer, this has been effected.—C. B. WOLLEY, late of the Zoo. Gardens, Botanical Park, Sydney.

EMIGRATION TO THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE AND AUSTRALIA.—The ship Royal Albert, of 603 tons, Captain Welch, sailed from Southampton on Christmas Day for Table Bay, with free emigrants, selected from the agricultural and artisan classes by the Hon. William Field. They are under the charge of Sergeant-Superintendent Arlair, and comprise 34 married couples, 35 single men, 37 single women, 36 children, and four infants; being a total of 150 souls. The ship Ocean Monarch, of 1,000 tons, Captain Hall, sailed with 400 emigrants, under the local Act of 1855, now amounted to 1,788 souls.—The ship Aberdeen, 617 tons, Captain Hoppe, also sailed on Christmas Day from Southampton, with 210 Government emigrants, equal to 179 statute adults for Melbourne, in charge of Surgeon-Superintendents J. O'Brien. These emigrants consist of 50 married couples, 10 single men, 10 single women, 24 children, and four infants; of whom 100 are English, 47 Scotch, and 63 Irish.

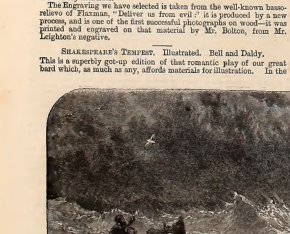
ILLUSTRATED LITERATURE.

LYRA GERMANICA: Hymns for the Sundays and Chief Festivals of the Christian Year. Translated from the German by CATHERINE WINKWORTH. Illustrated by JOHN LEIGHTON, F.S.A. and others. Longman and Co.

GOOD book is a true friend, a wise author a public benefactor—saith one of our old English worthies; and here is a good book—a holy book of hymns by the fathers of the Reformed religion in Germany—a book that would rather have astonished those noble prisoners who, in the dawn of their art, rendered some of these self-same compositions with their rude black-letter types—thereby (with the Bible) spreading the Truth both far and wide. But things have greatly changed since the day when Luther, on Christmas Eve, wrote the beautiful hymn, "From Heaven above to Earth I come," for his little son Hans. This was in 1540 (320 years ago), and is illustrated by Mr. Leighton, on page 12; but science has given us many things since those troubled times, and lieves de luxe amongst their number, in all the glory of gold, and, what is of greater importance, good art.



Ever since the Reformation the German Church has been remarkable for the number and excellence of its hymns and hymn-tunes. Before that time it was not so. There was no place for congregational singing in public worship, and therefore the spiritual songs of the latter part of the middle ages assumed for the most part an artificial and unpopular form. Yet there were not wanting germs of a national Church poetry in the verse rather than hymns which were sung in German on pilgrimages and at some high festivals, many of which verses were derived from more ancient Latin hymns. Several of Luther's hymns are amplifications of verses of this class. From the time of Luther there has been a constant succession of hymn-writers in the German Church; and a brief account of the most celebrated of them is given in the translator's preface to the present selection, which is taken from the large collection of Baron Bunsen, and comprises many of those hymns best known and loved in Germany, arranged according to the Sundays and chief festivals of the Christian year, with a view to facilitate the use of the work in England as a manual of private devotion. In translating these hymns the original form has been retained with the exception that single rhymes are generally substituted for the double rhymes which the structure of the language renders so common in German poetry, but which becomes cloying to an English ear when constantly repeated; and that English common metre is used instead of what may be called the German common metre.

The first series of the "Lyra Germanica," originally published in 1855, was favourably received by the public and the press; it has been frequently reprinted, and continues in constant demand. In the present edition the work is carefully revised as a gift-book, in accordance with the prevailing taste for illustrated literature. The designs printed in the text, about 225 in number, comprise Bible landscapes, scriptural vignettes, a few subjects of allegorical character, emblematical marginalia, and tailpieces, all strictly in keeping with the hymns which they illustrate.

The Engraving we have selected is taken from the well-known bas-relief of Flaxman, "Deliver us from evil" it is produced by a new process, and is one of the first successful photographs on wood—it was printed and engraved on that material by Mr. Bolton, from Mr. Leighton's negative.

SHAKESPEARE'S TEMPEST. Illustrated. Bell and Daldy.

This is a superbly got-up edition of that romantic play of our great bard which, as much as any, affords materials for illustration. In the

"THE TEMPEST" : PROSPERO ADRIFT.

Present case, while every other accessory of a drawing-room book has been lavishly exhibited in its decoration, it is embellished by numerous excellent engravings by Birket Foster, Gustave Doré, Frederick Skill, Alfred Slader, and Gustave Janet. We have transferred two of the Engravings to our columns. The subject-matter of the first is to be found in that scene of the play in which Prospero describes to Miranda his desertion in an open boat at sea by his treacherous brother and his co-conspirators, and which he tells in the following lines :—

> They hurried me aboard a bark;
> Bore me some leagues to sea; where they prepar'd
> A rotten carcass of a boat, not rigg'd,
> Nor tackle, sail, nor mast; the very rats
> Instinctively had quit it; there they hoist us,
> To cry to the sea that roar'd to us; to sigh,
> To the winds, whose pity, sighing back again,
> Did us but loving wrong.

The other Engraving illustrates the description given by Ariel to Prospero of the scene in which Antonio, the usurping King, and his fellowers, were drawn just before the conclusion of the enchantment to which they were subject. It is where Prospero asks

How fare the King and his followers?

and Ariel replies—

> Confin'd together
> In the same fashion as you gave in charge;
> Just as you left them, all prisoners, Sir,
> In the lime-grove which weather-fends your cell;
> They cannot budge, till you release. The King,
> His brother, and yours, abide all three distracted;
> And the remainder mourning over them,
> Brim-full of sorrow and dismay; but chiefly
> Him that you term'd, Sir, "The good old Lord, Gonzalo;"
> His tears run down his beard, like winter's drops
> From eaves of reeds : your charm so strongly works them
> That, if you now beheld them, your affections
> Would become tender.

THE OPENING OF MR. MUDIE'S NEW HALL.

On the evening of Monday week Mr. and Mrs. C. E Mudie received a vast number of literary and artistic friends, on the occasion of the opening of the new hall of the library, New Oxford-street. The company included the representatives of all classes of literature, science, and art. Among the distinguished individuals who were present may be mentioned M. Milnes, Esq., M.P.; I. Butt, Esq., Q.C.; Judge Halliburton, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Martin, Dr. Brady, R. Jerrold, Augustus Sala, Shirley Brooks, George Cruikshank, the venerable Mr. Yorke, Charles Knight, the Rev. Dr. Cumming, Mr. S. C. Hall and Mr. S. C. Hall, Mr. Bohn, Mr. Murray, and Dr. M'Clintock. The walls were decorated with a variety of pictures, the property of Mr. Mudie. There were also placed in the niches small statues of Oliver Cromwell, by Leifchild; Foley's beautiful statue of Oliver Goldsmith; and "Tancred and Clorinda," a charming subject, by Schwanthaler. The vocalists who were engaged were Miss Palmer, Miss Eliza Hughes, Signor Negri, Messrs. Aspa and Kenny. In the centre of the hall were exhibited, on a circular dais, a number of splendid photographs, and a number of charming statuettes in terra-cotta by Bezzi. The hall is a beautiful structure, from the designs of Mr. William J. Cubeame. Its size is 60 feet by 45 feet, and its height is 45 feet from the ground line. There is a central iron staircase to a commodious basement. The principal cornice is supported by Ionic columns, springing from which is a most elegant arch, divided by pilasters and circular-headed windows; the roof being formed of transverse mouldings, and spaces being filled in with ground glass. A well-constructed gallery round the building affords every facility for the arrangement of the books.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JANUARY.

Or all the Paris fashions the most Parisian is the custom of wishing a "Happy New Year," a ceremony which trenches far upon the month of January, and renders that month remarkable for demonstrations of kind and friendly sentiment.

The new-year's visits of 1861 are to be paid in neat and quiet costume, both as regards dresses and bonnets. The former must be new and the latter fresh. Muffs now generally adopted for winter wear are robes de fantasie, plain or brocaded; the superior qualities of poplin are also in favour. Merinos are almost entirely discarded for the present season, on account of their dullness. Our Illustrations will sufficiently explain the form and style of the actual modes. The fashions for bonnets are the same, with some irregular to allow room for the display of individual taste. The most important requirements for a chapeau are, that it shall be small, suit the expression of the face, and add to the years of the fair wearer, and be without pretension. Flowers are the two we venture to recommend, and that of a black velvet, with deep bavolet; on the left-hand side of the front is a bouquet, consisting of a large rose, surrounded by a border of velvet, edged with narrow white picot lace. The white de-tête is of plaited tulle, and the puse not too high above the forehead—simply two roses slightly separated. The other bonnet, somewhat novel, is a mixture of lilac silk and black velvet thrown together with taste. The soft-crowned crown is necessarily of silk, and the front of the bonnet is ornamented by a fine rolling feather; velvet bavolet; tour-de-tête as above, the puse composed of luxurious interlaced velvet leaves.

Before proceeding to the explanation of our Illustrations we must briefly allude to the new petticoat—the jupon mutiple, as it is very properly called, for it may be made to take the dimensions of two, three, four, or five petticoats, as occasion may require, although but one article of dress. For this it is only necessary to add or to take away so many of layers of muslin, which can be attached or abstracted with the greatest facility.

Let us not forget the occasion, nor omit to wish specially, to each and all of our lady readers, a new year, bonne et heureuse !

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Morning Toilet.—Double-skirted taffety dress; the under skirt is plain, and the upper one largely rounded off at the lower corners and trimmed with a fluted edging graduating upwards to the waist, where it becomes narrow. The corsage consists of a Zouave casaque trimmed, as well as the sleeves, in a similar style to the skirt. Small Parisian collar; silk cravat, the ends of which are ornamented by a trimming of lace.

Fig. 2. Evening Costume.—Moire antique robe, upon the skirt of which is attached, in the elegant manner shown in our Engraving, a wide band of velvet or stuff similar to that constituting the dress. This band is trimmed at the bottom with a wide and at the top with a narrower lace, the whole forming a very graceful sort of flounce. The high-necked corsage, à la Suisse, is covered half way with pardessus and guipure. Pagoda sleeves, trimmed with lace and velvet, in keeping with the ornament of the skirt. Parisian collar. Twisted head-dress, composed of long velvet leaves, the colour of which should, of course, be in harmony with the rest of the toilet.

Fig. 3. Dress for Opera or Ball.—Light pink silk dress, with three very high flounces. The cloak is of white cashmere edged with black velvet; the folds are held in at the shoulders by a band, à la Grecque, embroidered with gold and also edged with black velvet. A yellow silk tassel descends from the lowest point of each of the shoulder ornaments. Curved mother-of-pearl fan, with lace leaves on rose-coloured grounds. The head-dress consists of a round garland of roses without any intermixture of leaves.

PRESENTATION OF THE FREEDOM OF THE CITY AND SWORDS TO LORD CLYDE AND SIR JAMES OUTRAM.

IN accordance with a vote of a Court of Common Council held some time ago the Freedom of the City of London and Swords, of the value of one hundred guineas each, were presented to Lord Clyde and Sir James Outram on Thursday week in the Council Chamber, Guildhall. The presentation took place before a large assemblage of spectators, whose enthusiastic reception of the two gallant soldiers testified the admiration of their late glorious career in India.

The Chamberlain read the Corporation address, in which he complimented Lord Clyde upon his exploits in India, alluding more especially to the judgment he had displayed in not unnecessarily exposing the lives of those under his command. He then tendered the right hand of fellowship on behalf of the Corporation, and presented a handsome sword and the freedom of the City to his Lordship.

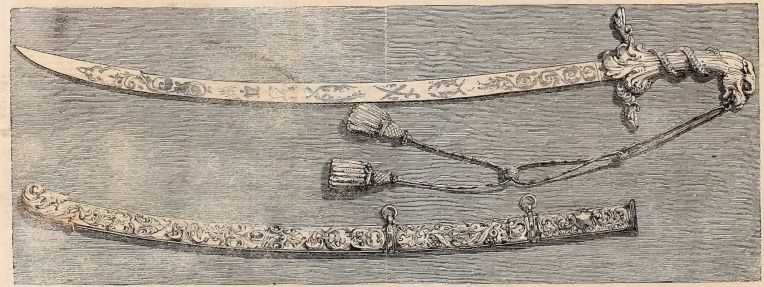
In accepting the sword Lord Clyde said :—"My Lord Mayor and Gentlemen,—I feel more deeply than I can express the greatness of the double honour which you have conferred on me. As a freeman of this great and illustrious City, I am proud to be enrolled on the glorious list of those who have done good service to their country. I accept with gratitude the magnificent present which has been placed in my hands. At the age of fifteen I was present with my regiment at the battle of Waterloo. You will not expect a gallant soldier, whose life since then has been spent in the active exercises of his profession, to reply in adequate terms to the eloquent and too flattering address of your Chamberlain. I have received at the hands of my gracious Sovereign honours far beyond my deserts. I receive the costly and beautiful sword now presented to me at the hands of the city of London as a token of the favour and approbation of the greatest and wealthiest city in the civilised world, and to the last day of my life I shall prize your gift beyond anything I possess. My words are but poor and feeble to express my gratitude; but, while endeavouring to convey my thanks to you, allow me to call attention to the noble company and devotion which animated all ranks in her Majesty's service, from the present Commander-in-Chief in India and my gallant friend beside me to the private soldier in the ranks. Nothing short of the untiring and determined exertions of all, from the highest to the lowest, would have ensured the success which you have this day been pleased to recognise and reward. As old and humble soldier of my country, I again thank you, my Lord Mayor and gentlemen, members of the Corporation of London, for the great and signal honour you have conferred upon me." (Cheers.)

The Chamberlain then, in an address in which he alluded to the great service General Outram had been to the Indian Government, presented to him also the right hand of fellowship, the freedom of the City, and a sword.



Sir James Outram, who on account of his infirm health was seated during the ceremony, said :—"My Lord Mayor and Gentlemen,—In my present infirm state of health I am quite unable to express as fully or as well as I otherwise might do the extreme gratification with which I receive this testimony of your approval of my services in India. Gentlemen, I feel the high honour thus conferred on me in the same degree which has been so well acknowledged by my noble friend, and I shall ever esteem it as the glory of my life. The highest distinction that could be conferred by this great Corporation on a soldier—the gift of a sword—has been enhanced in my estimation—if, indeed, anything could enhance so proud a compliment—by being associated on this occasion with my beloved and revered late commander, to whom I feel all the devotion of a Highlander of the olden time towards the ch ef of his clan" (Cheers).

Lord Clyde honoured the Corporation by his presence at a dinner in the evening at the Mansion House, at which the Duke of Cambridge and Sir Charles Wood were present. General Ootram was unable, on account of illness, to attend.

Lord Clyde's sword was manufactured at the establishment of Messrs. P. G. Dodd and Son, goldsmiths, of Cornhill. The hilt and guard are formed of serpents entwined, with a lifelike tiger's head; and the blade is of the finest tempered steel, beautifully ornamented. The scabbard is of silver gilt, elaborately chased in rich scroll-work. Sir James Outram's sword is most elaborately ornamented, the cross upon the handle bearing the cipher in monogram of the illustrious hero. The scabbard, of silver gilt, which is covered with crimson velvet, is enriched by the armorial bearings of Sir James and of the City, very beautifully painted in enamel upon fine gold, finished with devices of an Oriental character. The execution was intrusted to Messrs. Wilkinson and Vade, of the Strand, and is marked by their usual good taste. The same firm made the gold sword, set with brilliants, which was presented to General (then Major) Outram by the inhabitants of Bombay in 1846.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1869.

THE new year opens pleasantly so far as England is concerned. We appear to have made an advantageous peace with China as circumstances will permit, and the prospective development of commerce with that enormous empire is a theme on which speculation may indulge almost unchecked. The honour of our arms has been amply vindicated, and the sight of a British force in Pekin is not likely to be forgotten either by Chinaman or Tartar. A solemn ceremonial has marked the interment of the martyrs to Tartar treachery, and an actual cession of a small but important piece of land will be of great advantage to our Chinese settlements. We have no serious enemies to subdue except some troublesome ones in New Zealand, who are fighting for an idea, one that may be extremely inconvenient to our colonists, but which is not on the whole unreasonable in itself, and one that we learned to appreciate the principles on which modern civilisation deals with the autochthones of an uncivilised region. Mismanagement and divided counsels may render the New Zealand difficulty more important than it appeared, and the views of the missionary clergy are also boldly opposed to those of the Government. Elsewhere all is peace with our neighbours and loyalty among our colonists. What might have been a dangerous mutiny in India has been promptly crushed out by the stern determination of our admirable Anglo-Indian Army. Home politics are stagnant, as usual, at this period of the year; but in a little more than a month the Parliamentary machine will be "in gear," and working with its ordinary amount of clatter, to the production of what valuable legislatorial article time will show. The managers' announcement will be looked for with interest on the 5th of February. Scotland is, as ever, calm, shrewd, and persevering, and keeps a vigilant and not altogether contest eye upon her Lord Advocate and the other members of her Executive during the Imperial Assembly. Ireland is disturbed only by an occasional outburst of Orange folly, and by ludicrous pastorals in which her Roman Catholic hierarchy bewail the troubles of the Pope and the progress of liberal and enlightened (?) but cheap religion. We are said by the victim of Roman Catholic objectors, to the solar system. Abroad there is a disquiet spirit in motion; but it is not unreasonable to hope that the wisdom of a few statesmen may prevail still to avert the horrors and miseries of the struggle of democrats. The reforms and concessions made by the Emperor of the French must produce a certain amount of good, while much more will arise from the slow but steady recognition, on both sides of the Channel, of the true principles of commercial industry. The crime of Socialism and the attempt to patch up a union between liberal theory and despotic practice, and still more from the bankruptcy consequent upon false finance, added to all which disastrous condition is the supposed necessity of retaining gigantic possessions in opposition to the wish of the people, and in contravention of natural territorial arrangements. Italy is all but free, and the last days of the year were surely among those of the Bourbon Monarchy. Austria is in a pitiable state, and is labouring on the last defences of the ex-King, who stubbornly clings to a few fortifications, which mean nothing, now that the sceptre has been adjudged to other hands than his own, and whence he has been adjured by his most compassionate neighbours to depart, as a chosen shell may give to a tyrant's soldier's grave. The Pope makes no sign at the moment, beyond sending out laments, and demands upon the Roman Catholic world for money; and the very aristocracy of Rome are holding themselves aloof from the scheme, indeed, making a loyal demonstration; while others, almost as significantly, protest against being involved in any participation in his Holiness's quarrel. Neither in Germany, Spain, the Peninsula, nor the North, is any movement of importance taking place, and the state of affairs in the south of the States of Austria, some of the constituents of the first-named "geographical expression" will be precariously situated, and may collapse rather than amalgamate, unless wise in time. Russia is watching with Christian calm the progressive disintegration of Turkey with sinister glance on the prolonged occupation of Syria by the army of France. The "sick man" is in a most unsatisfactory state, and the spasmodic efforts he is making in order to show himself convalescent are in themselves debilitating, and present a bad age to diplomatic physicians. Yet he has been long moribund, and may linger like an aged spinster who, in the possession of an annuity, scandalises her friends, and especially the grantors, by her unreasonable longevity. In Africa the state of affairs in Abyssinia is somewhat unanimately denounced by Lord Palmerston—is the only point for mention, unless we add that the vigorous prosecution of the Livingstone expedition may at this very time be preparing the way for results in which our children's children shall be profoundly interested. The great American Republic is agitated by the slavery question, and at this moment it is impossible to say whether the combined agency of an idea and of a commercial instinct may not sever the mighty Union and give the map a new country. In Mexico all is rapine, violence, fraud, and priestly intrigue, and it does not seem probable that much time can elapse before foreign swords are called in to establish something like order. Brazil is pursuing a wise course: internal improvements of various kinds are developing the resources of a glorious country, and the Empire in the South promises a noble rivalry with the Republic of the North. And with this rapid glance, which has almost literally surveyed mankind from China to Peru, we may commence our record of the new year, in all thankfulness for the numerous boons conferred, during the last, by an all-merciful Providence, and in the assured belief that if England be true to herself, and obedient to the teachings of religion, humanity, and sound sense, she will be able, at the close of 1871, to look back upon its incidents, be they what they may, with the legitimate pride of the Queen of Nations.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

It is stated that the Cathedral at Bristol will be reopened for service at Easter.

The Rev. Hamilton Dicker is appointed Chaplain to the British Consulate at Nice.

The Ceylon papers report the death of the Rev. Henry Whitley, missionary of the Church Missionary Society in that island, returned from the fall of a wall in the Mission Compound, burying him in the ruins.

The piece of ground allotted as a burial-place for the Congregationalists of Sunderland, and which has been already used, was consecrated on Thursday week by the Bishop of St. Davids.

The rectory of Ashbrittle, near Wellbrook, has been filled for 126 years by three clergymen only—viz., Rev. Mr. Wilson, 59 years; Rev. Mr. Townley, 41 years; and the present Rector, 27 years.

The Clayton Memorial Church at Newcastle is ready for opening. Consecration is for the present deferred, to allow time to complete arrangements for the endowment of the parsonage.

The new Church of St. Paul's, Onslow square, South Kensington, was on Sunday consecrated by the Bishop of London, who also preached in the church to a large congregation. The building, which is calculated to hold about 1,000 persons, is in the pointed style of ecclesiastic architecture. Nearly one-fourth of the sittings are to be free, or let at a merely nominal rent.

The special Sunday evening services in Westminster Abbey will commence with the first Sunday in the New Year. The procession for the month of January will be:—Jan. 2, the Rev. the Lord John Thynne, Sub-Dean of Westminster; Jan. 16, the Rev. T. Pennyman, Canon of Westminster; Jan. 30, the Rev. Daniel Moore, Incumbent of Camden Church, Camberwell; Feb. 27, the Rev. Dr. Jeune, Master.

Messrs. William Kaye and Son, manufacturers, Clayton West, in conjunction with Mr. William Kaye, jun., of Melbourne, Australia, have announced their intention of erecting a large school and new church there on Clayton Wash, which they propose to endow and give to the residents of the township. The cost will exceed £10,000, it is said, from £8,000.

The laying of the corner-stone of the proposed new Church of All Saints, Lambeth, took place on Saturday last. The church is to be built and endowed by Mr. Heywood for a district containing a population of about 20,000 inhabitants, out of the limits of the parishes of Kennington, Lambeth, and Clapham.

A Book-hawking Association in connection with the Church of England has been established in the Dean Forest division of Gloucestershire.

St. Peter's Church, at Quernmore, near Lancaster, erected at the expense of the Rev. Richard Cawthorne Farrer, was consecrated a quarter week by the Bishop of the diocese.

The committee of the Clerical Fund and Poor Clergy Relief Society have made during the past year grants to ninety poor clergymen, incumbents and curates, amounting to £2,000, and to eighteen widows of clergymen, £111: a total of £2,04. In addition to these grants of money they have distributed as free gifts numerous articles of clothing, and also the estimated value of which is £344. The society is one of the most valuable in the metropolis, as the Clerical Fund is open to clergymen of all dioceses and their widows in England, Wales, and Ireland.

The Rev. Thomas Lee, D.D., George's-in-the-East, writes a letter to the Bishop of London, designed as "a public and solemn protest" against the ritualistic practices which are being introduced into his parish. At the conclusion of the letter Mr. King says—"Even you, my Lord, can scarcely be sanguine enough to suppose that I should respect the acts of your late illegal aggression upon my return to my charge."

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE.—Oxford: The election to a fellowship at Queen's College, vacated in favour of J. R. Green, B.A., scholar and catechiser of Oriel, who obtained the Stanhope prize in the present year, has been declared to be between Mr. Cox, Balliols to the head of Balliol will cause a vacancy in the Mastership of Catherine College. The Rolleian prize for the essay on "The Influence of Christianity on the Fine Arts" has been awarded to Mr. Bodley, of Magdalen. The Chancellor's prizes for Latin verse and Pulsers of King's College, Cambridge, have presented cards of their service to Mr. Woodroffe, of Trinity, who has been appointed valedictorian. The celebration of a Lent Reader by the students to the University of Aberdeen took place yesterday week, when the new professor, the Rev. Mr. Mair, and Angus subscribed to Sir Andrew Leith Hay, and in the Buchan and Moray nationsfor Mr. Maitland, M.P. for Aberdeenshire, who was also elected by a majority, but unfortunately the returns were in favour of Sir Andrew. His casting vote is said to be with the Principal, who, being absent from the poll within twenty-four days.—The winner speeches of St. Paul's School were delivered on Thursday week, when the Governors' prize was awarded to A. W. Jones, the head boy of the school, for a translation of Thompson's "Brook." The speeches were delivered throughout with great spirit and accuracy.

TESTIMONIALS TO CLERGYMEN.—The Rev. T. Taylor, who is retiring from the ancient Presbyterian Congregation, Crescent Lane residence, has been presented by some members of his congregation with a handsome silver tea and coffee service, and a purse containing 100 sovereigns. Rinkle. Another testimonial, so intestaal, was presented at the same time to the Rev. Henry Hay Cooper, of the Presbyterian School, Crescent Lane. Mr. Taylor's exertions have been unremitting.—The Rev. H. J. Boddy, on resigning the curacy of Ashton-under-Lyne, has been presented by his parishioners with thirty-three sovereigns, from parishioners and friends; also a gold pencil-case and seal, and a purse of gold. The Rev. Thomas Brownlie, D.D., Free Church minister of Dundee, has been presented by his congregation with a purse containing 1,000 guineas, as a piece of gold from seven silver from the parishioners of Dursley, on his resigning the curacy.

APPOINTMENTS.—Appointments.—The Rev. G. C. Hodgson, Vicar of Barlow, to be Rural Dean of Parish; Rev. W. K. Marshall, Vicar of Bolton, to be Rural Dean; Rev. J. METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE COURT.

On Tuesday last the Prince Consort, attended by Prince Leiningen, left Windsor for London, and honoured Mr. Durham's studio with a visit, to inspect the model for the memorial of the Exhibition of 1851. The Prince of Wales and Prince Alfred visited on the ice in the Home Park.

At the service on Sunday morning in the private chapel Dr. Goulburn preached.

On Monday Prince Louis and Princess Alice walked together with the Queen in the Home Park. The Prince Consort, with the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, and the Prince of Leiningen, went out shooting. Prince Arthur visited.

On Christmas Day, at the service in the private chapel, the Queen and Prince Consort, the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, Princess Alice, Prince Arthur, Prince Louis, Princess Helena, the Princess Dowager of Hohenlohe, the Princess of Leiningen, and the Dean of Windsor presented the Sacrament, administered by the Bishop of Oxford. Prince Louis and the Princess of Leiningen visited the Queen and took luncheon.

On Wednesday the Royal dinner party included the Prince of Wales, Princess Alice, Prince Louis of Hesse, Lady Caroline Barrington, Baron Gruneisen, Baron von Wendtland, Lieut.-Colonel Keppel, the Rev. Dr. Wilmott, &c.

PRINCE ALFRED.

His Royal Highness Prince Alfred, attended by Major Cowell and Major Du Plat, left Windsor Castle at half-past two o'clock on Wednesday for Dover, en route to Berlin, where the Prince will remain for a few days on a visit to the Royal Highness Prince and Princess Frederick William. Their Royal Highness will afterwards visit the Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg at Gotha, and return by Ostend to England about the end of January. It is not to be understood that his Royal Highness Prince Alfred will embark at Plymouth, on the 14th of January next, for Rodney's ship St. George, Captain the Hon. F. Egerton, and proceed immediately to the North American and West Indian stations.

THE ROYAL BOUNTY.

On Friday and Saturday in the past, and on Monday and Wednesday in the current week, the Royal Bounty of equal sums was given to the clergy of the Established Church residing or serving in London and its vicinity, under the supervision of Lord Lyttelton, Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, Lord Overstone, Lord Sandhurst, and by George Hamly Bag, Secretary and Yeoman of her Majesty's Royal Bounty, its administrator. The applications were unusually numerous. The number relieved amounted to nearly 1000 persons.

Most of the Cabinet Ministers have left town for the Christmas holidays. Lord Palmerston is staying at his seat, Broadlands, near Romsey. Lord Sidney Herbert is at Wilton House, the seat of the Earl of Pembroke. Lord Russell returned to his residence, Pembroke Lodge, Richmond Park, on Saturday last. Lord Granville, since his Lordship's brother, the Duke of Sutherland, died, is very ill. The Duke of Argyll is at Inverary Castle, Scotland. Sir George Grey, Bart. (Home Secretary), Mr. Milner Gibson, and Mr. Cardwell are also absent from London.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS

The will of Sir Evan Nepean, late Governor of Bombay, Duke of Richmond and Lennox, Earl of March and Darnley, Baron Settrington and Methven, and Baronet of Nova Scotia, Knight of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Knight Peak, Dennis, and of Portland-place, bears date the 16th of July, 1850, and is very brief. It merely, by a few specialties and an ample gift of the residue, leaves Duke of Richmond and Lennox, sole executor, to whom probate was granted on the 17th of December by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the personalty was sworn under £120,000. The dispositions contained in the will are to the following effect:—His Grace bequeaths to his executor all family pictures, both ancient and modern, contained in Gordon Castle, he held in trust as "heir-male successively" according to the entail of the Gordon estates, and family pictures contained at his Grace's seat, Goodwood, and at his town mansion, Portland-place, he held in trust for the heir-male of the family devises and bequeaths the whole of his property, real and personal, to his son and executor, his second son, Lord Henry Charles Gordon-Lennox, and in case he will, there being no other blessed whatever. The attesting witnesses thereto are Mr. Edward Bowyer, Mr. Thomas Bowyer, and Mr. Charles Bowyer Adderley, all Portland-place, Middlesex.

The will of Admiral Sir Charles Napier, K.C.B., M.P., for Southwark, of Merchistoun Hall, Dunfermline, Hants, and Portland-place, bears date the 6th of December, 1848, was proved in the London Court of Probate on the 15th of December, 1860, by Charles Napier, Esq., Lieutenant in the Royal Navy, and the Rev. Henry Jodrell, M.A., Chaplain to the Duke of Leeds, and Rector of Guilden, Cheshire, two of the executors named in the will, the Right Hon. Francis Lord Napier, of Thirlestane, Scotland. The personalty was sworn under £30,000. Sir Charles died at his residence, Merchistoun Hall, on the 6th October last. The disposition of the will are confined to a few sentences giving the bulk of his property to his wife, Lady Napier, for her life or widowhood, and to his son, Charles Napier, a lieutenant in the Royal Navy, and the late Admiral's residence, Merchistoun Hall, with a number contained in the Dunfermline estate, which annually sold by public auction, but decease and succeed to be children. This will was executed by Sir Charles Napier on the 6th of December, 1848, in the name R. S. Sir Charles Napier, the 6th of October last, was a Scotch gallant Admiral, who was eminent in his profession, was decorated with several foreign and British orders.

The will of his Excellency Sir Henry George Ward, G.C.M.G., Governor of Madras, Knight Commander and Companion of the Bath, bears date the 14th of August, 1858, at Queen Park, Rochford. The executors nominated are he relict, Emily Lady Ward, and Henry Thomas Anchor, Esq., Colonel in the army, and both renounced the grant of probate, whereupon letters of administration, with the will annexed, were taken out on the 17th of December in the London Court by Swinburne Ward, Esq., the testator's son. The personalty in this country was sworn under £6,000. Sir Henry died at Madras on the 13th of October last. The disposition of the will are confined to a few sentences giving the bulk of his property to his wife, Lady Ward, for her life or widowhood, and to his son, Swinburne Ward, a lieutenant in the Royal Navy, and the late Admiral's residence, Queen Park, Rochford, Essex, with a number contained in the estate, which annually sold by public auction, but decease and succeed to be children. This will was executed by Sir Henry Ward on the 14th of August, 1858

THE MEETING OF GENERAL GARIBALDI AND VICTOR EMMANUEL ON THE 26TH OF OCTOBER, NEAR TEANO.

UEL ON THE 25TH OF OCTOBER, NEAR TEANO.

THE HISTORY OF CHESS.*

The learning and researches of Hyde and Sir William Jones did much to disenchant the vexata quæstio of the origin of chess from the visionary hypotheses adopted by such writers as Roy Legge, Carnera, and Salvio, and to those distinguished Orientalists must in fairness be ascribed the merit of having first investigated the subject in a rational and scientific manner. But they far from exhausted it, and their discoveries are little known except to scholars. So little, indeed, that it is not at all uncommon to hear, even in those periods where general intelligence is respectable, a discussion on primeval chess, in which the claims of the Chinese, the Egyptians, the Scythian shepherds, Palamedes, and the brothers Lydo and Tyrrhenus are as gravely considered as though these claimants were based on sound historic evidence, instead of being, as they are, merely chimerical from beginning to end.

The author of the work before us is favourably known as an Oriental scholar, and as the writer of several books in that branch of learning which are regarded as authorities among readers of the Eastern languages. He is known, also, in chess society as an enthusiastic and accomplished player of the Italian game, with only such modifications as the tactic it not surprising that he should have given the world an instructive if not entertaining treatment of the history of chess. A casual perusal of the book upon its first appearance induced us to speak of it in commendatory terms. A subsequent examination convinces the good impression it then made upon us, and we have now no hesitation in asserting that it is worthy of the most careful study by all who wish to obtain a full and comprehensive knowledge of the ancient game which Hyde, Sir William Jones, and Dr. Forbes contain in summary to be pursued of modern chess.

To a portion of our readers the outline of Dr. Forbes's "History" will be unnecessary, as constituting a series of papers on the Indian origin of chess, which he contributed to this Journal about six years back. The original sketches, however, bear so small a proportion to the present volume that the latter may be regarded as a work of pure fiction. The history of chess, according to Dr. Forbes's arrangement, falls under three distinct periods. The first, from the 6th to the 15th century called Chaturanga, a game invented in India, but at a period so remote that the date of its origination will probably be determined chess. This primitive chess, to which, it is agreed, we owe our modern game, is described in one of the Vedas, or Hindu Bibles, and in the days of Yudhishtira, the son of Pandu, who, according to Hindu chronology, flourished 3000 years before the beginning of the Christian era! Then, too, the game inhabited distinct countries, was played by the rich and was a remarkable, the moves and powers of some of the pieces employed were the same precisely as those of the game which is known to the close of the fifteenth century. For the exact manner in which the Chaturanga was played the reader must consult Dr. Forbes's tobe for the first time has thoroughly analysed its principles and powers, not merely in what is known as the "old game" (a more important) how this primordial game was in its infancy conducted. It must suffice here for us to say that the game was played by four persons, not against a king, a black king, and a white king (represented by a thigh), and four Pawns; that the two opposite players were allied against the other two; and that victory was decided by the capture of an oblong die having four faces marked with the numbers 2, 3, 4, and 5.

The second era in the history of chess was that of the medieval game, common to the Persians, Arabs, and Europeans, and the passing of this period the Chaturanga, which is supposed to have remained unchanged for three or four thousand years, underwent considerable modification. The Mussulmans and Persians, who first introduced the same, but the two allied armies became united as a single body on one side of the field of battle, while the Hindus continued to array their forces in like manner on the other. This change in the disposition of the forces was followed by a change in the game itself. On the one side, rendered two of the Kings no longer necessary. One on each side, then, was used as subordinate officer, and the Persians termed him the Fahin or Wazir—i., Counsellor or Minister. The Rook and Bishop were transposed, each being stationed on the spot he at present occupies; the die was discarded, and the game was subjected to a fair trial of intellectual skill. The description of this modified game—Shatranj, by the Persians named nerd—presents a considerable variation from the fifth to the fifteenth century, is perhaps the most valuable portion of Dr. Forbes's labours, and will form the most permanent basis for any account of "Chess in Europe" during the middle ages. For the development of the undertaking the materials are more copious than for the former, and his extracts from the poetical literature of Persia which relate to the introduction of chess into that country read like chapters out of the "Arabian Nights." The Brahmin and his following account from the Shahnama of the introduction of chess into Persia, in the reign of Noushirwan:—

"Once upon a time the victorious Kiers Noushirwan was seated upon his throne, in the gorgeous hall of audience, surrounded by men stood the sobbe, the brave, the learned, and the virtuous, assembled from Balkh and Bukhara, and from all the provinces of his extensive dominions. Meanwhile entered the three ambassadors from India, and said, Sire, they approached an ambassador from the Sovereign of Hind.] He is accompanied by a train of elephants and camels, together with a thousand camels heavily laden; the whole escorted by a numerous and gallant array of Scindian horsemen. All this is entered into the presence of the just and the renowned Sovereign of Iran.]

When Kiers Noushirwan heard the words of the ambassador he forthwith dispatched a chosen body of the finest troops, both horse and foot, in order to receive with the honour the embassy from the King of Hind. At length the Ambassador approached the throne, and was introduced into the presence of the Persian King. To the latter he made a low obeisance, after the manner of his country, and then he ordered the costly presents sent by his Sovereign to be displayed. First of all, in front of the throne, were placed the elephants, each furnished with a gorgeous canopy overhead with gold and silver, and with rich gems the most splendid that India yields. Then in the midst of the spacious hall, the rich bales were opened, containing numerous caskets of jewels the most precious. There were diadems, and chains, and armlets, and rings, and gems of the most valuable value. There were various perfumes of surpassing fragrance—of musk and camphor, and wood of aloes, and ambergris. And the magnificence of the treasure chips, together with many other valuables, too numerous to describe, the precious productions of Hind,† and Sind.‡ The crowning present of the embassy, and that which most awakened the admiration of the King and Court, was a chessboard, elaborately constructed, together with the chessmen, tastefully and exclusively from solid pieces of ivory and ebony." These were accompanied by a letter which the Brahmin had written by the Sovereign of India, in which the Persian Monarch was entreated to lay the chessboard before the people of his dominions, who were called upon to exercise their wisdom, that they might discover the principles of the marvellous game for which it was designed. The letter, which we have not room for, is found by Bozurjmihr, the King's chief counsellor, and it became the immediate occupation of the Persian sages.

The arrangement of the pieces in the Shatranj, the Persian modification of the more ancient Chaturanga, were precisely the same as in the European chess of to-day, but the powers of some of the pieces and of the pieces were different. Thus the Farzin, which we call the Queen, could only move one square, and that diagonally. This extreme limitation prevailed in the European game during the twelfth century is apparent from a line quoted by Hyde from an old Latin poem—

Nan Regina non valebit impedire alterum.

The Fil, or elephant, which with us is termed the Bishop, moved two squares diagonally, and that is he attended and protected the square next but one to that on which he stood—but he had no power whatever over the intermediate square.

* "The History of Chess from the Time of the early Invention of the Game in India till the period of its Establishment in Western and Central Europe." By D. Forbes, LL.D. Allen and Co.

† The term chatturanga is composed of two Sanscrit words—chatur, "four," and anga, "a member;" and is nearly equivalent to our word "quadripartite."

‡ India is so called by the Arabs to this day.

§ The name by which the whole Persian empire is generally designated in the Shahnama. The more modern term, Fars, is, strictly speaking, applicable only to a single province in the south of Persia.

‖ Kinoj—a Sanscrit—commonly written Canoge—was the capital of the great kingdom, extending along the Ganges on the western bank at which river the city was built.

The King, the Rook, the Knight, and the Pawn moved and captured as they do now, save that the Pawn was never permitted to advance more than one square at a time. In illustration of the Shatranj Dr. Forbes has been able to collect, from the Oriental MSS. in the British Museum and elsewhere, some invaluable examples of Persian skill at chess; and by the same means he has corrected several serious errors in relation to this mediæval game into which his predecessors had fallen.

The third era in the history of chess is that which commences with the sixteenth century. The changes it then underwent, originating in Spain, have given the game its present form in Europe, and the game has received scarcely any subsequent modification. These alterations consisted in the extension of the Minister's or Queen's power over the whole length of the diagonal line of the board, and also in allowing the Bishop the command of the whole of the diagonal of squares on which he stood. The Queen and the Bishop were placed in the first move one or two squares, at the will of the player, and in the manner now practised in Europe.

Upon the modern game Dr. Forbes of course touches but lightly, as the limited number of pages which his subject allowed him to devote to account of the progress of chess from Persia to Paris is not entitled to the attention of whoever takes up the history of chess at the point where he leaves it. The last of the chapters devoted to Tenuti's great chessboard, to Hyder Ali's chessboard, to the Art of Blindfold Play, to chess in Scandinavia and Russia, and to Chinese chess—the last of which, as our duty in the present instance is necessarily limited to the mere announcement, the leading features of his work, we can afford but a passing reference.

We must conclude, however, without repeating that, to those who may have inclination to make this volume subservient to the purpose of a philosophical inquiry into the early history of chess, it will prove an invaluable, and indispensable auxiliary.

THE THEATRES.

It is noticeable that in every brilliant pant omime season, and when each scene is perfectly lavish with blue fire, tinsel, and spangles, in a tranic pantomime, the Fairy Queen is sure to be a failure, and the two gentlemen have written six, and those, perhaps, the principal ones. The better that the pantomime is, the more necessary it is that the fairy be kept stop to inquire. Harlequin and Clown are waiting for us, flexible figure and grinning face, and pantaloon and the rest of Pantaloon, with a senile smile, holds up his never-failing walking-stick pointing us the way. Why then we can give at present is but short, as we hold over for a larger instalment of new and old jokes, and a complete list of the Christmas entertainments.

Lavish in pantomime, and glittering accessories, as he always is, Mr. E. T. Smith has this year, and in the honoured walls of Her Majesty's Theatre, given us nothing new. The Queen of Diamonds, from which the echoes of the notes of Grisi and Jenny Lind, of Mario and of Reeves, have not yet ceased to vibrate, is a dreary failure. There is no doubt, the fate to which they have submitted is a splendid slavery. The old never-failing story of "Tom Thumb" has supplied Mr. Blanchard with a ripe theme to bring out his inexhaustible stock of puns and jokes, quaint allusions, and puns, strung together in a manner which it is but fair to say is sometimes amusing. The Queen of Fairies, we believe, of the comic vocalist played the part of the Queen, and made a most successful début. Miss Fanny Wells, from the Strand, too, from "Tom" being swallowed by a cow to the batter-pudding episode. The extraordinary-to-some-extent (and hereafter theories), by Mr. William Beverley, is superbly painted. Surely there never was more gorgeous scene witnessed within the walls of Her Majesty's. The pantomime ballet is one of fairy gorgeousness and splendour, and the scene changes first to blue and afterwards to gold, the boughs of the palm-trees rustling, and the fountains playing, and clusters of fruit and glowing enough to send the brains of the young among the spectators drunken, or their beds. The artist was loudly called for, and bowed to the audience.

The pantomime at the Theatre Royal Covent Garden, its legitimate home, is one of the old sort, and is entitled "Harlequin and Mr. Bridgman, and illustrates the life, tyranny, and death of Bluebeard and his liberties in his country. The usual fairy scenic points are received, so much so that the success of the piece was most decided and unequivocal, although the gorgeousness and glitter is not so great as in other theatres. The scene of fiery dragons and flames is delightfully excellent and unfatigueingly sustained by W. H. Payne, Harry Boissett, Charles R. Thompson, Miss Fanny Wells, and Mr. H. Payne's performance in his peculiar walk, and there are certain mercenary of feeling in his acting sufficient to make it a treat to witness. The scene in the pantomime at Covent Garden is, indeed, as well worth seeing as any in London.

But, so far as scenery is concerned—and it would, unfortunately, seem that the excellences can scarcely ever be combined in one representation—the Lyceum is the pantomime of the season, namely that at the Lyceum, in Mr. Falconer's extravaganza of "The Rose and the Ring," which is, as we have said, the best piece of the sort at the highest—pretty in idea, but insignificant in execution. The bits, passages, and scenes which are the best are by Mr. H. Payne, and his scene below but little chance of making any points. There remains therefore, the scenery and the pantomime. Both are magnificent and in the best taste, and the former of which has apparently been equalled on any stage. Mr. Callcott's scenery of last Christmas was remarkably brilliant, but the present scenery of the same painter was such might called before the curtain to receive an ovation from the audience. Such scenery as Mr. Callcott's will be obtained from more decided merit and beauty. Each scene—such as "The Ivy Bush," "The Cave of Gold," "The Fairy Grotto," and "The Last of the May Bloom and Wild Heir," were each of surpassing beauty. In the latter scene the curtain stretched out far beyond the vision of the spectator with amazing effect, and the lights and hues and distant perspective, in atmosphere and the management of any, Mr. Callcott's scenes are unquestionably among the most glorious days. Aided very efficiently by the machinist and illuminator, Mr. Callcott has produced a panorama of effects which, in fact, can never be seen in a picture, and must remain for ever the property of scenic and theatrical management. The closing scene, which gradually unfolds from beauty to beauty, like a grand symphony or fine poem appearing to its climax, is the finest of its kind we have ever beheld, and, as a curious and rich presence of this kind of scenery, we think the manager had the house luxuriously perfumed, so that the scent which upon every sense of delight, and the audience left the scene in a banquet of sight and scent. Words, indeed, are poor to express the gorgeousness of the closing scene, which is a blaze of splendour that fails for Mdme. Colnete and Mr. Callcott, and will be so for weeks to come.

King Pest, whose early visit has this winter astonished most of us, played with Mr. Buckstone's pantomime an unwelcome trick. The great success of the piece—as did the success of Mr. Gumnidge's great "speech"—lay in a lake of real water. Mr. Crummles went no further than "a real pump and tube," and his being more humble was less likely to meet with a hitch than that of Mr. Buckstone. Natural philosophy can easily prove to us that a frozen tank will not do for a waterfall, nor an icy lake for a fury's "limpid pool." The pantomime therefore, was brought to a full stop on the first night, and even exhibited by the audience as well as behind the curtain, did not bring back the even flow of the piece, and "Queen Ladybird and her Children; or, Harlequin and a House on Fire," although not wanting in gorgeousness and richness of scenery and decorations, did not retain the sensation a piece full of such startling effects should do. Mr. Buckstone good-humouredly pacified the audience by a speech, and the evening—a very long one—was happily brought to a close. Let us add that the future of this piece may yet be a bright one.

At the Princess' Theatre the old drama of "Ernestine" was revived as introductory to the business of the Christmas season—by which we mean pantomimic business; and the children and ponies—The Mysteries of minors gentlemen—listened quietly through till the last act, when their mute assent voices were heard making in a large way. Mr. Vining, Thus demanded, Robinson Crusoe commenced his dramatic life, was received with applause, and sang a few good songs, and danced, and danced with great vigour, and with a very lively prologue, till the transformation-scene set showing the Temple of Mr. Byrom's language was of wit and repartee, and the introductory matter was more than usually full of pertinent fun, and generally to be found in such pieces. The acting throughout was that to which we are entranced, as Mr. Meadows, Leslie, Shore, and Saker, particularly distinguishing themselves. But Mr. Harris's production of the piece was the best thing of all. It was the merit of combining fun and brilliancy, both of scenery and language, and that, too, in a most remarkable degree.

The "Colleen Bawn" at the Adelphi has such a perpetual attraction—a charm that is inexhaustible—that it "does" up" by a pantomime to run till Easter—indeed, it may run beyond that time. Pantomime there is, however, a severe trial for any piece, and a Boxing-night audience a test of its merits. Under a certain circumstances, however, we think that a West-end audience wishes to leave the holiday-makers to themselves for a "vacation." Both of these points were examined "Bluebeard from a New Point of View" is the title of the second farce which Mr. Byrom has set before the Adelphi audience. Mr. Toole, as the hero, is dressed peculiarly. He is, in fact, "half modern and half Bluebeard," and wears not the conventional blue beard, but those military "wry whiskers" which certain regulations at Aldershott have recently abolished. This is certainly a new point of view of the old Bluebeard. And as Mr. Toole puts it this—that sister Anne is not the gentle creature we remember in our nursery days, but a strong-minded female, who can hold her own with remarkable energy by Miss Kate Kelly. Mr. Paul Bedford, the hero of the Bluebeard chamber of horrors, is a character of a very droll kind, much decorum and gravity—the latter qualities being absolutely necessary in Bedford's case. The performance of itself is a good one, the acting remarkably able, and the scenery more than usually good. For a few hours at the end, Messrs. Phillips and Thompson have thrown in their usual quantity of pantomime, and we can only say that the transformation is—where gorgeous lights and transparencies serve still more to bewilder—perfect. The scene has been invented and executed by Mr. Toole's dexterous and Mr. Byrom's pens.

A new drama, entitled "Ravenswood," the notice of which we must defer, opened the business of the evening at the St. James's, and Mr. William Beverley's burlesque of "Ravenswood" followed. Perhaps a Christmas notice is not exactly the place to say much in the matter of how far burlesque-writers are justified in reducing the beauties of poetic genius to the level of the capacities of a pantomime audience; but, whatever we may say, they are sure to do it. Day by day the old stories are broken up and distorted, and "Ivanhoe" is made into "Rebecca," and possibly "Paradise Lost" will top the transactions—not by any means impossible—for burlesque. There is another objection, on the score of allusion, which we cannot urge here, but which should be urged, and that very seriously, somewhere. The minor Latin poets had a much better chance for fun in this line than the minor ones had for good; and even now Mr. Wm. Brough may be more widely effective than Mr. Wm. Brough, the writer of "Endymion," which otherwise is a thing of beauty as regards the scenery and dresses. Mr. Compton and Mr. Addison, Mr. Archibald, Miss Swanborough, Mrs. Chase as Ospio were especially attractive. Actors is, of course, metaphorical, and the piece concluded with a chorus of "Bow, wow, wow," which pleased the gods. The bath of Diana was an exquisite scene; and that which brought the whole to a close, "Endymion's Dream, or the Man in the Moon," was the finest thing in the burlesque it was. "Endymion" is a decided success; and the ways in which it was illustrated, and the music, and the metrical, no less than the subject, more careful and classical writing.

We must defer other notices till next week.

THE WEATHER.

SEVERE weather has come upon us. In London there has been skating on almost almost all the park waters, and a real accident occurred in the Serpentine, by the breaking in of the ice, on Saturday afternoon, whereby a boy drowned. Last Saturday night Agnes Rigell, an old woman of seventy-three, was found dead in her bed, in a miserable apartment in Gee-street, Goswell-road. Her husband threw her daughter and a friend went to her, and, finding her very cold, covered her over with the bed-clothes, and reported she to have died before medical aid could be obtained expired. A post-mortem examination showed congestion of the lungs.

Accounts come from all parts of the country of the severity of the temperature. Mr. Glaisher, of the Greenwich Observatory, has left the observatory at Beacon, "Perhaps the most extraordinary cold ever known in England, and the thermometer has registered 3 deg. below zero, and in the grass 19 deg. below zero, or 49 deg. of frost. I have just seen a thermometer which for some time inches in length and as thick as three fingers." Several letters appear in the papers of the 19th from Scotland. Mr. Lowe, of Perth, Scotland writes—"The frost was intense; a thick fog was stretched over the valley of the Tay, and the air had numerous floating crystals in it hardly to be seen by the naked eye. The snow was deep, and the drifts were as the trees is magnificent, but it may be anticipated that the effects on vegetation will be most disastrous." The Rev. Dr. Kingsley, of Eversley, Hampshire, has said to have registered 3 deg. below zero. During the last fifty years the highest degree of cold observed is believed to have been on the morning of January 30, 1838, when the thermometer registered 3 deg. below zero, or 35 deg. of frost.

There has been a very general fall of snow. In the north it lies to the depth of a foot, or even more, and the roads have been rendered impassable for railways. More south, in Hampshire, the railway has been blocked up with four to five feet of snow. Dundee and Arbroath have announced the snow-ploughs to be out to-day. Dundee and Arbroath have announced the frost and snow to be in the hands of British merchants.

The Duke of Newcastle has just published the names of those artists who have received the Order of Leopold in consequence of the distribution of Prizes at the Universal Exhibition of 1862. The foreign artists named are—M. Troyon, Jordan and Muller, of Paris; Sir Edwin Landseer and Mr. Cockerell, of the Royal Academy; and Mr. Herdman, of Dusseldorf.

Letters from Teheran of the 13th ult. state that the corps d'armée which was operating in the west under the orders of Prince Hamza Mirzaha had obtained a great advantage over the Turcomans. It encountered a check in attacking the Tekehs, a large tribe of Turcomania. Reinforcements were sent to the Prince, and he has since taken the fortress of these people.

A Paris letter in the Nord says:—"The negotiations lately entered into with the English Government for obtaining more favourable conditions for the Suez Canal have been concluded with such terminate successfully. There is even reason to hope that the Mediterranean navigation will be established, in conformity with the wishes of all commercial nations, before the end of France."

The celebrated collection of objects of art and curiosity of the Prince de Soltikoff, the sale of which by auction was about to take place, but was temporarily stopped by the Russian Government, and has now been conveyed to the Louvre. The Minister of the Interior is to receive a part of them.

THE PATTERN POST-OFFICE UNIFORM FOR 1861.

THE accompanying Engraving represents the new pattern uniform, as designed by Tait Brothers and Co., army contractors, Union Hall, Borough, which has been decided upon for 1861 for the letter-carriers, mail-guards, and drivers in the employ of the Post Office throughout the United Kingdom. The letter-carriers will be supplied with two complete suits annually, for summer and winter wear, and a warm waterproof Inverness cape biennially. The uniform consists of a blue frock-coat, with scarlet collar, cuffs, and facings, the initials G. P. O., with the number underneath, being embroidered in white on each side of the collar. The buttons are of a superior quality and finish, and have also the initials engraved on them. The trousers are of dark blue cloth, with a broad scarlet stripe in a scarlet cord at each side. The trousers are a dark-grey stripe, with a scarlet cord at each side. The mail-driver's frock-coat will be similar to the letter-carrier's, with the exception of a gold-lace trimming and gold-embroidered initials. The mail-guard's coat, made of fine scarlet cloth, is a double-breasted frock, richly braided with gold lace, and the same device, which is blue, has the initials G.P.O. embroidered in gold on each side. All the garments are made under Mr. Merritt's method of measurement. Contrasted with the shabby-looking and ill-fitting red coat and coarse trousers of the present clothing consists, this is a decided improvement, and it would have been still more so had a decision been arrived at to add a smart blue cap to match the uniform, instead of the heavy and uncomfortable felt hat at present worn. We understand this improvement in the clothing has been in a great measure due to Mr. Packham, chief clerk, and the inspector of clothing, who have taken great interest in the matter.

THE FARM.

A RNOT, which for intensity in some of the northern counties finds no parallel within the last thirty years, has so far proved the sexpalls night, and agricultural meteorology wrong. The following statement of the number of rainy days in each month to date as follows:—"Some laugh at the idea of a green Christmas in the midst of such severe frost, and more snow; but on December 25 we shall be in the sign of Jupiter, when, from the moist and mild constitution of the former, and the heat-making properties of the latter, there will be more rain, and less rain, with a great remission of temperature." Again, after drawing a parallel between the temperature of the years 1814 and 1866, Mr. Tilman was stationary with the sun in opposition to Herschel, and of his 20 and 27, when Mercury came to the opposition of Jupiter, he triumphantly concludes as follows:—"Why, then, should we doubt the united influence of Venus and Jupiter producing similar effects a month later in the year? Should we not look for the 'green Christmas' act with the power of Armstrong guns; and, if skilfully used, will ultimately break down the walls of adamant which bind us?"

Fig dentistry science, as expounded by Professors Simmonds and Hunt, and hard fact, as stated by Mr. Faulkner, are at wide variance in the much-vexed question of the Countess of Chesterfield's prize pen. Both the professors have appeared in print. The former quotes the entry in his note-book of "Fig-trees—remarkable for its results," as if that settles the matter out of hand; and thus combats Mr. Faulkner's opinion as to the efficacy of the fig for the teeth:—"It is a common but an erroneous opinion" that good keeping facilities the growth of the temporary teeth, and thereby delays the permanent. Such a state of things, when existing, is found to depend rather on the wear of the teeth by hard living than on any other circumstance; and the fact is not to be found in nature which are prepared for exhibition by being supplied with cooked food and highly nutritious diet in the form of milk and bread." The very next paragraph in which Professor Simmonds announces the four months' difference in age indirectly proves that the scientific test has been applied to the exhibited animals; and that Mr. Faulkner's simple word is correct. If a man were silly and base enough to risk his life on the soundness of his own teeth after such a severe test as Professor Simmonds's is known to be) for the sake or a few pounds, he would not have long to enjoy the money after he sending two months' jigs to contend in a class for pigs between twelve and eighteen months. The professor's own statement of "facts" is the most conclusive proof of the value of the fig-diet we are about this time, and Mr. Faulkner may safely accept it as such, and invest it no more.

Lord Palmerston has spoken out at Romsey with his wonted confidence and tact on the all-important question of the cottages building commodious cottages on their estates so that the labourer may live in the heart of his work; and Mr. Scott Burn has treated the same subject in a very able paper read by his son-in-law to the London Farmers' Club. He presented his hearers with a voluminous digest of correspondence from several hundred parishes, showing that the balance of testimony is decidedly against the bothy system and its strange "goings on." Bothy-dwelling is declared to be the cause of most of us very much improved in cottage accommodation.

Newspaper has had its annual Christmas "boom," and no less than fifty silver cups have been given away;—to wit, twelve by Lord Tredegar, who also bears a great portion of the £200 silver presentation to the society, and thirty by Mr. Gardner, a Leeds furniture patron of prize, and three several premiums, the best one of which was gained by a native of John Bull's other island, who carried off the Devons were few, and the Shorthorns many, and principally moderate (with the exception of Mr. Stratton's magnificent bull), whilst Lord Leicester and the Herefords were more than usually successful. The show was a very pleasant finale to the breeding-animal and fat-stock year of 1866. Judging from the communications we have received, it will be strange indeed if the Soldier's Bride case does not have the effect of making all stewards and cup givers draw up very much more stringent conditions. Such a neat and cutting little piece of irony at the expense of the show-yard system as that of "Bona Fide" deserves credit, and we quite hail him and his Soldier's Bride as the pair of social regenerators for which the country has been so long going on a-hoping. The metaphor of driving a coach-and-six through an Act of Parliament does all point in connection with the little Wallaby frolic at the York and Darlington Fat Shows.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

WHATEVER the great does may feel on the subject the small-stud men are rather grateful for the refreshing which the frost has brought with it to their one or two hundred pounds. "It is going" now since the beginning of the season has been remarkably heavy. On the whole, the hunting season, which was very late in beginning, is, half, has produced a very fair amount of sport. Foxes are very plentiful, and in one country they quite swarm. Eight brace and a-half about halfway through their days. The Brocklebury have had a good time of it since November 14; and we are glad to hear that the long-talked-of enactment is to be carried out which will make the late gamekeeper huntsman's father, William Smith, on the spot where he received his fatal injury sixteen years ago, and where he has since filled the place in the hunting-field, within little more than a month. Will Potter, Lord Fitzwilliam's huntsman, is to be succeeded by one of his noble accident. His Lordship has been hunting his own hounds, and killed an Easingwold Boy on the 14th inst. Mr. Gordon after a splendid three hours, twenty-six miles away from the kennel. No successor is spoken of to Mr. Drake, who is at issue with some of his neighbours. Mr. Drake has had the will to discharge his huntsman, Ben Goddard, who, although a very excellent man in kennel, is said to be not quite the right sort for the predecessor, Tom Wingfield. We are not altogether sure as to how matters may be made in this town, considering that there are too many counties are becoming more swift than ever to protest about the management, and more slow than ever to pay up. Leicestershire seems to be alive at last to the fact that the arrears into which they allowed their covert fund to fall have quite disgusted Lord Stamford, and hence, by way of paving the way for his successor, a meeting is announced for Monday at Leicester, to discuss what alterations should take place in the present boundaries of the Quorn and Cottesmore Hunts. The Earl of Cardigan, who has always set a very liberal example to hunt subscribers, has the donation list well in hand, and hence we may reasonably expect that Leicestershire will prove itself, as it did in Mr. Greene's mastership, quite equal to a crisis which ought never to have occurred.

The coursing-field has lost one of its most perfect old English gentlemen and greatest enthusiast in a quiet way by the death of Dr. Bellyse, of Dorlod, near Nantwich. He had been in a failing state of health for some time, but he seemed to be much better, and was able not only to come and stay this autumn in the neighbourhood of London, and go about as usual, but to attend the Sudbury Coursing Meeting a fortnight since on his way home. He did not inherit his father's love for racehorses and his wondrous talent for handicapping, but was uniformly faithful to the pay of the leash, and contributed several articles and letters to the press on the subject. He cared more, however, to see other people's dogs work than to hear of his own; and when he did run them latterly it was at meetings within a few miles of his home. He was a sportsman in the true acceptation of the word; and, of some of the Nestors of the present day were to copy his quiet, old-fashioned ways, we should have none of that violent wrangling and deep betting which of late years has cast a blight on the great national sport.

The members have got so jammed together by the frost that the present programme for next week may receive some additions on the chance of open weather. As it now stands as follows:—Sporting Cutterick (O), on Tuesday and Wednesday; Barton-upon-Humber, County Louth (Ob), and Dinmor County Meath on Wednesday and Thursday; Churchtown, Dungannon, and Ellesmere (Salop) on Thursday; Mid Annandale on Friday and Saturday; and Vale of Clwyd (Ob) on Saturday. Mr. Black Drummond and the Hon. Leicester Colville will officiate as the Mountainstown meeting; and the Masters of Foxhounds Mr. Dalzell and Lord Wilton with their pale black and white heroine than were as Sudbury, when, after beating the highest-class dogs in the kingdom, she won the Veteran gold bracelet, value £50, in a very pretty course with Magdalene.

LORD DERBY AS AN ORATOR.—Not only had Lord Aberdeen one Ear and Lansdowne, as Byron said, "a pair of beards," but Lord Derby, "Athos and Ida, with a dashing sav of eloquence between," he had listened with awe to the eloquence of Pitt and Fox, and witnessed the triumphs of harmless lightnings of Sheridan, he had heard Granville and Grey in their prime. Whatever he may be in the House of Lords now, he was certainly by the hour; and, with all the inclinations of an old man to depreciate the present and to look back with over-fond regard to the past, it may be supposed that we are never more to see the like, that not one of them, as a whole, is to be compared with our own Lord Derby, when he was at his best.—Times.

SIR WILLIAM HAYTER.—We have much pleasure in stating that Lord Palmerston has consented to preside at a dinner, to be given on an early day after the new meeting of Parliament, to Sir William Hayter, on his formal resignation of the position which for nearly ten years he held in the Liberal party as Chief Whip. Sir William has sat for Wells in the House of Commons that some mark should be given of the esteem and respect in which he and his colleagues regard his services to the party, and, in their own honour, most cordially and unanimously filled by the Liberal members. The chair will be taken by Lord Palmerston at 7 o'clock, and the dinner under the presidency of the head of the Government.—Globe.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

CONSIDERABLE.

OUTRO to the holidays, all National Securities have been very inactive; but, compared with the previous week, no change of importance has taken place in the quotations. Consols, for the account, have been done between 90¼ and 90¾, and, altogether, there has been a marked absence of business. The Unfunded Debt has, however, been in moderate request.

The demand for money at the Bank of England has been very limited, and nothing has occurred to alter the rate of discount.

In the open market the supply of capital is large, and the inquiry for it is only moderate.

	Per cent.		Per cent.
Short Bills	2½	Four Months' Bills	2½ to 2¾
Three Months' Bills	2½	Six Months' Bills	2¾ to 3

In the Stock Exchange, from 41 to 5 per cent is the current rate for loans on Government Stocks. Throughout the Continent money appears to be tolerably abundant, and the rates of discount are generally unchanged.

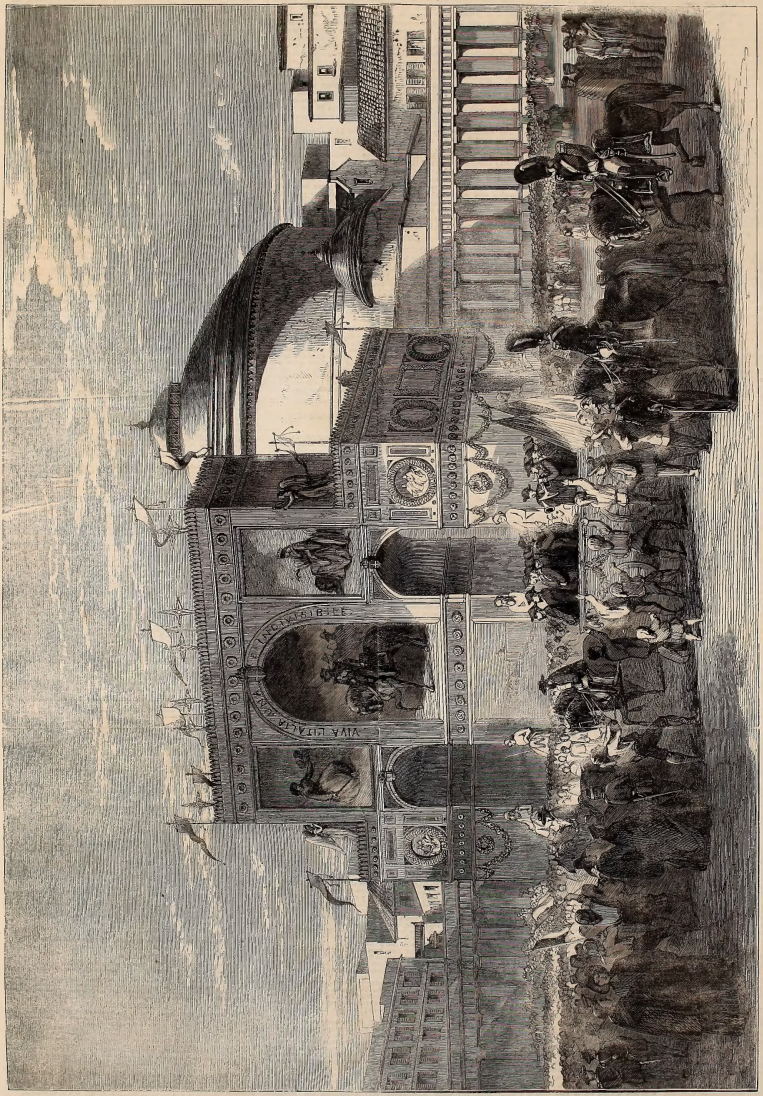
The Board of Trade returns, having reference to our import and export trade, during the month of November, and the eleven months ending with corresponding period in 1859, are very favourable. The total shipments are stated at £27,000,000, against £23,000,000 in 1859. The total imports for the same period were £196,553,502, against £180,000,000 in 1859. The increase is £4,101,991; and with £6,417,216, in 1859.

The subscription list for the new Turkish loan of £3,000,000 have been closed. At the time of writing, applications have been made for the whole of the entire balance.

The shipments of bullion from England to India and China during the present year have amounted to £3,610,787, or £6,191,000 below the total of 1859, but £1,000,000 above the total of 1858. The arrivals of bullion from the Mediterranean ports have been £3,219,192. From a statement recently issued by the Director of Commerce at Berlin, it appears that bullion to the amount of £5,000,000 has been registered in London, amounts to £5,000,000.

The Bank of France has not, as yet, by no means of an assuring character. The exchange upon England continues very favourable to France, and the Bank of France is receiving a considerable amount of gold from the interior. The effect of steady receipts of gold at the Bank of France has been to increase the confidence in various quarters that the Southerners still continue to demand a cessation of hostilities. The Bank of France statement for the week ending last Thursday found necessary to term £2,000,000 Treasury Bonds. Stocks, almost generally, had improved from ½ to 1 per cent.

Letters from Constantinople state that the Treasury Bonds for £1,000,000, issued some years ago, are still in the hands of the public, and that the Government is regarded in a more unfavourable light by the holders of bonds in this country.



The Agents-General for the Crown Colonies announce that they will be prepared to receive, on and after the 1st proximo, tenders for the sale of Cape of Good Hope Six per Cent Debentures. They are to be in bonds of £100 each, redeemable in 1877.

The dealings in the shares of the newly-formed companies have been comparatively trifling during the week. Crystal Palace Shares have been done at Thames and Mersey Marine, 14 to 1½ prem.; Universal Marine Insurance, 1½ to 1¾ prem.; Universal Life Assurance, 1 to 1¼ prem.; and Victoria Fire Insurance, 2 to 2½ prem.

The Railway Share list nearly the whole of the shares in the London and Mediterranean Steam Navigation Company have been placed.

All American Securities have been extremely flat. In prices, however, no change of importance has taken place. Illinois Central for 1875 has been done at £92,3½—viz. £120,360 silver and £16,656 gold for Hunting and £100 in gold to Sterling. The Illinois Central Railroad Company have issued a dividend warrant at £20,328,03, the exports to £21,865,754.

The Stock Exchange was closed on Monday and Tuesday. On Wednesday the demand for Home Stocks was very inactive, and prices ruled a shade lower, the settlement commencing on Thursday. Bank Stock was done at 219 to 220. Reduced Three per Cents were 92¾; New Three per Cents, 92¾; Consols, for Account, 90¾; Three per Cent Annuities, 1726, 90¾; Ditto, Old Annuities, 88; Ditto, Indian Five per Cents, for Account, 101½; Exchequer Bills, 4s. to 1s. discount. The Foreign Securities have been very flat. Mexican was done for Account, ex div, were 92¾; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 92¾; Confederate Loan, 1863, 5 per Cent, were 92¾; Ditto, 1863, 6 per Cent, were 92¾; Ditto, 1863, 6 per Cent, were 92¾; Ditto, 1863, 6

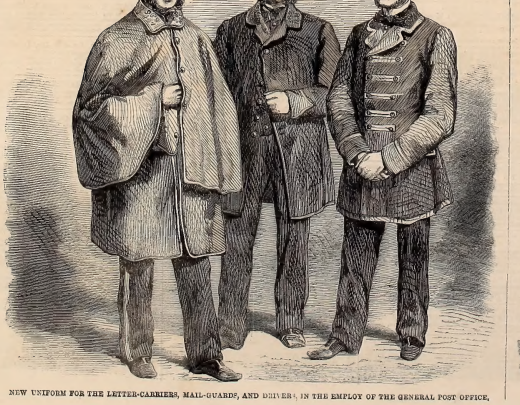
PARIS FASHIONS FOR THE NEW YEAR.



PRIZE FOR RIFLE-SHOOTING AT VINCENNES.

THE magnificent vase of which we give an Engraving has been given by the Emperor of the French to Lieutenant Le Potevin, who made the highest score at the contest of the Normal School of Shooting at Vincennes this year. It is a remarkable specimen of art in more respects than one, and is the work of M. Théard, who executed the beautiful ornaments on the steel gun presented by the Emperor last year to the Queen of England in return for the beautiful piece of ordnance sent to his Majesty by the British Government.

The vase, with its cover, stands about twenty inches high, the Engraving, taken from a photograph, being as nearly as possible one-third of the actual size of the object. The central portion is a cup made from a solid bloodstone, the interior being circular and the exterior octagonal, the sides of the latter being hollowed so as to receive the figures which surround it. The other portions of the vase, with the exception of the foot, are of oxydised silver, relieved here and there with gold and blue enamel. The stem is formed of fascines, surrounded, like the upper portion, by figures of men belonging to all the various corps which were represented at the siege of Sebastopol. These little statuettes are executed with great skill, having been modelled from the life, cast in silver, and afterwards chased and oxydised. In this kind of work M. Théard has established for himself a high reputation. At the top of each edge of the flutes of the cup is an eagle in gold supporting or holding scrolls on which are engraved the names of the battles and skirmishes which took place in the Crimea; and on the tablets and scrolls beneath are the names of all the French Generals who were killed or wounded during the siege. Between the figures spring up, as it were, from the bloody soil branches of laurel, exquisitely chased in gold. The cover, which is entirely of silver, represents the disorder of a breach at the moment of an assault; and the various items of which the mass is made up, common and incongruous enough in themselves, are very artistically executed and thrown together, the whole being surmounted by the figure of a young Sous-Lieutenant of Infantry who first waved the French flag on the Malakoff. The arms and military accoutrements and implements, and all the details of the work, are executed with the most careful precision; but, considering the smallness of the figures and the size of the work, there is a broad effect—an ensemble—that exhibits great artistic ability. The cost of this magnificent prize is no less than 80,000 francs, or £1200.

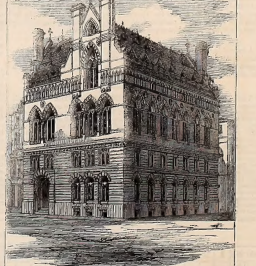
OPENING OF THE NATIONAL SCHOOLS, ST. GILES'S-IN-THE-FIELDS.



A PUBLIC meeting to inaugurate the opening of the National Schools in St. Giles's, Bloomsbury, was held on Wednesday week in the building. Great interest was manifested in the proceedings by a numerous assemblage. Lord John Russell was to have presided, but having been summoned to attend the Duke of Bedford, who is labouring under serious illness, the Hon. A. P. Kinnaird, M.P., was called to the chair. Among the ladies and gentlemen on the platform were the Ven. Archdeacon Sinclair, Miss Burdett Coutts; Sir J. P. Kay Shuttleworth, Bart., LL.D.; Rev. A. W. Thorold (Rector of St. Giles's), Rev. Emilius Bayley (Rector of St. George's, Bloomsbury), Rev. W. H. Hart (Chaplain of Gray's Inn), and Mr. R. M. Barry.

After a hymn had been sung and a prayer offered, the Chairman opened the schools by saying, "In the faith of Jesus Christ, and to the glory of the Eternal Trinity, I open these schools to the children of the labouring classes in the parish of St. Giles-in-the-Fields."

The Rev. A. W. Thorold, the Rector of St. Giles's, then read a short paper on the school building. It stated that the parish contained a population, closely packed, of 37,400 souls. Although much had been done by the exertions of good men in that district, the moral and social position of the working classes was mostly at a very low level. Those numbers represented about 5000 children of school age. Various attempts had been made to give them the elements of instruction. Ragged schools, parochial schools, and night schools had to some extent broken up the fallow ground, and sowed it with Christ's gospel. In all these cases the education was gratuitous, so that other arrangements were necessary to meet the large artisan class who were willing to bear part of the expense. Thirty years ago Mr. Ewdell Tyler, who was the Rector of the parish, erected the schools which they were about leaving, and it was determined that the new schools should be erected when the Government inspector reported that the old schools were deficient in plan and insufficient in accommodation. The site on which the new building was erected had cost £4000. The total cost of the building amounted to £13,500. A grant of £3000 had been made by the committee of the Council of Education, and £9000 had been promptly subscribed by the owners of property and the parishioners, having £500 to be subscribed. The Duke of Bedford had subscribed liberally to the schools.

The Chairman said that it was a matter of deep regret that Lord John Russell had not been able to attend. It had been his privilege for many years, as a member of the House of Commons, to witness the untiring zeal of Lord John Russell in the great cause of national education, the rapid progress of which was highly gratifying. He believed that if there were safety for a country it would be found in a sound scriptural education.

Sir J. K. Shuttleworth regretted the absence of Lord John Russell, because he should have been glad if his Lordship could have had personal experience of the way in which the difficulties of such a parish as this could be overcome by the combined exertions of the Rector and parishioners on the one hand, and the Committee of the Council on Education on the other. He described the parish of St. Giles as a cesspool of the metropolis and a foul ulcer in the body public. Through the medium of those schools he hoped its abandoned population might be effectually reached. The hon. Baronet concluded an eloquent speech by proposing a resolution which recognised the progress of public sympathy in the education of the poor, and expressing a hope that the owners of property in the parish, and the parishioners generally, would make provision for the permanent maintenance of the schools in efficient working order. The Venerable Archdeacon Sinclair, in seconding the resolution, earnestly advocated clerical and lay co-operation in the great work of education. The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Kinnaird having briefly returned thanks for a unanimous vote of thanks which had been passed him, the Doxology was sung and the meeting separated.

In the evening a tea-meeting was held, at which the Rev. Rector presided.

We give, from the Builder, the following description of the building and its appurtenances, which occupy a site, at the north-western corner of Endell-street and Broad-street, 75 feet long, with an average width of 60 feet; while a portion of the land, about 30 feet square, is set apart as a playground and a means of obtaining light and air at the back of the building :—

There are four floors, besides the mezzanines and attics over the staircases. The basement is proposed to be used for a soup-kitchen or for an industrial school. It is abundantly lighted by means of windows in the plinth of the

THE OLD SCHOOLHOUSE, CHURCHYARD, ST. GILES'-IN-THE-FIELDS.

A conversazione in aid of the building fund is proposed to be held in the new schools on the evenings of Thursday and Friday, the 3rd and 4th of January next. Photographs, microscopic objects, antiquities, pictures, and other articles of an attractive and educational character will be exhibited. A band will be in attendance, and refreshments provided at a moderate charge. On the Thursday evening admission will be by tickets of half-a-crown each, and on the Friday evening the working classes will be admitted on a payment of sixpence each.

Annexed is an Engraving of the Old Schoolhouse, St. Giles's Churchyard, built almost thirty years ago by Mr. Hardwick Pyke. The march of improvement is very visible in the contrast shown between the new and the old schools.

THE FREE BLACKS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.—The last mail brings an account of a serious riot at the Victoria Theatre on the 3rd ult. growing out of the prejudices against colour. The coloured population flocked to British Columbia from California in search of their social equality, and they claim to have done, and to be equal in all things to any other race. The white democracy, and the management of the theatre provided seats for its coloured patrons in a separate part of the house. On the night in question the negroes conceived a plan to take possession of the reserved seats. The negroes first forced admittance to the parquette. The whites attempted to expel them. The number on the spot favoured the parquette in point of the fight. The ladies took refuge behind the Stage. A party of negroes, armed with clubs, came to the rescue of their fellows. A number of whites were knocked down and kicked by the negroes. Lighted combine lamps were thrown about, bursting and setting the theatre on fire. The negroes got possession, and drove out the whites, and were in turn repulsed. Some of the negroes had firearms. The genuine Yankee nature was then displayed, and order was restored by the police. One hundred negroes were engaged in the riot. Another meeting on the theatre was appointed for December 10, the day the steamer left. A large police force would be on hand.

THE OLD SCHOOLHOUSE, CHURCHYARD, ST. GILES'-IN-THE-FIELDS.

It is no new observation that an article small and trifling in itself may become an object of considerable interest from its connection with remote antiquity and place in which it is found. If any utensil indispensably American were discovered among the foundations of some English native barrow in the ground undisturbed from the beginning of the fourth century it would open a field of speculation sufficiently spacious for the most speculative and liveliest of our antiquaries. Not quite so perhaps, but yet sufficiently remarkable in the eyes of the archæologist, is the fact that within eighty or a hundred years before the recent opening of intercourse with the Celestial Empire, about sixty seals, undeniably Chinese, were brought to light in a single day out of bog-holes in Ulster, in Ireland. When public attention was first attracted to these seals about twenty years ago by a paper read before the Royal Irish Academy and the question arose among those interested in the discovery across "How came they there, and when?" some unreflecting individual, who appeared to take an Irishman's head as imposed upon by anything wearing an aspect of the marvellous, was pleased to write thus:—"The paper read before the Irish Academy on the Chinese porcelain seals found in Ireland, having inscriptions in a character as old as Confucius, is evidently a hoax. The fact is that long rectangular seals, terminating at one end in an animal and having the name of a person or place, are in common use among the Chinese at present, and employed in stamping on letters, books, deeds, tradesmen's bills, &c. The inscription on the base of these seals is in the Chocentsze or real character, which, though invented long after the period of the Chinese monalist, is in the same use at the present hour as the black-letter for many years, that of books, &c. Several seals of this kind of application were sold last year in London, and perhaps sown in Ireland for the Irish Academy to reap the benefit of. But educated Irishmen have shown themselves to be as acute and well-informed in antiquarian research as their English brethren, the many extraordinary vestiges in their own country having supplied abundant opportunities for the cultivation of their talents in this direction. The Hibernian were naturally impressed that Sheils have been supposed an ignorant of the existence and leading characteristics of modern Chinese seals, and so gullible as to have been deprived by any "sworn foe their benefit." While one writer expressed his opinion that "no one would be so stupefious" as to journey about the most distant parts of Ireland for the purpose of hiding such articles in peat-bogs, burial-grounds, beds of rivers, &c., where mere chance led to their discovery; other writers pointed out their absurdity to any recent Chinese merchant; and some investigators hunted up their history, and had them carefully numbered and catalogued, that these precious relics should not in future period be confounded with any possible importations of later times.

Mr. Edmund Getty, too, was at the trouble to write and publish a minute account of them, recording, as far as he had ascertained, in what locality and at what date each had been found, and furnishing facsimiles of their exterior, with transcriptions accompanied by various Chinese scholars, both at home and abroad. To this gentleman's work we are indebted for our illustration, as well as for the principal facts which have been gleaned respecting these curiosities.

Before proceeding further it should be premised that China letters are not fastened with wax, but with a modicum of rice paste. Formerly, indeed, they were not made fast at all, the only security from inspection being the word "closed," short, "sealed," or the like, either impressed or written upon them.

As to the material and form of these seals, the writer first quoted was signally in error. They are not agalmatite (or rather agalmatolite, a soapstone) nor figured, transparent porcelain, as commonly known, met with, but porcelain, cast in moulds, and subjected to such an intense degree of heat and consequent vitrification that their substance is as perfectly imperishable as the glass and porcelain trinkets found in the mummy cases of Egypt. Neither are they long and rectangular, like those of modern importation, but each is an exact cube, with a Chinese monkey seated on it by way of handle. They are all of precisely similar size and general appearance as to be distinguishable only by the characters on the under or stamping surface. One (marked No. 3 in Mr. Getty's catalogue) was found in the parish of Killyleagh, about the year 1842, in a piece of land which had apparently never been cultivated, and was much covered with ferns. Another (No. 5) was picked up near Carlow, on or about the site of an old road which had been closed since 1815. This road led through an extensive quarry to the Roman-Catholic graveyard, and the seal was disclosed at no great depth while removing some hills of clay over which it was carried. A third (No. 7) was discovered in a bog near the town of Monntrath, in Queen's county, by a man cutting turf, about eighty years since. No. 12 was found in an orchard, in the county of Down, about fifty years back, by some persons who were digging out the roots of an old pear-tree. From the extreme age of this tree it was certain that the road must have lain for a very long period in the place where it was thus accidentally unearthed. No. 36 was discovered in the county of Londonderry, beside Oaks' Green, among some earth; along with it were several human bones, which crumbled into dust when exposed to the air. These facts, with others of a similar kind, seem daring to preclude the idea of a modern importation, and the plain inference from them is, that the arrival of these interesting relics must have been at a date very ancient date. It is considered possible that they may have come from the East, together with the weapons, ornaments, and implements of primeval commerce which were by the Phœnicians, to whom the ports and harbours of Ireland were well known.

Sir John Davis being applied to on the subject, stated that the characters were those of the ancient for any assignable date within our reach. He added that the impressions were more suited to the painting of tumulation, but perfectly recognisable as in the ancient seal characters of China, and often used on the seals of public and private individuals at the present day. Nevertheless, impression having been sent to various Chinese scholars in this country and elsewhere, the answers, when compared, present sufficient resemblance to prove that the characters conveyed a precise idea to a certain class of persons. For example, the first of those we have given above,* which figures in the catalogue as No. 2, is translated by Mr. Gutzlaff, "sealed;" by Mr. Mendown, formerly secretary to the Chinese interpreter at Canton, it is "sacredly protecting the closure. Another translator explains it as "closing of a letter;" and another, a Protestant Chinese, reads it "securely sealed." The next motto (No. 3) is translated, "as soon as the water falls the rocks appear;" "as the water falls, the rocks appear;" "as water falls, appears." The third motto (No. 11) means "the ancient cloud" according to one authority; "a cloud of mist," according to another; "accordant as a watery cloud coming down upon a man," according to a third; while the fourth interprets it to read, "the snow is not before history, or the historian."

The Irish archæologists have offered a sort of challenge to those of kindred pursuits in England to produce another any one of the old side the Channel, a challenge to which we gladly give additional publicity. The public have for many years had access to the museum groups of London, and in others where sailors might be likely to dispose of them. One such, indeed, was in Portsmouth dockyard, but the dispersion, being pressed to recollect how he obtained it, stated that he had bought it from a man who said it had been picked up in Ireland. By some it has been conjectured that these seals were once employed as tea-chests; but then arises the question, how happened it that such were found in Ireland? Others have surmised that they were brought by persons connected with Lord Macartney's embassy; but it appears that there are but few of such seals among the valuable collections which were made by that nobleman, and are preserved by his representatives. The Chinese say that they were yet long, dressed knots of there relics, and may rest in the belief, or hope, or conjecture, that she was in connection directly or indirectly, with the ancient semi-civilisation of China long before Julius Cæsar, the neighbour of conquering Britain.

* Not that with the monkey sitting at top, which is merely an enlarged representation of the seals.

VALUE OF BAROMETER INDICATIONS.

Of the cessation of the hurricane which swept the island of St. Kilda, in the Hebrides, on the 1st of October last, and which gave another outstanding ion on the year inhabitants, the following were the indications of a "Kew Verified Barometer," kept by the Rev. Neil Campbell, minister of the group of islands, as reported by her commander, Captain Otter, R.N. The rapid and regular fall of the mercury in the early part of the night and a half between 8.30 on the 2nd of October and 8.30 a.m. on the 3rd, at which latter time the hurricane began, and its rapid rise during the day, are remarkable confirmations of the certainty by which ensuing weather is indicated by the variable instrument, which is at the same time a most valuable guide to the nautical attendant on Again: Admiral Cator recently reported to the National Life-boat Institution that while in the Mediterranean, in the beginning of October last, the fishermen of that place had expressed to him their gratitude for the information which he had communicated to them, pending the hurricane, had presented to them. A fearful gale from the westward had about this time overwhelmed many of them, and the fishermen were prepared to lose, some of them observed the fall of the barometer, while others disputed its utility and value, and declared that they would not go to sea while the mercury was falling; although it was quite as fine as the day before. At home and elsewhere a terrific gale or wind came on, when they expressed their firm conviction that every one of them would perish. Such was the case, and that not one at least unnecessarily they would have done so, in the absence of the barometer.

Again: Admiral Otter, who has been prepared by James Glaisher, Esq., F.R.S., Superintendent of the Meteorological Department, has issued a diagram which, but on a much larger scale, will be exhibited by the side of the barometer in the Board-room of the Trinity House and other ports of the coasts of the United Kingdom. An inspection of it will show that, till the 9th day of the month, the mercury was nearly stationary, but on the next day there was a decrease to the 28th; and shortly an increase and decrease in the height of the mercury, but not to any extent.

On the 13th day there was scarcely any change; on the 14th, two points of rise; on the 15th, a fall of three points. From 27·00 in the morning, to 27·28 in the evening; on the 16th the lowest reading in the month took place; on the 17th, 18th, and 19th there was a rise, which continued further the night to 29·20 on the following morning; there was a rise of half an inch in the height of the wind and the barometer instructions by Admiral Otter, which will certainly tend to save many lives and to preserve much valuable property from destruction. We may add that the Admiralty, as well as Mr. Glaisher, are cordially co-operating with the Royal National Life-boat Institution in the establishment of thoroughly efficient barometers on the coast.

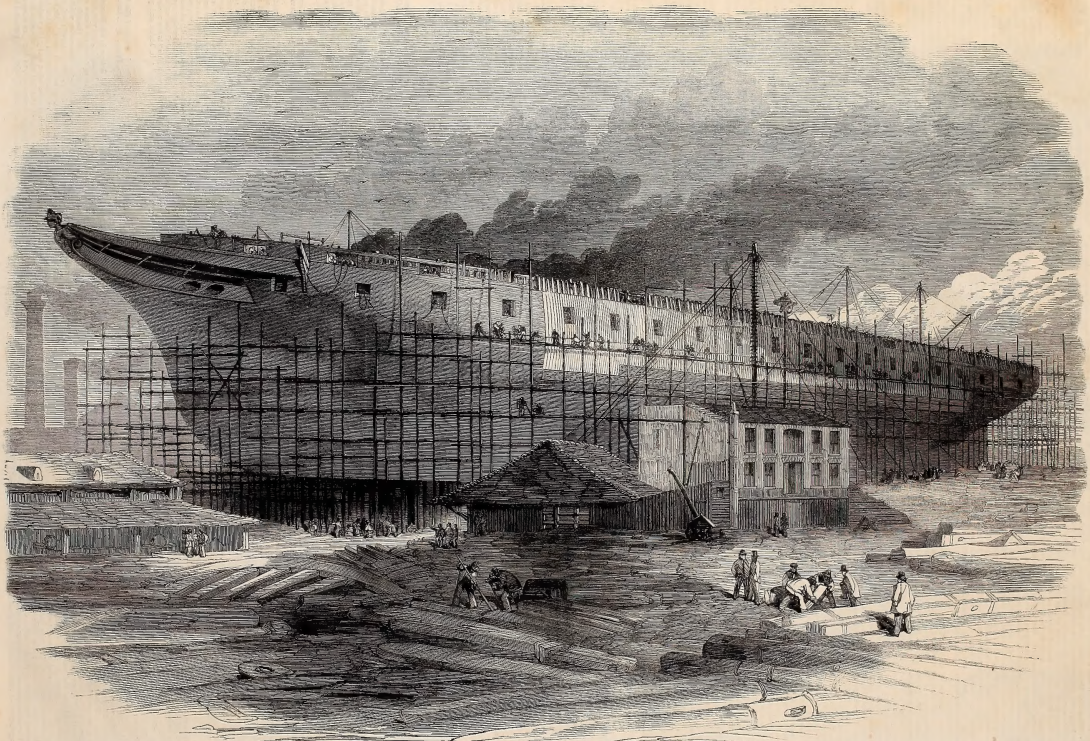
DESTITUTE INCURABLES.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

You were good enough to insert a letter of mine on the subject of "Destitute Incurables" in your edition of the 1st of December. Will you further permit me to call the attention of your readers to a circular which has been addressed to every board of guardians in England proposing the erection of the cruel anomaly of the age by thousand poor sufferers, and suggesting the most obvious mode of relief—namely, the erection of workhouse wards for their reception in separate wards, and there permitted to receive from private charity the comforts which they require. Such a boon, which would have been freely given to them in our two hundred and seventy hospitals and infirmaries, in any case was still cruelly, but which are now denied in the hour of their extreme misery? I trust your readers will be moved to compassion for these most wretched of God's creatures, and will cast themselves in their respective unions to obviate the adoption of our simple plan. In Plymouth Union it is already in full operation. F. M.

John Kenworthy was found guilty at the York Assizes, on Thursday week, of the atrocious attempt to murder a gentleman named Lupton, at Armley, near Leeds, and was sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude.



LITERATURE AND ART.

A MERRY CHRISTMAS and a happy New Year, ladies and gentles all; and how many of us have to write articles on Christmas Day! A merry Christmas and a happy New Year; and how many bondmerry Christmas and a happy New Year; and how many bondservants of the Fourth Estate will be slaving on New-Year's Eve preparing their summaries of the events of the past twelve months! Shall we bid a merry &c., &c., to the theatrical critic who is compelled sternly to refuse all invitations to supper on Boxing Night, having to write a column and a half of Christmas criticism after the pantomimes? or shall we hold the leader of the orchestra or the young ladies of the corps de ballet rejoiced? The first has been busy all Christmas afternoon rehearsing the overture to the pantomime (at his dinner-time generally stewed in a yellow basin) was probably brought to him in the family steward in the theatre. As for the young ladies of the corps de ballet, they have been at Christmas Eve and Christmas Day, comfortably docked at rehearsal at Christmas Eve and Christmas Day, comfortably docked of her salary meanwhile—the theatre being run with perfection as to whence the stage manager's Christmas was passed, and with perplexities as to whence she could procure the money requisite to purchase a new pair of shoes stockings for Boxing Night. We are told that "it suffer and be strong," we presume; and surely it must be admitted that the very humblest departments of letters and art do their full share of suffering in their martyrs.

Their martyrs! A sudden chill comes over us, and we speak with hushed voice when we remember the brave able man whose mangled body was found on the "Russian Railway" during the Christmas week. Poor Mr. Augustus Bowlby was but a newspaper correspondent; a "reporter," if you will; "one of those fellows who write for the papers"—as he was not a tour due to the Russian Railway, but was only "sent out special for the Times," and to "do" the Chinese War. He only performed in China the duties so ably performed in Turkey by Howard Russell in the Crimea and in India. He only did that which has been done by Wingrove Cooke, by Nicholas Woods, by scores of men as gifted and as gallant, who, with no hope of honorific preferment, with no chance of obtaining any other reward than praise or blame, with no pension and are still ready to go forth to the uttermost parts of the earth, notebook in hand, quietly, firmly, unostentatiously doing their duty towards their employers and the public. We may weep over the fate of poor Captain Sword, butchered by the Matchoo demons; we may not a tear due to the memory of the gallant Fenton and the untitled, underrated newspaper correspondent Bowlby? Lord Elgin will probably have a marquisate conferred upon him; Byron Grant will find favour in the eyes of his imperial master; Sir Hope Grant and the officers of his staff will be rewarded with honours and pensions; but small any national recognition—beyond a pecuniary debt to his widow, and that even may be disputed—be accorded to the servant of the accomplished man who has been done so unworthy and yet so glorious?

It seems almost like a fiendish mockery to read that, prior to the solemn interment of Mr. Bowlby and his murdered comrades in the Christian cemetery, their remains were received at a garden at Pekin "appointed for literary men of the first class." Did any of the wretches who tortured, and at last assassinated, our correspondents know what the unpublishable "first-class literary man" might have been applied to one, at least, of their victims?

Quot homines tot sententiæ, this is the old saw, n'est ce pas. Those who wish to mark in its fullest extent the truth of the axiom, "A man's men is a many minds," should read the letter of condolence of the pious Christmas postcard issued by his Eminence Cardinal Wiseman. The Cardinal, in advocacy of the claims of Pius IX. to be ranked with Elizabeth and the leprous beggar—a legend implying a morality which we are not sufficiently enough to refer to our columns. In the cardinalitian pastoral it is given with great unction and a fond flourish of trumpets; and many sentimental or impulsive persons will be, doubtless, be much affected thereby; but, alas! we have but to turn to the pages of Thomas Carlyle ("History of Frederick the Second of Prussia," vol. i., chap. vi.) to find quite another kind of commentary on the saintly character and her miracles. His worthy elder brother (speaking of a certain Conrad) was husband of the lady since called Saint Elizabeth, a very pious but also very silly woman. BUILDING THE GREAT STEAM-FRIGATE "WARRIOR," AT THE THAMES IRONWORKS, BLACKWALL.—SEE PRECEDING PAGE.

THE IRON-CLAD FRIGATE "WARRIOR."

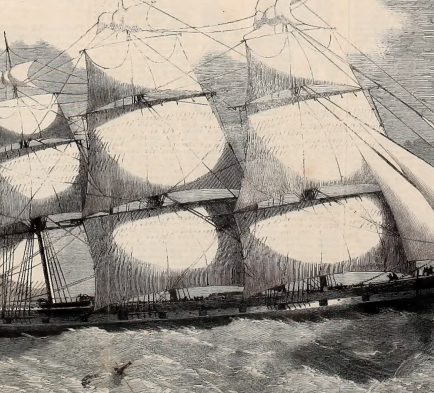
THE launch of this gigantic iron steam-frigate is appointed to take place this afternoon in the River Lea at Blackwall, from the yard of the Thames Iron Works and Shipbuilding Company, and, as the greatest public interest is attached to her and her future performances, a slight description of her build and peculiarities may not be uninteresting to our readers.

The Warrior, the subject of our Engraving, sister vessel to the Black Prince, building in the Clyde, is a complete iron ship of 6039 tons burden, of beautiful model, from the designs of the late Surveyor of the Navy, Sir Baldwin Walker, and consequently, next to the Great Eastern, the largest ship in the world. The Warrior differs in this respect from the much-talked-of French Gloire that she is armour-clad upon iron, while the latter vessel is plated on wood.

The vessel we are describing is 420 feet in length, and 380 feet between the perpendiculars, with a beam of 58 feet. The height between her main and upper decks is 7 feet 6½ inches, and between her main and lower decks 8 feet 10 inches. She is constructed throughout of iron plates five-eighths of an inch thick, with ribs of the most massive character, and strengthened with marvellous ingenuity, both fore and aft, at those parts unprotected by her armour-plates. She is intended to carry 36 guns of the largest calibre between decks. The armament of her upper deck will be regulated by her behaviour at sea. From her keelson to within about five feet below the water-line the Warrior does not outwardly differ in construction from other iron vessels, except in the much greater strength of the material used; but from this point to her gunwale the sides of the ship for about 300 feet are formed into a recess capable of containing two skins or linings of teak timbers, the inner running diagonally and the outer perpendicularly with the vessel's sides, and of the combined thickness of eighteen inches, through which and the iron skin of the ship proper the armour-plates are bolted, rendering what was the recess flush with the vessel's sides.

These armour-plates are formed of the finest wrought iron, all tongued and grooved; they average about 16 ft. in length by 3 ft. wide, and weigh about 3½ tons each. Every plate is bolted on with seventeen 1¼ in. bolts, and upwards of 200 of these plates will be used in clothing her after she is launched, the immense weight of the iron rendering this arrangement prudent. She has twenty ports on the broadside, each 3 ft. 6 in. wide, by 3 ft. 10 in. in height, the lowest 9 ft. clear from her load-line. Her rig and size of spars will be that of an 80-gun ship, and she is strong enough to run into any other ship without injury to herself. Her engines will be of 1250-horse power. She is expected to realise a speed of fourteen knots per hour, and looks quite capable of accomplishing it. The main and upper decks are of wood, lined with iron, and the bulwarks are the ordinary wooden ones of vessels of her class.

THE LATE EARL OF ABERDEEN.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAULL AND POLYBLANK.—SEE "OBITUARY," PAGE 636.



She is built in every way worthy of the celebrated establishment where she has been constructed, under the immediate superintendence of Captain Ford, the managing director, and reflects the highest credit on all concerned in the gigantic undertaking.

THE "GREAT AUSTRALIA" CLIPPER-SHIP.

MESSRS. J. BAINES AND CO., of Liverpool, have just added to their large fleet of Australian emigrant-ships a splendid vessel, named the Great Australia, built for them, under Lloyd's special survey, by Messrs. Stewart and Co., of St. John's, and launched in August last. This noble vessel has commenced her career auspiciously. Laden to the depth of 23½ feet, she made, at the worst season of the year, the run from St. John's to Liverpool in seventeen days. A magnificent three-decker, the Great Australia is 204 feet 10 inches over all; her breadth, 40 feet 5 inches; depth, 29 feet; and her registered tonnage no less than 1660 tons. Built for carrying a good cargo and a considerable number of passengers, her lines are most admirable. She has a neat and light rounded stern, decorated with gilded carved work; and her beautiful figurehead was made for her in this country, and sent out to St. John's, where it was fitted. The passenger accommodation is unrivalled. There is a large house abaft the foremast, 45 feet in length, which is tastefully fitted up for passengers. The saloon aft is about 40 feet in length, and is a model of neatness and splendour. The accommodation for the third-class passengers in the spacious, well-ventilated, and well-lighted 'tween decks is superior to anything that has ever been seen before. The berths are judiciously arranged, and everything about the apartments wears an aspect of comfort and cheerfulness. On the culinary departments every conceivable attention has been bestowed; and the safety of the ship and all on board most considerately cared for. The provision against fire is complete; the anchors are of the best material, and the chain cables have undergone the Admiralty test. The masts and other spars, which have been most carefully made, are of mammoth size yet graceful proportion. Altogether, this may be said to be a model passenger-ship.

DWARF PONIES, COWS, AND SHEEP AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE spirited directory of the People's Palace at Sydenham have taken more than usual pains to adapt their Christmas revels to children; and, by way of "keeping up the ruition," some of the smallest domestic animals in creation have been added to the usual sights in the Transept. Among these are the four "African horses," which vary from twenty-nine to thirty-one inches, and are respectively termed "The Emperor," "Garibaldi," "Victor Emmanuel," and "The African Wonder." The two former are more of the cob order, and are of a light mouse colour, but without the black streak peculiar to the two others, which are said to be of higher African blood. The smallest of them weighing about nine stone, and the biggest little more than ten. In the course of their travels in the neighbourhood of London they have visited Windsor Castle; and her Majesty who once possessed a Java pony nearly as small, but with a longer head, made, we believe, an offer to purchase "The Emperor." A nobleman was also anxious to have the same pony along with "Garibaldi" for a curricle pair, but £50 did not meet the owner's ideas. The thoroughbred ones are lighter and more deerlike in their bone, and more cowhocked, and the whole are carefully groomed, and are capable of much exercise. They are all clipped, the smallest of them weighing about nine stone, and the biggest little more than ten. as handy as kittens, and have followed their guide up the Duke of York's Column, the Monument, and, in short, anywhere he chose to lead them. Some of the cats, their leader says, are very fond of sole-quarters plain and collish, and their lips and nostrils a little reddish; but we have failed to see any appreciable difference between them and the common Shetland pony, except that they would not be called very good specimens of that breed by the keen eye of a connoisseur of those northern isles. They are very tractable, and appear to be very good-natured, and will, no doubt, be a source of much pleasure to the crowds of little farmers in embryo, who hunt in them not exactly for the nut of Barcelona, but for the Scotch and Welsh.

The celebrated forbidders, who rent two specimens of the Strathfield Saye at Baker-street Bazaar, have kept them to the Smithfield Show at Islington, and profess from four to six quarts average short thirty-six inches, and produce from eighteen to twenty pails per day, and of a quality which can be equalled by no cow of any breed in the Metropolis. They much resemble the latter breed in their quaint "pouncy" shape, and are said to be extremely hardy. Baker Sahib, Mr. Bartlett, and Mr. Jamrach, the joint in their acclimatisation efforts, and they seem to have hit the happy medium between a hare and a rabbit, and a fine large sprightly animal, which carry a very fair fleece and weigh specimens from thirteen to fifteen pounds. Such a cross is likely to order fine pounds a quarter. Such a cross is likely to order fine pounds a quarter. So far that John Bull is free from the dignity of a sirloin side-dish, but we fear that John Bull is too utilitarian in his tastes, and will murder our fine cross-breed with Lalipah, and when he has eaten the grass and the paddock with much heartiness unless as the merest curiosity. The performing bull "Don Juan Jumpy" with all his valuable qualities of vaulting at command over your paddock, only fetched twelve guineas last month from a matter-of-fact butcher. In this as it may, Messrs. Baker have quite succeeded for running counter to that national love of size which obtains both on the part of the breeder and the feeder, in the introduction of Lilliputian regards horses, sheep, and cows, by the introduction of Indian breeds of the Ghaut, which are not less and second prizes in their class at the Crystal Palace Show last week. Size has been all the rage for years, and the display of a diminutive specimen of the cattle species, on a pair of them weigh upwards of four pounds, which is twice the weight of the common domestic pigeon. Turkeys, geese, ducks, and fowls have been "improved" into most gigantic proportions; and pigeons should undoubtedly, have their turn at it.

M. Milne Edwards has just published a new part of his celebrated "Leçons de Physiologie and Comparée," which is devoted entirely to the digestive apparatus of vertebrated animals.

The Influence of the Moon upon Atmospheric Temperature and Electricity discussed at the Academy of Sciences, Paris. It of course has been known to Pope's laying down the rule that "the proper study of mankind is man," based upon the results of forty-three years' observations at Greenwich, a copy of which was presented to the Academy by M. Le Verrier by the astronomer, that any one should doubt the agency of the moon in the distribution of heat and electricity in the atmosphere. M. Arago's paper on the subject could scarcely believe that meaningful inquiries were, and thus instance the declension of the moon. Mr. Hopkins, however, has shown the effect of the moon on the clouds of the higher regions only of the atmosphere.

Chromium is a rare metal, obtained from chromate of iron, in 1824, from the Shetland Isles, which was discovered by Klaproth in 1789. The green oxide formed of this metal, which is employed in painting porcelain, was subjected to the action of the electric current by Professor Margueritte, of Geneva, who has published in the Annales de Chimie an account of the experiments by which the chromium was accompanied by an engraving of the crystals formed.

BADGES AND MOTTOES OF PRINCES OF WALES.

ARMS OF THE PRESENT PRINCE OF WALES.

The popular account of the adoption of the ostrich feathers by Edward the Black Prince is a matter which we fear must be classed amongst such traditions as "Whittington and his Cat," and some others of household and general interest. Amongst the famous traditional legends, "Sons of England we have the stories of St. George and the Dragon, Guy Earl of Warwick, and fifty others, which originating, perhaps, in the dark ages, in a spirit of gorgeous and half-informed fancy, were fashioned into a belief by succeeding generations. Amongst the most cherished of these ancient but nebulous ideas is that the crest and motto which have been worn by so many Princes of Wales were won by Edward the Black Prince at the battle of Cressy.

As regards this important crest, Sandford the historian says, when speaking of the battle of Cressy: "Amongst the many eminent men who died that day, on the French part, John Lagarthrop, King of Bohemia, fell by the conquering hand of Prince Edward; the former displayed his cognie surmounted by three ostrich feathers which, in memory of this victory, became the Prince's cognizance, sometimes using one feather, sometimes three," and he proceeds on his seals and on his tomb, with needle point, taining the motto 'Ich mine' (I serve). This historian supposes also that the three feathers was the crest of John of Bohemia, and the motto "Ich dien" meant that the King of Bohemia served the King of France, and thus used the words in derision. The same historian remarks that the Prince's motto also allude to the words of the Apostle, that "the heir, while he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant." This historian says, "and this is the more public, since that the feathers used by that prince have ever been borne by our Princes of Wales, Heirs Apparent to the Kings of this realm, with the addition (on more of all the new modern) of a coronet within which they are encircled." It appears that the feathers and motto in the time gone by were not distinctly worn by the Princes of Wales, but were made use of by collateral branches of families; and this may be remarked in connection with the houses of Lancaster and York.

On this point it is worth while to mention that a more famous English historian—Camden—says, in connection with this historical problem, that "the victorious 'Black Prince,' the King's son, used sometimes one feather, sometimes three, as tokens of his agreeing execution of all his services, as the post in the Roman times were feathers to signify their flying post haste." The winged Mercury may be taken as an instance of this. A tradition is that he wore them at the battle of Poictiers, whereunto he joined this ehi English word "Ic ute" (Thegn), that is, "I serve." According to the saying of the Apostle, "the heir, while he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant."

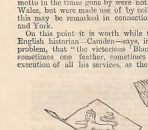
Feathers were an ornament of military men in ancient times, and they are not less remarkable in our own days. See, for instance, the cocke's plumage on the hats of our present Guardsmen. It is supposed that the ancient British Kings, particularly in Wales, used the white ostrich feather in their standards. These circumstances are curious in the contemporary historical convolution of this. We have, in fact, no testimony of the use of the "ostrich feather" by the Princes of Wales the Black Prince.

Now comes a remarkable mention of the Prince of Wales's feathers, the first on record in connection with the King's wardrobe in the reign of Edw. III. After describing the various articles of dress and some of them marked with the Plantagenet badge, the Prince of Wales's feathers, as they are called, is one cloth (o large sinoplidy) of the Queen, silver gilt, and enamelled at the bottom with a large escutcheon, with ostrich feathers thereon. This was one of the badges of the Queen's bought. It thus seems that before the battle of Cressy

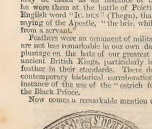


SEAL OF KING HENRY IV. WHEN PRINCE OF WALES.

One of the badges of Queen Philippa was in some way connected with the mother of the Black Prince as a family badge. On this, however, we will presently remark, and would now say that the next and most remarkable notices of the ostrich feathers occur in the will of Edward the Black Prince, dated on the 7th of June, 1376, when he directed that his body should be buried in Canterbury Cathedral, and that there should be placed around his tomb twelve intere escutcheons, each a foot high, in six of which should be placed his arms, and in the six others ostrich feathers," and that upon each escutcheon should be written "Hamnont."

From the will of the Black Prince we learn that this was the favourite motto of the Black Prince: the meaning of the word is somewhat uncertain; it probably, however, expresses "highminded" or "magnanimous."

The Prince then desired that an effigy of himself should be placed on his tomb "fully armed for war, with our arms quartered, with one crest of the leopard, and two men armed in our arms and our crest, shall preside his corpse"—that is to say, "the one by way, with our arms quartered, and the other by our arms, with our badge of ostrich feathers, with four banners of the same suit: and that each of those who bore the said banners should have a helm and a head with our arms: and that he who shall be armed for war shall have an armed man carrying after him a helmet, with a crest with ostrich feather."



BADGE OF EDWARD THE BLACK PRINCE.

In further allusion to this badge it may be remarked that amongst the various bequests given to the church of Canterbury are his hangings of ostrich feathers of black tapestry, having a red border of swans with ladies' heads. He also desired that his chapel in Canterbury Cathedral should be ornamented with his arms in divers places," and likewise with our badge of the ostrich feathers." In giving the remainder of his vestments to St. Nicholas' Chapel, in Wallingford Castle, he excepted a blue vestment with roses and ostrich feathers. He also gave to his son Richard—afterwards Richard II. — the hanging arms "du pas de Saladyn," together with the worsted hangings embroidered with wermolde, and the border pale red and black, embroidered with swans with ladies' heads and with ostrich feathers.

BADGES OF EDWARD PRINCE OF WALES, AFTERWARDS EDWARD VI.

In further refutation of the tradition which assigns the feathers to the battle of Cressy, it is material to observe that the crest of King John, who fell by the hands of the Black Prince in this battle, was the wings of a vulture, service of linden leaves of gold expanded, and not a plume of ostrich feathers. It is, however, said that an ostrich feather was the badge of the Emperor Charles, the fourth King of Bohemia, who was the son of John of Bohemia who was killed at the battle of Cressy; and it was undoubtedly the badge of his daughter Anne, the consort of Richard II. Queen Philippa's granddaughter was the sister of Henry, Count of Luxemburg, great-grandfather of the Emperor Charles IV.; and if, as there is reason to suppose, the ostrich was the ancient badge of John of Bohemia, it will naturally have descended to his son being borne by Queen Philippa and her sons. All the sons of Edw. III., besides the Prince of Wales, used the ostrich feathers, with some slight difference. John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, the third son of a King, and his descendants, all used the ostrich feather. In further proof that the ostrich feather was not taken by the Prince of Wales at the battle of Cressy, it is shown that it was represented on seals by the Black Prince at a date before the battle of Cressy.

The adjoining illustrations show that Henry IV. used the feathers both before and after he came into possession of the throne and afterwards. The ostrich feathers were also borne by some other Kings of England. In connection with this brief notice we will remark that the coronet borne by the Prince of Wales with the feathers was first used by Prince Edward, afterwards Edwards VI.

THE SOURCES OF THE NILE.—The Royal Geographical Society proposes raising a subscription of £2000 for sending an expedition, under Mr. Speke, to explore the Nile—Speke's (Victoria) Nyanza, the Nile, its outlets or sources, and to add that of Captain Speke, already despatched by way of Zanzibar, to those of other explorers. The society gives £50. The Foreign Office £100, Lord Overstone and Miss Burdett Coutts each contributes £50. An appeal is made to other wealthy persons to complete the sum required. Should the appeal not run in vain, Captain Speke will be furnished with a Gondoleer in November next; he will then explore till March, and return after the rainy season to meet arms, and continue his travels till the end of 1861 or the beginning of 1864.

SHIPMENTS OF SPECIE TO THE EAST.—According to a statement prepared by Mr. James Low, the shipments of specie from Great Britain to the East, in 1860, have amounted to £3,128,787. This is £6,191,053 less than the year 1859, and £2,471,146 less than the average of the last five years. The proportion of gold shipped this year, and included in the above, has been £1,612,691, a large proportion of which has been sent to China. Of the total £2,007,146 went to Bombay and Mr. Bindet Coutts each contributed £50. An appeal is made to other wealthy persons to complete the sum required. Should the appeal not run in vain, Captain Speke will be furnished with a Gondoleer in November next; he will then explore till March, and return after the rainy season to meet arms, and continue his travels till the end of 1861 or the beginning of 1864.

SACRILEGE BY A PRIEST.—The Italian journals state that a few evenings back the discovery was made in the famous shrine of Loretto, in the Papal States, that in the course of the night a box for the reception of the offerings of the faithful had been opened by means of a false key, and the money in it, supposed to have been a large sum, carried away. It appears, however, the thief did not take a great wealth to carry off, as suspended from the neck of the statue, neither did he steal any other of the numerous articles of value in the place. The robbery was effected in a very short time. A priest attached to the chapel, and after perpetrator it to go out of a window to avert suspicion as to his participation in the theft, and the evening an inhabitant of the town had been privy to the robbery, and had received part of the money. These men were arrested, and part of the booty was recovered.
